Explanation as regards the assessment of the poor rate in Scotland, that one half of the gross sum required is levied from the owners and one half from the occupiers, there being two separate collections, 316-320 —— Particulars relative to the classification permitted under the Assessment Act as regards the occupier's moiety of the poor rate; illustration. in the case of the parishes of Old Machar and St. Nicholas, Aberdeen, 320-345. 373-379 ——Difficulty and disputes under the former system of taxing means and substance, so that occupancy with a classification was substituted, 321-324. 373-379 —— Absence of classification in the greater number of parishes, 330. 380.

Information relative to the different constitution of the parochial boards for administering the poor rate in the burghal parishes, in the landward parishes, and in the parishes that are partly burghal and partly landward, 346-352——Ancient origin of the system of rating both owners and occupiers, so as to divide the tax between the land and the inhabitants, 353-355.

Enumeration of borough or municipal rates in Scotland, some being leviable on both owner and occupier, some on the owner only, and some on the occupier only, 356-358 ——Additional labour in the case of those borough rates collected from both owners and occupier; doubt, however, as to the expediency of a change, 359-363——Advantage of the direct charge upon the occupier, in the case of the poor rate, as giving him an interest in the administration, 363.

Explanation relative to the constitution and mode of election of the municipal councils, as in Aberdeen; undue power of election in the lower class of voters, 364-370—— Definition in the Scotch Poor Law Act whereby the owner or lessee of a house, where the land is let on building lease, is held to be the proprietor, and is assessed accordingly, 371, 372—— Further statement on the subject of road assessments in Aberdeenshire, and throughout Scotland; reference more especially to the mode of dealing with the debts when turnpike gate are abolished, 380-382.

Collection of Rates:

Much greater convenience in collecting from the owners than from the tenants; illustration of this in Aberdeenshire, Cochran 281-293——Additional labour in the case of those borough rates in Scotland collected from both owners and occupiers; doubt, however, as to the expediency of a change, ib. 359-363.

Convenience in collecting the income tax from the occupier instead of from the owner, Garnett 759, 760——Expediency of collecting the whole rate from the tenant, who should deduct half from the rent, Read 1493——Advantage of the county rate and poor rate being collected together, Pownall 1887, 1888——Doubt as to there being room for much improvement in the mode of collection of the county rate, poor rate, and highway rate, Squarey 3277-3279. 3351, 3352.

Great inconvenience to country ratepayers in England under the present system of assessment and collection of the different rates; suggested collection of all the rates in a classified form, once or twice a year by official collectors, Grey 3639. 3682-3700. 3752 —— Probable improvement if all the rates were collected together, half-yearly, by paid officials instead of by overseers, Dashwood 3831-3836. 3854-3859. 3872-3880.

Satisfactory operation in Scotland of the system of a separate collection of the poor rate from owners and from occupiers, Caird 4334-4338 ——Three sets of collectors for the rates in Leeds; great improvement if there were but one collection and if one body had the entire supervision, Middleton 5503-5508. 5528-5531. 5542-5546.

Advantage of two separate systems of collection of rates in Birmingham, one for parochial and the other for municipal purposes; doubt as to the expediency of but one collection, Avery 5695-5705. 5757, 5758. 5787, 5788——Doubt as to its being feasible to collect the rates by requiring the ratepayers to bring the money to an office, ib. 5738-5740 —— Convenience in collecting the rates from the owners where the property is small, whilst it is more convenient that the occupier should pay where the houses are large, Baxter 5915.

Suggestion by the Committee that, subject to equitable arrangements as regards existing contracts, the rates should be collected as at present, from the occupier, power being given to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, Rep iii——Expediency of uniformity and simplicity of collection being secured as far as possible, ib. iv.

COUNTY RATE:

Opinion favourable to the county rate, or the main part of it, being put upon the Government, Read 1342. 1641——Improbability of landlords raising their rents if they had to pay the county rate, ib. 1516, 1517——Doubt as to any more economical administration of the county rate, if half were thrown upon the owner, ib. 1589–1591. 1605——Very limited discretion of the magistrates as to the charges paid out of the county rate, ib. 1592–1604.

Removal of some inequality as regards incoming tenants if the whole of the county rate were borne by the owners, Read 1606–1608——Opinion that owners as well as occupiers should contribute to the county rate, Pownall 1880. 1889–1892. 1907.

Objections to charging the county rate, or half of it, upon the owners; non-objection as regards future contracts, though in such case the owners would recoup themselves in the rent, Wyatt 2047–2056. 2072–2078. 2080–2086. 2142——Belief that more jobbery and increased expenditure would be the result if the ratepayers elected representatives in the administration of the county rate, ib. 2057–2065. 2097, 2098. 2104–2106.

Approval of the contributors to the county rate being represented in its distribution, Squarey 3096, 3097——Witness sees no advantage in putting the whole of the county rate upon the owner, ib. 3206——Satisfactory administration of the county rate in Oxfordshire, it being expedient however that the occupiers should share in the administration, as sharing in the rate, Dashwood 3807–3826.

Probable advantage in dividing the county rate between owner and occupier in England, though in Scotland it is all paid by the landlord, Caird 4321, 4322——Feeling at Lancaster in favour of the ratepayers being represented in the administration of the county rate, Grant 4741–4745. 4903, 4904. 4920, 4921. 4957, 4958. 4972——Strong feeling at Macclesfield in favour of the ratepayers being represented in the administration of the county rate; check thereby to undue expenditure, May 5430–5436.

Approval of the whole of the county rate being put upon the owner, Baxter 5987–5989.

D.

Dashwood, Capt. Frederick L. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a tenant farmer in Oxfordshire, and has had the management of estates, 3784–3789——Is strongly in favour of a division of all local rates between owner and occupier, on the ground chiefly of the interest which the former would take in the administration, 3790 et seq.——Incidence of a large proportion of the rates on the owners though paid in the first instance by the occupiers, 3794–3796. 3802–3827. 3842–3844——Improved management and more judicious expenditure by combining the owners with the occupiers in the payment and disbursement of the poor rate and other rates, 3803–3806. 3811–3814. 3828, 3829. 3860, 3861. 3881–3886.

Satisfactory administration of the county rate in Oxfordshire, it being expedient however that the occupiers should share in the administration, as sharing in the rate, 3807–3826——Probable improvement if all the rates were collected together, half yearly, by paid officials instead of by overseers, 3831–3836. 3854–3859. 3872–3880——Doubt as to landlords generally adding to their rents as an immediate consequence of a division of rates, 3837–3841.

Adverse feeling now directed against occupiers as members of boards of guardians, it being very desirable that they should have the co-operation of the owners, 3846–3853. 3865–3870——Necessity of owners being fairly represented at local boards if they pay half the rates, ex officio members being in such case undesirable, 3862–3864.

Demand Note. Recommendation as to the particulars to be set forth in the demand note proposed to be left with each ratepayer in the event of a consolidation of rates, Rep. iv.

Districts. Various areas or places comprised under the term "district" for the purposes of the Local Government Act of 1858, Taylor 384, 385——Opinion that as regards the class of districts which are neither boroughs nor towns some overhauling will be necessary to prevent increased complication, ib. 625–627.

Division of Rates:

Question considered whether it would not be an improvement if owners were required by Act to pay a moiety of the rates; difficulty as regards existing engagements or leases, Fry 214–225. 251–264——Approval of certain permanent structural charges falling on the owners if it be decided to apportion the rates between owners and occupiers, Taylor 660, 661.

Opinion that a division of rates would not as a rule be any pecuniary benefit to the occupiers of land, as the landlords would recoup themselves in the rent, Read 1276 et seq. ——Probability of a larger and more generous expenditure of poor rates if half were paid by the owners, ib. 1290. 1464–1469. 1498. 1515——Conclusion favourable to an equal division between owner and occupier of the local rates generally, including poor rate, highway rate, county rate, &c; that is, if they be divided at all, ib. 1384–1397. 1457, 1458. 1497–1500. 1554. 1640——Statement opposed to a compulsoey division of rates between owners and occupiers until there is a re-arrangement of rents; probability otherwise of an increase of rents beyond half the amount of the rates, ib. 1414–1421. 1681–1689. 1681–1694——Explanation that witness is not very strongly in favour of a division of rates, though on the whole he considers it desirable, ib. 1498, 1499.

Recognition in Ireland and Scotland of the principle of rating the owner as well as the occupier, Lambert 1707–1711——Distinction between the poor rate and the counry rate as regards the question of the owner contributing, Pownall 1889–1893.

Objection to division in the case of the county rate, Wyatt 2047–2056——Fairness of charging the county rate and poor rate partly upon the owner and upon ground rents if property generally be rated also, ib. 2072–2075. 2139, 2140——Approval of portions of the poor rate being put on the owner in the case of future contracts or agreements, and provided they are directly represented in the administration, ib. 2107–2121. 2132–2134. 2140–2142.

Decided objection to halving the rates between the occupier and owner, it being far better to place all the rates on the latter, and to give him a direct voice in the administration, Andrews 2474 et seq.——Opinion that it would be a great mistake to place the local rates entirely upon the owners, Rogers 2701——Approval of the division of local rates generally between owner and occupier, an amended representation of owners at local boards being in such case desirable, Beloe 2925–2934. 3012 et seq.

Witness considers it desirable that a portion of the rates should be paid by the landlord, in order to remove the sense of fancied wrong on the part of the tenant, Squarey 3094–3115——Suggestion that one-half the increase beyond the average be paid by the landlord; this should apply to all rates, ib. 3130 et seq.——Further statement that a division of the surplus rates between landlord and tenant is very desirable, though ultimately the whole rates are in any case a charge upon the land, ib. 3201–3207. 3225–3240. 3256–3258. 3308. 3312–3315. 3338. 3353–3360.

Strong approval of a division of all local rates between owner and occupier, on the ground chiefly of the interest which the former would take in administration, Grey 3550. 3564 et seq.; Dashwood 3790 et seq.——Statement in favour of an equal division between owner and occupier not only of the poor rates but the county rates, highway rates, improvement rates, &c., Grey 3569–3571. 3637–3642. 3746–3751——Doubt as to landlords generally adding to their rents as an immediate consequence of a division of rates, Dashwood 3837–3841.

Effect of a division of the rates in causing landlords to protect themselves in the rent, the latter however being mainly governed by competition, Caird 4361–4365——Witness has studied the question of a division of the poor rate between the owner and occupier, and submits grounds for the conclusion that it is neither necessary nor advisable to levy half the rate from the owner, Grant 4739, 4740. 4782–4820. 4856–4861. 4955–4958. 4975——Opinion that a division would be injurious as disturbing existing arrangements, and that the administration would be less efficient and less economical, ib. 4784. 4804–4820. 4856–4861. 4955, 4956. 4975.

Approval of a portion of the poor rate being charged upon the ground landlord; reference hereon to the large increase of the rate in the City of London, Innes 5085, 5086. 5180–5187. 5211–5215——Doubt as to a division of rates being any permanent benefit benefit to occupiers, though it would tend to better administration, Innes 5201-5210——Tendency of a division of rates to disturb existing arrangements, and to cause landlords to raise the rents so as to cover their share of the rates, ib. 5201-5207——Opinion that a division of the rates would be no advantage to the occupier, save in exceptional cases, Middleton 5573-5575. 5585-5607——Non-objection to a division of rates, and to collection from the owners, on the principle of the income tax, providing existing contracts be not interfered with, Avery 5750-5753.

Objection by occupiers to a division of rates as leading to a revision of rents; expected increase of the latter beyond the amount of rates thrown on the owners, Baxter 5848-5860. 5863, 5864. 5867. 5937. 5993-5996. 6026-6029——Proposition that as regards land all new or increased rates should fall upon the owner up to half the amount of the total rates for the time being; opinion that there would be no great hardship in applying this rule to existing contracts, ib. 5866-5877. 5895-5907. 5938-5946. 5969-5975. 5982-5989. 5992. 6010——Effect of a division of rates in leading to a general increase of charge, inasmuch as it would be argued that the maximum of taxation had not been reached, whilst the administration would be less economical than if the occupiers paid the whole, ib. 5897-5900. 5958. 5973-5981. 5997. 6019-6025——Similar principle to be followed in placing half the poor rate upon the owner, as in formerly placing the income tax upon him, ib. 5916, 5917——Operation of the proposed division of rates in the event of the rates being reduced instead of being increased; difficulty in the case of leases, ib. 5947-5951.

Conclusions of the Committee favourable to the principle of a division of rates between owner and occupier, Rep. iii, iv.

Draft Reports. Draft Report proposed by the Chairman of the Committee, Rep. x-xxiii——Draft Report proposed by Mr. Corrance, ib. xxiii-xxv.

Drainage. Rare instances of drainage operations by local boards which increase the value of land, Taylor 632, 633——Importance of drainage near towns on the score of health; absence of any provision by which the respective benefits to the agriculturists and to the inhabitants of the towns could be fairly apportioned, ib. 633-641.

Explanation relative to the drainage and inclosure rate, the inclosure rate (which is distinct from the former) and certain other local rates of a kindred character, Fry 2307-2314.

Dwellings of the Lower Classes. The Industrial Dwellings Companies in the metropolis represented by witness have now 1,117 tenements in occupation in ten parishes; particulars hereon as to the relative amount of ground rent and of rates in each parish, Sir S. H. Waterlow 3365-3373——Larger amount of the rates than of the ground rent in some parishes, the conclusion being that in such cases the occupiers pay the rates, ib. 3371-3376. 3422. 3471, 3472. 3528-3536.

Tendency of heavy rates, as in the east end of London, to discourage companies in the erection of improved dwellings for the lower classes, and to cause the crowding of families in one or two rooms, Sir S. H. Waterlow 3380-3385. 3407-3421. 3450-3462——Higher or lower rents charged accordingly as the rates are high or low, the latter being paid by the companies or owners, ib. 3390-3397. 3404 et seq.

Practice of the companies represented by witness as to erecting tenements several storeys high, in order to keep down the proportion between the ground rent and the gross rent, Sir S. H. Waterlow 3419, 3420. 3440-3477. 3511-3523——Maximum of rent paid in most instances by the working classes, ib. 3437-3439——Payment of an average taxation of 8¾ d. per week by each tenant under witness's companies, the average rent being 5 s. 8½ d. per week, ib. 3438-3440. 3494-3496.

Total of 12,344 l. as the gross rents of witness's companies last year, the rates having been 1,704 l., Sir S. H. Waterlow 3439. 3482-3484——Selection of sites by the companies in places where the working classes reside, the rates being as a rule high in such localities, ib. 3473-3476——Heavy assessment and taxation in proportion to the ground rents, on account of the houses being several storeys high, ib. 3477-3481. 3528-3536.

Earle, Thomas Hughes, and George Arthur Webb. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. Earle.) Is clerk of the peace for Hampshire, Mr. Webb being his chief clerk, 831, 832——Enumeration of purposes to which the county rate in Hampshire is applied, 833, 834——Separate rate for the police, though it is levied at the same time as the county rate, 835, 836——(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Explanation in detail as to there being no lunatic asylum rate, and as to the cost of county lunatics in the asylum, as well as repairs of building, being borne out of the enhanced charges paid for patients from certain boroughs and out counties, and for private patients, 837 et seq.

Particulars relative to the debt in respect of the asylum buildings, and the arrangements for the liquidation of such debt, together with the interest, out of the county rate, 839. 891–905. 918–928——(Mr. Webb.) Statement on the subject of its being proposed by the Home Secretary to disallow the arrangement in regard to borough patients, so that an additional charge for the asylum will fall upon the county rate, 861–874——(Mr. Webb and Mr. Earle.) Information in regard to the different basis or assessment for the county rate and for the poor rate in Hampshire, 897–907——Great increase in the number of county lunatics, 908–916——(Mr. Earle.) Total of 12,770 l. as the amount of the county rate in 1869 at 2 d. in the pound, 919–921——The police rate was 3 d. in the pound and produced about 18,000 l., 921–923——Statement of the expenditure on county and other bridges, and the arrangements in regard to repairs, 929, 930. 943–954. 1220–1224——(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Explanation relative to the charge for militia storehouses, and the proportion paid by the boroughs, 931–940——Statutory or compulsory character of the charge in respect both of lunatics and militia storehouses, 937–942.

(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Evidence in detail relative to the cost of prosecution of prisoners, under three different heads; grounds for the conclusion that in certain cases there is a grievance to the county in respect of Treasury disallowances, 1013–1080——(Mr. Earle.) Claim of the county to a return of the whole of the cost of prosecutions if not excessive, 1018. 1065–1070——(Mr. Webb.) Amount of Treasury disallowances in 1869; improvement as compared with former years, 1020–1030. 1035, 1036——(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Hardship on the county through the clerk of assize sometimes allowing larger costs than the Treasury will repay; remedy suggested, 1030–1032. 1037, 1038. 1045–1047. 1052–1064. 1074–1080.

(Mr. Earle.) Payment by the county of about 1,000 l. a year in respect of inquests, there being seven coroners whose salaries amount to 600 l. out of this sum, 1081–1085——(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Practice as to the appointment of coroners, and as to the districts, 1086–1091——(Mr. Earle.) Mention of the county officers, and of the expense on this score, 1092–1095. 1101–1103——Statement of the expenditure of the county rate under different heads; repayment of about 6,000 l., including loan and interest, for the county gaol and the asylum, 1096–1098. 1104, 1105——The total amount of the rate in 1869 was 12,770 l., including fines and some other receipts besides the rate, 1098–1100.

Total of about 20,000 l. as the police expenditure of the county in 1869, of which amount 3,928 l. was repaid by Government as being one-fourth of the pay and clothing, 1108, 1109. 1115. 1169–1176——Receipts from certain boroughs which employ county police; also from private persons and others, 1110–1114. 1175, 1176——(Mr. Earle and Mr. Webb.) Absence of charge upon the police rate in respect of the superannuation fund; particulars hereon, 1111–1113. 1177, 1178. 1204–1213——Evidence relative to the conditions as to efficiency upon which Government pay one-fourth of the pay and clothing, and the financial effect of the arrangement generally, 1115–1132. 1154 et seq.

Explanation in regard to the police rate being levied separately from the county rate though they are collected together; difficulty through some boroughs having their own police whilst others are under contract with the county, 1133–1153——Consideration of the extent to which Government have control over the police in regard to the disposal of the force, and the pay and number, 1154–1168. 1179–1182. 1190–1203. 1214–1219.

Statement showing that besides pay and clothing there are various police expenses towards which there is no Government contribution, 1169–1174. 1183–1189——Increased pay

Freeholders (Wilts). Absence of benefit to the small freeholders in Wiltshire by a division of rates, Squarey 3357–3359.

Fry, Danby P. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the legal department of the Poor Law Board; has had much official experience in the matter of rates, and in 1846 published a book on the subject of local taxation, 1–4——Enumeration of the various rates leviable in 1843, at the time of the last report upon local taxation, and of the additional rates leviable since that period under different Acts, 5 et seq.——Immense number of local Acts, independently of the general Acts under which rates are levied; inability of witness to give any history of the former Acts, or of the rates levied under them, 25. 71–78.

Explanation as to the basis upon which the several rates are levied, there being much variety in this respect, 36–69——Statement showing that in 1846 the poor rate was applied to upwards of twenty distinct purposes, besides the relief of the poor, 79–81——Several heads under which the poor rate is now generally divided, 82, 83. 87——Great variety of precepts under which different charges are paid out of the poor rate, 84–86——Indirect charges imposed upon the poor rate since 1846; 88——Necessity of a special rate, when a new charge is imposed, if the parish is not wholly included in the district for which the rate is required, 89–91.

General practice of levying the poor rate upon the occupier, 94——Statement as to the sewers rate and special drainage rate being required by law to be assessed upon the owner in respect of his ownership; exceptional character of such assessment, 95–111. 117——Definition, in the Land Drainage Act of 1861, of the owner as the person entitled to the rack-rent, 98–100. 127–129——Circumstance of the sewers rate, under the Act 23 Hen. 8, being held to go back not only to the owner but to the prospective owner, 104, 105. 161–165——Assessment upon the occupier of the general sewers rate levied under the Act 4 & 5 Vict., 108, 109.

Practice as to the sewers rate being always levied upon the occupier, who deducts it from the rent, 110–113——Decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, three or four years ago, that the sewers rate is a tenant's tax; conflict of this decision with the Act of Hen. 8; 112–117——Provision in the Improvement of Land Act of 1861, that the occupier may agree to bear a portion of the charge for improvements, 118–126——Facility of agreement generally between the owner and occupier as to the latter undertaking to pay the local rates, 130–135. 143–151.

Explanation relative to the provisions and practice under the Metropolitan Act in regard to the sewers rate, and its payment by the owner or occupier, 133–142. 147. 152–154——Practice of levying all rates primarily on the occupier, 144, 145——Special provision in the Act of Hen. 8 as to the land being seized in distress, 148, 149——Power as to throwing upon the owner in the metropolis the cost of paving, as levied by the vestries and district boards, 155–160.

Statement as regards mines that the owner is not rated, save when he receives the produce in kind, and that then he is rated as occupier, 166–182. 189, 190. 208, 209——Exemption from poor rates, by the Act of Elizabeth, of all mines but coal mines, 175. 191——Circumstance of open quarries and open works generally being rateable, whilst underground quarries, &c. are exempt; origin of this distinction, 183–188. 191, 192.

Practice of rating the owners of railways as occupiers of the land for railway purposes, 193–196—— Great variety of practice as to the mode of rating the occupiers of coal mines in order to arrive at the proper assessment; compromise generally agreed to, 197–207.

Examination in detail relative to the effect of the amount of poor rate upon the rent, witness submitting that save under special circumstances the rate falls ultimately upon the owner, 210 et seq.——Question considered whether it would not be an improvement if owners were required by Act to pay a moiety of the rates; difficulty as regards existing engagements or leases, 214–225. 251–264.

Argument that the incidence or division of the rates, as between owner and occupier, has no effect upon the building of new houses, though the amount of the rates has doubtless an effect, 228–250——Expediency of existing engagements being taken into account in any re-apportionment of the rates, 258. 262——Effect of a direct charge upon the owners in increasing their interest in the good management of the rates, 259, 260——Approval of the owners having a proportionate control over the expenditure if charged with half the rates, 263——Equal interest practically of owners in good administration, as though directly charged or rated, 263, 264.

[Second Examination.]—Evidence showing that since 1846 very important changes have been made in the law relating to highway rates, 2196 et seq.——Important change first made by Act in 1844, as regards the six counties in South Wales, in consequence of the Rebecca riots, power having been given to the occupier to deduct the highway rate from the rent; subsequent amendment of this Act in 1851 and 1860; 2197–2201. 2225–2237——Adoption in 1862 as regards the country generally, of the plan of highway boards and districts introduced into South Wales; sundry places excepted from the Act of 1862; 2202. 2214.

Information relative to the election of waywardens and the constitution of highway boards, 2203–2213. 2274——Statement of the present practice as to the levying of highway rates, and as to the rating of mines, woods, &c.; the rate is, as a rule, paid out of the poor rate, 2215–2224. 2236–2242. 2249–2256. 2275–2278——Conclusion as to the equitable character of turnpike tolls; examination on this question, 2243–2248. 2261–2273. 2279, 2280——Impression as to there being no material increase of expense since 1846 in districts under highway boards, 2257–2260.

Distinct legislation relative to the sewering of lands and the sewering of houses, 2281——Particulars on the subject of the sewers rate as regards lands, under the Act of Henry 8; irresponsible body of Commissioners by whom this rate is administered, 2282–2303. 2326–2335——Reference to the Land Drainage Act of 1861, as continuing the then existing Commissioners of Sewers; provisions in this Act for rendering the owner liable, 2283. 2304–2306.

Explanation relative to the drainage and inclosure rate, the inclosure rate (which is distinct from the former) and certain other local rates of a kindred character, 2307–2314——Provisions of the Sewage Utilization Act of 1865 adverted to in reference to the sewering of houses, and the mode of levying the rate for the purpose, 2315–2317——Power under the Nuisances Removal Act in regard to the making of sewers; defect of the Act as regards assessment, 2318–2325——Express provision on the subject of Crown property contributing to the sewers rate, 2336.

Fry, Mr. Paper handed in by Mr. Fry containing information in detail relative to the local rates now leviable in England and Wales beyond the metropolis, App. 291–300.

G.

Garnett, Frederick Brooksbank. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Assistant Chief Inspector of the Inland Revenue, 690——Assessment of the income tax in all cases upon the occupier, who is empowered to deduct it from the rent, 691–693——Prohibition upon the owner and occupier contracting that the latter shall not deduct the tax, 694–700——Payment of the tax by each person interested in the property, in proportion to such interest, 701–705. 730–732——Question considered whether the landlord may not by raising the rent practically defeat the prohibition against the tax falling on the occupier, 706–723.

Very large increase in the value of property since the income tax was imposed, 724–727——Assessment of the income tax according to the annual value; particulars hereon as to the deductions allowed in order to arrive at the annual value, 728. 736–744. 749——Unequal incidence of sundry local taxes as compared with the income tax, 730–735.

Further consideration of the effect of the clause prohibiting contracts by which the occupier agrees to bear the income tax, 745–754——Advantage to the owner in cases where unduly low assessments are made by mistake, 755–758——Convenience in collecting the tax from the occupier, instead of from the owner, 759, 760——Exemption of unoccupied house, 761.

Obligation upon the owner when the assessment is too low, to state the same in his return, 762——Power of a shopkeeper or trader in regard to deduction if assessed at an amount beyond his rent, 763–769.

General District Rate. Provision in the Public Health Act for the levying of a special district rate, as well as a general district rate; inconvenience experienced, so that since the Act of 1858 the only rate levied by local boards for general purposes is the general district rate, Taylor 394–397. 408, 409. 412, 413——Enumeration of purposes or improvements to which the general district rate may be applied, ib. 398–402——Explanation as to the general district rate being leviable only upon one-fourth of assessable value of certain classes of property, ib. 403. 430, 431. 549–554. 595.

Assessment of the general district rate upon occupiers, save with certain specified exceptions, Taylor 424–426——Option of the local board to levy the rate upon the owner in the case of property under 10 l., ib. 426. 513–516. 534–536. 603, 604——Evidence in explanation and approval of the arrangement by which the general district rate is charged entirely upon the occupier; incidence of the rate in any case upon the occupier, ib. 454–471. 519–521. 533. 538. 581, 582. 605–619——Information supplied publicly to the ratepayers as to the objects and amount of the general district rate before it is levied, ib. 497–501.

Further statement as to the power of subdivision under the general district rate for separate rating; frequent exercise of this power by the local boards, Taylor 517, 518. 539–544. 593–596——Impression that since the Public Health Act, it has not been open to owners and occupiers to make contracts by lease for a division of the district rates, ib. 522–525.

Glossop, Francis H. N. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Chairman of the Committee of Coldbath Fields Prison; was formerly on the Committee of the House of Detention, 2145–2147——Several prisons of the county of Middlesex, these being altogether exclusive of the City prisons, 2148. 2179–2182——Particulars relative to the Industrial School at Feltham, its origin, cost, and operation; voluntary character of this expenditure, which is about one-eighth of the whole county expenditure, 2149–2157. 2169–2175. 2178. 2189, 2190.

Information relative to the Treasury payments for certain prisoners: unduly low allowance per head, as compared with the cost to the county, 2158–2165. 2185–2189——Absence of inconvenience through the rural police in Middlesex not being under the magistrates, 2166–2168. 2176, 2177——Circumstance of the Home Secretary having represented to the magistrates that another prison was required, 2183, 2184——Hardship on the county through large numbers of the prisoners or criminals coming from other counties, 2189, 2190.

Advantage as regards the rating of owners, if they are directly represented at boards of guardians, 2191——Advantage of owners being elected, rather than of the system of ex officio guardians, 2192–2195.

Government Contribution (Local Rates). Suggestions on the subject of Government contribution towards local taxation, and Government control in the matter, Read 1342. 1641. 1494, 1495. 1511. 1555, 1556——Expediency of the main part of the county rate being paid by Government, ib. 1342. 1641—— Suggestion that such matters as vaccination, registration, and police, should be taken off the rates altogether, Grant 4922, 4923.

Grant, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is clerk to the Guardians of the Lancaster Union, and in other capacities has had considerable experience on the subject of rates, 4639–4642——There is a local board at Lancaster, and a general district rate is levied, as well as a water-rate, in addition to the poor rate; amount of these in the pound, 4643–4648. 4656–4660. 4949——Houses under 5 l. rateable value are exempt from rating for certain purposes, save to the extent of 8 d. in the pound, 4646. 4761. 4889.

Statement as to there being now no borough rate at Lancaster, though there was in former years, 4648–4655. 4905–4910——Payment of the police out of the corporation funds, the corporation having property on land and houses, and owning the waterworks, 4661–4665——Circumstance of the corporation and the local board being composed of the same persons, there being however separate accounts and distinct administrations, 4667–4676.

Information as to the audit of the accounts of the corporation, and of the local boards: opinion as to the expediency of a professional audit, 4677–4688. 4911. 4915–4919. 4941–4948——Particulars relative to the payments made by the borough out of the poor-rate towards the county rate, in respect of the county lunatic asylum, the burial board, &c., 4689–4734——Separate collection of the general district rate, and of the poor-rate; advantage if there were but one collection, 4735–4738. 4765, 4766. 4938–4940.

Witness has studied the question of a division of the poor-rate between the owner and the occupier, and submits grounds for the conclusion that it is neither necessary nor advisable to levy half the rate from the owner, 4739. 4740. 4782–4820. 4856–4861. 4955–4958. 4975——Feeling at Lancaster in favour of the ratepayers being represented in the administration of the county rate, 4741–4745. 4903, 4904. 4920, 4921. 4957, 4958. 4972.

Examination in detail in support of the conclusion that, subject to some exceptions, the rates fall upon the occupier in the case of houses, and upon the owner in the case of land, 4746–4760. 4784. 4844–4855. 4869–4886. 4900–4902.

System of compounding for the poor-rate as regards small tenements in Lancaster, the owner paying the rates at a deduction, 4762–4764. 4887, 4888——Particulars relative to the valuation and assessment for the general district rate, and for the poor-rate, the poor law assessment being adopted by the local board, and there being a separate valuation for the county rate, 4767–4779. 4925–4937. 4954.

Regular attendance of some of the ex officio guardians at the Lancaster Board, 4780, 4781——Evidence in favour of owners being placed in the same position as occupiers as regards facility of representation at boards of guardians, 4785–4799. 4973, 4974—— Proposition that certain items of expenditure, such as public buildings and works of permanent improvement, be levied entirely from the owners, 4800–4803. 4922–4924.

Statement as to the poor rates in Lancaster Union having been largely reduced under the present system of administration, 4811–4820. 4868. 4950–4953. 4976–4980——Collection of a highway rate in most of the townships of the Lancaster Union, each township managing its own highways, 4821–4826——Particulars relative to the distinction between townships and parishes in Lancashire, more especially as regards the townships in Lancaster Union, 4825–4843.

Several causes to which the increased rateable value of property in Lancaster township is attributable, 4862–4865——Important effect generally of the improved regulations as to assessment in recent years, 4863–4867——Respect in which the exemption of houses under 5 l. from rates tends to produce a bad sanitary effect, 4889–4891.

Absence of inconvenience in administration through the combination of town districts and country districts, as in the case of Lancaster Union, 4893–4899——Doubt as to there being being much difficulty in providing that half the rates should be levied from the ground landlord, 4912-4914——Suggestion that such matters as vaccination, registration, and police, should be taken off the rates altogether, 4922, 4923.

Consideration of the question whether much injustice would not arise as regards the payment of income tax by owners upon the gross rent if they pay half the rates, 4959–4971. 4981–4990—— Probability of landlords taking a more active interest in the rates, if they paid half, 4991, 4992 ——Deduction allowed from the rental of small houses at Lancaster, in respect of the rates, before the income tax is charged: absence of any such deduction in the case of land, 4993–5000.

Grey, Charles Grey. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had considerable experience as a farmer and land agent in England and Ireland, on the subject of local taxation in each country, 3537-3543——Division of the poor-rates in Ireland between the owners and occupiers in all cases above 4 l., the practice being for the latter to deduct half the rates from the rent, 3544–3549——Payment of the rates by the owner when the rent is under 4 l., 3546——Advantage of the division of rates between occupier and owner in Ireland, as giving the latter a direct interest in the administration; expediency of a similar system in England, 3550. 3564 et seq.

Evidence to the effect that the average rates fall upon the owner in Ireland as well as in England, being considered in the rent, but that any excess falls upon the tenant, until there is a new lease or a new letting, 3552-3564. 3632-3636. 3655-3662——Statement in favour of an equal division between owner and occupier not only of the poor-rates but the county rates, highway rates, improvement rates, &c., 3569–3571. 3637–3642. 3746–3751.

Description of the systems in England (as in Northumberland) and in Ireland for the administration of the highway rate and the management of the roads; important advantages of the Irish system, and of the constitution and action of the road sessions, as compared with the highway boards in England, 3572–3608. 3643-3654. 3666-3681. 3728–3739. 3767–3782——Advantages of a division of the highway rate, rather than of its being all borne by the occupier or by the owner, 3572, 3573. 3647-3650.

Considerations as to the best constitution of the boards for administering the rates in England in the event of these being divided between the owners and occupier: doubt as to the necessity of a direct election of the former in lieu of the ex officio system, 3597–3608. 3626-3631. 3651-3654. 3701, 3702. 3753–3766.

Conclusion that if it were enacted that the owner should pay half the rates, owners would not stipulate in their leases or agreements that the occupiers should pay all, 3609–3617. 3636. 3714-3716——Equal interest taken by the small occupiers in Ireland, as by the large occupiers, in the administration of the rates, 3618–3625.

Great inconvenience to country ratepayers in England under the present system of assessment and collection of the different rates; suggested collection of all the rates in a classified form once or twice a year by official collectors, 3639. 3682–3700. 3752 —— Payment by the State of the whole of the police expenses in Ireland, whereas in England a police rate is levied, 3663. 3703-3705——Payment of the whole of the county rate in Ireland, including a highway rate, by the occupiers, 3666, 3667.

Way in which, by fixing upon an average of rates, the principle of a division between owner and occupier might be applied to existing contracts, 3706-3711. 3740–3745—— Sufficient interest likely to be taken in the expenditure by the occupiers if they paid only half instead of all the rates, 3712——Grievance to be removed by a division of the rates, 3713——Low amount at which the poor-rates have been kept in Ireland, whilst in England there has been a great increase of local rates; instance of this in Northumberland, 3717–3719. 3774–3782.

Good attendance of ex officio members at boards in Ireland, 3721, 3722. 3728–3735 ——Different area of assessment for the poor-rate in Ireland and in England, 3722, 3723 ——Large increase of assessments in England owing to the action of the assessment committtes, 3724-3727. 3764-3766. 3772——Contemplated discontinuance of ex officio members if there be an equal election of owners and of occupiers, 3783.

Ground Rents. Lower rent obtainable for ground proposed to be built upon if the rates are high, the ground landlord, as well as the owner, being affected in such case, Hunt, 777–785. 793-805. 812-814. 4396 et seq.——Varying proportion borne by the ground rent to the building rent in different parts of the metropolis, the proportion or margin of rack rent being much larger in the west end than in the east end, ib. 786–792 ——Expediency of ground rents in the metropolis contributing to the county rate; this should apply only to future contracts, Pownall 1880–1883. 1908–1915.

Evidence to the effect that when building ground is taken the landlord gets less ground rent if the rates are high than if they are low, but that all subsequent increase of rates during the lease falls upon the occupier, Sir S. H. Waterlow 3377 et seq.——Objections to a further imposition of local taxation upon ground rents during existing contracts, the

Admission as to some special arrangements being necessary in order to meet the case of life interests in ground rents in the metropolis, if the improvement rates be divided, Sir J. Thwaites 4062–4079——Doubt as to there being much difficulty in providing that half the rates should be levied from the ground landlord, Grant 4912–4914.

Payment of the income tax by ground landlords adverted to as a precedent for charging them with a portion of the local rates. Innes 5026–5031——Expediency of rendering ground rents liable further adverted to, ib. 5211–5215. 5227, 5228.

Very slight extent to which ground rents are affected by the rates, whilst they escape all increase of rates during the terms of the leases, Baxter 5810. 5820–5823——Further statement in favour of ground rents being charged with a portion of certain rates; machinery by which this might be effected, ib. 6010–6013. 6030–6037.

Limited control of the magistrates over the county expenditure, whilst the ratepayers directly, may be said to have none at all, Earle 1253–1262——Belief that the county expenditure has decreased in the last 15 years, ib. 1263——Explanation in regard to there being a separate assessment in the county for the county rate, and for the poor rate, Earle and Webb 1264–1273——Statement of the expenditure of the county rate under different heads; repayment of about 6,000 l., including loan and interest for the county gaol and the asylum, Earle 1096–1098. 1104, 1105.

7. Lunatics and Lunatic Asylum:

Explanation in detail as to there being no lunatic asylum rate in Hampshire, and as to the cost of county lunatics in the asylum, as well as repairs of building, being borne out of the enhanced charges paid for patients from certain boroughs and out-counties, and for private patients, Earle and Webb 837 et seq.——Particulars relative to the debt in respect to the asylum buildings, and the arrangements for the liquidation of such debt, together with interest, out of the county rate, ib. 839. 891–905. 918–928——When the asylum was built, 63,000 l. was borrowed, of which there is 27,300 l. now unpaid, Earle 839. 918.

Statement on the subject of its being proposed by the Home Secretary to disallow the arrangement in regard to borough patients, so that an additional charge for the asylum will fall upon the county rate, Webb 861–874——Great increase in the number of county lunatics, Webb and Earle 908–916——Statutory or compulsory character of the charge in respect both of lunatics and militia store-houses, ib. 937–942.

8. Militia Store-houses:

Explanation relative to the charge for militia store-houses, and the proportion paid by the boroughs, Earle and Webb 931–940.

9. Police:

Separate rate in Hampshire for the police, though it is levied at the same as the county rate, Earle 835, 836——The police rate in 1869 was 3 d. in the pound, and produced about 18,380 l.; ib. 921–923——Total of about 20,000 l. as the police expenditure of the county in 1869, of which amount 3,928 l. was repaid by Government as being one-fourth of the pay and clothing, ib. 1108, 1109. 1115. 1169–1176——Receipts from certain boroughs which employ county police; also from private persons and others, ib. 1110. 1114. 1175, 1176.

Absence of charge upon the police rate in respect of the superannuation fund; particulars hereon, Earle and Webb 1111–1113. 1177, 1178. 1204–1213——Evidence relative to the conditions as to efficiency upon which Government pay one-fourth of the pay and clothing, and the financial effect of the arrangement generally, ib. 1115–1132. 1154 et seq.——Explanation in regard to the police rate being levied separately from the county rate, though they are collected together; difficulty through some boroughs having their own police, whilst others are under contract with the county, ib. 1133–1153——Consideration of the extent to which Government have control over the police in regard to the disposal of the force and the pay and number, ib. 1154–1168. 1179–1182. 1190–1203. 1214–1219——Belief as to the check by Government upon the dismissal of the chief constable, with whom the disposal of the force rests, Webb 1154–1167. 1214; Earle 1168. 1215–1219.

Statement showing that besides pay and clothing there are various police expenses towards which there is no Government contribution, Earle and Webb 1169–1174. 1183–1189——Increased pay of the Hants police some years since, in consequence of a representation from Government, ib. 1190–1198——Cost of the force when Government first contributed one-fourth, and at the present time, ib. 1225–1232——The pay and clothing for last year was 17,000 l., ib. 1230.

Feeling of the occupiers in some districts in favour of an increase in the force, Earle 1233–1239——Approval by the county of the present arrangement with Government rather than of a discontinuance of Government contribution and control, ib. 1240–1245.

10. Prosecution of Prisoners:

Evidence in detail relative to the cost of prosecution of prisoners, under three different heads; grounds for the conclusion that in certain cases there is a grievance to the county in respect of Treasury disallowances, Earle and Webb 1013–1080——Amount of Treasury disallowances in 1869; improvement compared with former years, Webb 1020–1030. 1035, 1036——The Treasury disallowances would be about 100 l. in respect of 3,000 l.; ib. 1021——Hardship on the county through the clerk of assize sometimes allowing larger costs than the Treasury will repay; remedy suggested, Earle and Webb 1030–1032. 1037, 1038. 1045–1047. 1052–1064. 1074–1080——Claim of the county to a return of the whole of the cost of prosecutions if not excessive, Earle 1018. 1065–1070.

Hancock, Dr. W. Neilson. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Official experience of witness in connection with statistics and returns of local taxation in Ireland, 3887-3890——Enumeration of the various rates levied in Ireland, and of their several amounts, the largest being the grand jury cess, or county cess, and the next the poor rate, 3891-3897——Several bodies by whom the county cess is sanctioned or levied, a final sanction or fiat being given by the judge of assize; advantage of this system, 3898, 3899.

Various purposes to which the county cess is applied, the largest item being the repairs of roads and bridges, which absorbs about half, 3900-3904. 3933, 3934——Small payment for police by the ratepayers in Ireland, the charge having been undertaken by the State by way of compensation for free trade, 3904. 4000-4006——Payment of the county cess by the occupiers exclusively, 3905.

Strong feeling in Ireland in favour of a division of the county cess (as of the poor rate) between owner and occupier; such division has been recommended by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, and witness believes that owners do not object to it, 3906, 3907. 3918. 3926, 3927. 3981-3987. 4010-4012——Explanation relative to the constitution of the road sessions, or body for administering the county cess; great defect in there being no security for a representation of the cesspayers, 3908-3918.

Information as to the representation of owners and occupiers at boards of guardians in Ireland, the rate being divided between the two, and the result of the system being excellent, 3918-3929. 3981. 4010, 4011——Various purposes to which the poor rate is applied; small item expended in out-door relief, 3930-3937. 4015——Explanation on the subject of rates for town purposes in Ireland, and the bodies by whom levied; particulars hereon as to the various rates in Dublin, their amount and incidence, 3938-3975.

Different system of valuation in England and in Ireland, so that the high rates in the pound in the latter country do not fairly represent the comparative burden, 3952, 3953. 3977-3980. 3988-3996——Practice as to the administration of drainage rates in Ireland by district boards; improvement suggested, 3976——Total of 4 s. 3¼ d. in Ireland and of 4 s. in England as the amount of local rates in the pound, 3977——Way in which, by arriving at an average of rates the principle of a division between owner and occupier might be applied to existing contracts, 3984, 3985.

Large increase of local taxation in Ireland since 1845; much less amount per head than in England, 3988-3990. 3997-3999——Payment by the occupiers of the charge for infirmaries and lunatic asylums in Ireland, it being proposed to apply the revenues of the Irish Church to this purpose, 4007-4009——Expected increase of rent if the owners pay half the county cess, 4013, 4014——Excessive amount of the poor-rate in England as compared with Ireland, owing to the liberal out-door relief in the former case, 4015, 4016.

Hayward, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Clerk to the Commissioners of Sewers for the district from Lombard's Wall to Gravesend Bridge, 4505——Particulars relative to the constitution and functions of the Commission, the first Commission having been in the reign of Henry 8, and the last renewal in July 1861; 4506-4524. 4604-4611——Statement of the powers of the Commission in regard to rating, the rate or wailscott being levied upon the owners according to acreage, and varying in the different levels into which the district is divided, 4523 et seq.

Total of seventeen different levels; rate per acre in each, the amount varying from year to year, according to the expenditure required, but the average being about 10 s. an acre, 4525. 4536-4539. 4562-4568. 4612-4614——Practice in levying and collecting the rate, the occupiers generally making the payment, though the legal remedy is against the owner; there is, however, power to distrain upon the land, 4526-4529. 4544-4561. 4623.

Object of the rate to protect the levels from inundations from the sea, and to carry off the waters which come from the uplands into the marshes, 4540-4543——Power of the Commissioners to vary the levels, or to throw them into one, so as to equalise the rate; objections to such alteration, 4567-4571. 4590, 4591. 4612-4614.

Explanation relative to the audit of the accounts of the Commission; how far there is control over the Commissioners in this respect, or over their acts generally, 4572-4586. 4619, 4620——Practice of levying the rate over an extended area when exceptional outlay is required, 4590, 4591. 4614——Statement as to the staff of the Commission, and the expenses of management in comparison with the total expenditure, 4592-4600.

Several Acts by which the Commissioners are governed; they proceed substantially under the Act of Henry 8; 4604-4609. 4621, 4622——Satisfaction given by the Commission as at present constituted, 4615-4616——Objection by the owners to the levying of a loan for certain permanent works; this would largely have reduced the rates, 4615. 4632-4634——Ancient origin of the size of the various levels, they having been taken in from the river from time to time, 4624-4626. 4635-4638.

Highway Rate:

Important distinction between the repairing of roads out of the general district rate, and out of the highway rate; difficulty and litigation upon the question of local boards having power to make a highway rate, Taylor 403-407. 423——Great labour in providing an accurate return of the cost of highways in the kingdom, on account of portion of the repairs coming out of the general district rates, ib. 414-418.

Abandonment of highway boards in Norfolk, on account of the increased expense, Read 1612-1615. 1666, 1667——Alterations suggested in the system of administration of highways; different areas upon which the larger and the smaller roads should be thrown, ib. 1616-1639——Tendency to increased expenditure on roads, by extending the area of charge, and by dividing the highway rate between the occupier and owner, ib. 1619-1630.

Evidence showing that since 1846 very important changes have been made in the law relating to highway rates, Fry 2196 et seq.——Important change first made by Act in 1844, as regards the six counties in South Wales, in consequence of the Rebecca riots, power having been given to the occupier to deduct the highway rate from the rent; subsequent amendment of this Act in 1851 and 1860; ib. 2197-2201. 2225-2237——Adoption in 1862 as regards the country generally of the plan of highway boards and districts introduced into South Wales; sundry places excepted from the Act of 1862; ib. 2202. 2214——Information relative to the election of waywardens, and the constitution of highway boards, ib. 2203-2213. 2274.

Statement of the present practice as to the levying of highway rates, and as to the rating of mines, woods, &c.; the rate is as a rule paid out of the poor rate, Fry 2215-2224. 2236-2242. 2249-2256. 2275-2278——There is certain property exempt from poor rate which is liable to highway rate, and vice versâ, ib. 2223——The Act of 1835 did not have the effect of rendering woods and mines rateable generally to the highway rate, ib. 2238-2242——Inference as to personal property, such as stock in trade, being in some places rateable to the highway rate, ib. 2251-2253. 2275-2278——Impression as to there being no material increase of expense since 1846, in districts under highway boards, ib. 2257-2260.

Description of the systems in England (as in Northumberland), and in Ireland, for the administration of the highway rate, and the management of the roads; important advantages of the Irish system, and of the constitution and action of the road sessions, as compared with the highway boards in England, Grey 3572-3608. 3643-3654. 3666-3681. 3728-3739. 3767-3782——Advantages of a division of the highway rate, rather than of its being all borne by the occupier or by the owner, ib. 3572, 3573. 3647-3650——The Irish system of rating for roads and of road making, is just and equitable, ib. 3735——The English system is unjust and thoroughly bad, ib.

Establishment of highway boards throughout Cheshire, their constitution being satisfactory, May 5437-5440.

Further information supplied by Mr. Fry relative to the highway rates, App. 291. 294, 295.

Hunt, Henry Arthur. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had large experience as a surveyor and valuer, 770, 771——Important effect of the rates upon the rental value of houses; illustration of this, 772, 773——Argument that the rates fall upon the owner, 774-777. 793——Lower rent obtainable for ground proposed to be built upon if the rates are high, the ground landlord, as well as the building owner, being affected in such case, 777-785. 793-805. 812-814.

Varying proportion borne by the ground rent to the building rent in different parts of the metropolis, the proportion or margin of rack rent being much larger in the West end than in the East-end, 786-792——Incidence of increased rates upon the ground landlord, when the leases fall in, and when there is a new letting, 793-801——Tendency of very high rates, as in the East-end, to check building operations, 798-814——Increase of rents concurrently with increased rates in several of London, owing to the competition for houses, 806-811. 815-820.

Obstacle to putting the rates upon the owner of the fee, on account of the long leases granted; difficulty also in assessing the building owner, instead of the occupier, 821-824——Question as to the expediency of prohibiting contracts between the ground landlord and the building owner as regards rates, though there is such prohibition as regards the property tax, 827-830——Practice as to tenants being always required in new leases or agreements to pay the sewers rate, and the rates generally, 828. 829.

[Second Examination.]—Further evidence relative to the incidence of local rates in towns, to the effect that these are considered in the ground rent when the land is being taken or leased, and that the building owner or leaseholder gains or loses accordingly, as the rates fall or rise during the lease, 4396 et seq.——Very unequal assessment of property in the metropolis, an amended and uniform system being much required, 4402-4406.

Conclusion as to occupiers almost invariably inquiring into the rates before agreeing as to the rent, the latter being always affected directly or indirectly, by the former, 4421-4431. 4437. 4487, 4488——Difficulty of adjustment between owners and occupiers if it were enacted that certain rates, or a moiety of them, were to fall upon the ground rents, 4432-4434. 4446-4454. 4479-4483.

Exceptional circumstances under which the ground rent being very low, and the local taxation very high, the latter would fall upon the building owner, and would interfere with building operations, 4438-4445. 4455-4476. 4484-4501——Very indirect benefit of the Thames Embankment to ratepayers in the east of London, 4502-4504——Approval of metropolitan improvements being charged upon the coal and wine duties, 4504.

I.

Improvements and Improvement Rates:

Provision in the Improvement of Land Act of 1861 that the occupier may agree to bear a portion of the charge for improvements, Fry 118-126.

Passing of several Local Acts in the reign of George the Third for town improvements, Taylor 386——Great variety of rating provisions in different Local Acts for improvements, previously to the Consolidation Clauses Act of 1847, ib. 386, 387. 391——Statement that till the Act of 1861 the rates under Improvement Acts were not included in any general returns, ib. 388-390. 687.

Purposes for which a private improvement rate may be levied by local boards, Taylor 437, 438——Provision as to the private improvement rate being levied upon the occupier, who may deduct three-fourths of it from his rent, ib. 439-441. 526——Provision also that the owner is to pay the rate if the premises are unoccupied, ib. 442-445.

Power of the local boards to levy private improvement charges, instead of rates, and to recover summarily from the owner, Taylor 445-447. 571, 572——Comparatively small amount raised by private improvement rates, ib. 448-453——Approval of its being left to local boards to take the initiative in matters of health, subject to power in the Secretary of State to interfere in case of default, ib. 653-659——Practice frequently as to the self-election of improvement commissioners; rare instances of any audit of their accounts, ib. 677, 678.

Expected advantage in the carrying out of improvements if the local rates were divided, Read 1337, 1338. 1498——Probable check to excessive outlay on improvements if half the rates were paid by the owners, Beloe 2977-2979——Practice in the United States of levying improvement rates in the particular districts benefited, ib. 3075-3077.

Argument in support of the view that it is unjust to charge the whole of the improvement rates in the metropolis on the occupiers, and that a moiety should fall upon the ground landlords and building owners, Sir J. Thwaites 4023 et seq.——Different position of parochial rates and of improvement rates as regards the question of incidence on the owners, ib. 4028-4030. 4097.

Expediency of a moiety of permanent improvement rates falling upon the owners, Caird 4227-4231——Annual assessment of land in Scotland with reference to the actual rent, so that expenditure by a tenant in improvements does not at once subject him to increased rates; different practice as to re-valuation in England, ib. 4345-4353. 4391-4395——Proposition that certain items of expenditure, such as public buildings and works of permanent improvement be levied entirely from the owners, Grant 4800-4803. 4922-4924.

Large interest of owners in permanent improvements, it being desirable that they should contribute to improvement rates, Innes 5068-5084. 5168-5171——Injustice if the owner and leaseholder did not contribute to improvement rates; witness contends that they do contribute, Avery 5741-5749——Way in which the rates tend to prevent expenditure by occupiers in improvements; difficulty of obviating this evil, Baxter 5923-5936. 5998-6009.

Examination in detail relative to the effect of the amount of poor rate upon the rent, witness submitting that, save under special circumstances, the rate falls ultimately upon the owner, Fry 210 et seq.

Evidence relative to the incidence of local rates in towns, to the effect that these are considered in the ground rent when the land is being taken or leased, and that the building owner or leaseholder gains or loses accordingly as the rates fall or rise during the lease, Hunt 774–785. 793–805. 812–814. 4396 et seq.——Argument that in the case of houses the rates fall upon the owner. ib. 774–777. 793——Incidence of increased rates upon the ground landlord when the leases fall in, and when there is a new letting, ib. 793–801.

Incidence of the general or stationary rate upon the owner, though the occupier is affected by any fluctuation, in shape of increase or decrease, Read 1280–1285. 1291–1308. 1316–1321——Benefit to the occupier by a reduction of rates, ib. 1284–1287. 1291——Further statement as to poor rates and other local rates being a burden upon land, and falling eventually upon the owner, save so far as fluctuations are concerned, ib. 1432–1436. 1512. 1519–1523. 1560–1577. 1668–1674——Opinion that in the case of new agreements, the rates fall ultimately upon the owners, Wyatt 2118.

Examination as regards the incidence of the rates, to the effect that the tax is really upon the owner, and is considered in the rent, save when there is no re-adjustment or re-letting, Andrews 2397–2402. 2428–2435. 2490–2496. 2527–2530. 2541–2547. 2573–2584——Incidence of increased rates almost entirely on the occupier, there being very rarely any re-adjustment of the rent, ib. 2397–2402. 2428–2444.

Grounds for the conclusion that the local rates in the country are paid ultimately by the landlord, but that any increase, or excess of rates beyond the average, falls upon the tenant until there is a re-adjustment of the rent, Squarey 3085–3095. 3099–3107. 3208–3213. 3225–3228. 3231–3243——Gain to the tenant in the event of a decrease of rates below the average, ib. 3104–3106.

Evidence to the effect that the average rates fall upon the owner in Ireland as well as in England, being considered in the rent; but that any excess falls upon the tenant, until there is a new lease or a new letting, Grey 3552–3564. 3632–3636. 3655–3662——Incidence of a large proportion of the rates in the country on the owners, though paid in the first instance by the occupiers, Dashwood 3794–3796. 3802. 3827. 3842–3844.

Belief that, save as exceptions to the rule, the occupiers of houses virtually pay the rates, and that the fact of an increase or decrease of rates is not usually considered in the rent, Sir J. Thwaites 4036–4061. 4081–4092. 4094–4096. 4118–4122——Statement to the effect that the rates on land are considered in the rent, but that the latter is mainly fixed by the amount of competition for farms, and that any increase of rates during a lease or tenancy falls upon the occupier, Caird 4152–4187. 4314–4320.

Examination, in detail, in support of the conclusion that, subject to some exceptions, the rates fall upon the occupier in the case of houses, and upon the owner in the case of land, Grant 4746–4760. 4784. 4844–4855. 4869–4886. 4900–4902.

Circumstances under which the rates fall upon the owner and upon the occupier respectively; witness concluding that they are a charge upon property, Innes 5085–5101. 5125–5143. 5150–5152——Dissent from the view that the owner ultimately pays all the rates, ib. 5224–5226——Indirect payment of poor rates by the owners, May 5420, 5421.

Evidence in support of the view that save in exceptional cases the burden of the rates really falls upon the occupier rather than the owner, Middleton, 5557–5564. 5571–5575. 5585–5607——Grounds for the conclusion that in Birmingham, and in towns generally, the rates are really paid by the owner and leaseholder, save that during leases or contracts any increase of rates falls upon the occupier, until there is a re-adjustment of rent, Avery 5672–5683. 5706–5708. 5715–5720. 5741–5749.

Belief of owners and occupiers that each pays the rates, Baxter 5791. 5800. 5865——Exception taken to the evidence of surveyors and valuers, as to the rates being always paid ultimately by the owners, ib. 5791–5793——Conclusion that the rates fall on both owner and occupier, ib. 5801 et seq.——Statement to the effect that as regards houses the rates fall more upon the occupiers than upon the ground landlords or building owners; concurrence of Adam Smith, McCulloch, and Mill in this doctrine, ib. 5810–5830. 5908–5914——Incidence of the rates more upon the owner than the occupier in the case of lands and farms; views of Adam Smith, McCulloch, and Mill on this point, ib. 5829–5862——Hardship upon occupiers in their bearing all the increase of rates, ib. 5865. 5941. 5945.

Conflicting evidence as regards the proportion in which the burden of rates at present falls relatively on owners and occupiers, Rep. iii.——Conclusion of the Committee that the existing system of local taxation by which the exclusive charge of almost all rates is placed by law upon the occupiers, while the owners are exempt, is contrary to sound policy, Rep. iii——Conclusion that in many cases the burden of the rates falls ultimately, either in part or wholly, upon the owner, who, nevertheless has no share in their administration, ib.

Income Tax:

Assessment of the income tax in all cases upon the occupier, who is empowered to deduct it from the rent, Garnett 691-693——Prohibition upon the owner and occupier contracting that the latter shall not deduct the tax, ib. 694-700——Payment of the tax by each person interested in the property, in proportion to such interest, ib. 701-705. 730-732——Question considered whether the landlord may not by raising the rent practically defeat the prohibition against the tax falling on the occupier, ib. 706-723.

Very large increase in the value of property since the income tax was imposed, Garnett 724-727——Assessment of the income tax according to the annual value: particulars hereon as to the deductions allowed in order to arrive at the annual value, ib. 728. 736-744. 749——Unequal incidence of sundry local taxes as compared with the income tax, ib. 730-735.

Further consideration of the effect of the clause prohibiting contracts by which the occupier agrees to bear the income tax, Garnett 745-754——Advantage to the owner in cases where unduly low assessments are made by mistake, ib. 755-758——Exemption of unoccupied houses, ib. 761——Obligation upon the owner, when the assessment is too low, to state the same in his return, ib. 762——Power of a shopkeeper or trader in regard to deduction if assessed at an amount beyond his rent, ib. 763-769.

Approval of half the rates being charged upon the income tax, as the best means of assessing property, Read 1347, 1348——Expediency of levying local rates on the principle of an income or property tax, Beloe 2941, 2942.

Consideration of the question whether much injustice would not arise as regards the payment of income tax by owners upon the gross rent, if they pay half the rates, Grant 4959-4971. 4981-4990——Deduction allowed from the rental of small houses at Lancaster, in respect of the rates, before the income tax is charged; absence of any such deduction in the case of land, ib. 4993-5000——Incidence of the income tax adverted to; deduction allowed in witness's case in respect of rates, Innes 5102-5112.

Contemplated levying of the rates from the landlord in the same way that the income tax is levied; doubt whether they should be deducted from mortgages, Baxter 5952-5957. 6012, 6013. 6030, 6031.

Innes, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an owner of house property in the City of London, chiefly let out in offices, 5001-5004. 5006——Mention of the several rates levied in the City, the total as paid by witness, averaging about 4*s.* in the pound, 5005——Exemption from the house duty in the case of large houses owned by witness and let out in offices, there being no residential tenants; reason for such exemption whilst shops are liable, 5005-5013. 5160. 5188-5195. 5232-5234.

Statement to the effect that there might in justice be a division of the City consolidated rate, the main drainage rate, and the poor rate between landlord and tenant, 5014-5026. 5121-5124——Payment of the income tax by ground landlords adverted to as a precedent for charging them with a portion of the local rates, 5026-5031——Large increase of assessments in the City in recent years, the value of property having enormously increased, 5032-5040. 5113-5120. 5216-5220.

Payment of all the rates by witness and by the company with which he is connected; increase of rent in order to cover this payment, 5041, 5042. 5087-5090——Very little opportunity of owners in the City to take an active interest in the administration of the rates; illustration of this, 5043-5064. 5146-5153. 5162, 5163——Expediency of owners paying a portion of some of the rates, and being duly represented in the administration, 5049. 5144-5148. 5162-5174. 5209, 5210 et seq.

Large interest of owners in permanent improvements, it being desirable that they should contribute to improvement rates, 5068-5084. 5168-5171——Approval of a portion of the poor rate being charged upon the ground landlord; reference hereon to the large increase of the rate in the City, 5085, 5086. 5180-5187. 5211-5215——Circumstances under which the rates fall upon the owner and upon the occupier, respectively, witness concluding that they are a charge upon property, 5085-5101. 5125-5143. 5150-5152.

Incidence of the income tax adverted to; deduction allowed in witness's case in respect of rates, 5102-5112——Explanation of the practice as to assessment in the City, and the deduction made from the rent, 5154–5160——Contemplated apportionment of different rates according to a graduated scale, as preferable to an equal division between owner and occupier, 5164–5171—— Doubt as to its being advisable to follow the mortgagee in the event of a division between owner and occupier, 5176.

Consideration given by witness to the subject of improvement rates and poor rates before investing in house property in the City, and before letting on lease, 5177–5180 ——Further statement as to the incidence of rates upon the rent, and as to the amount of the latter being, in the main, determined by the competition or demand, 5196–5200. 5221–5231—— Tendency of a division of rates to disturb existing arrangements, and to cause landlords to raise the rents so as to cover their share of the rates, 5201–5207.

Doubt as to a division of rates being any permanent benefit to occupiers, though it would tend to better administration, 5207–5210——Expediency of rendering ground-rents liable, further adverted to, 5211–5215. 5227, 5228—— Dissent from the view that the owner ultimately pays all the rates, 5224–5226.

1. Number of Local Rates and Total Amount raised:

Enumeration of the various rates levied in Ireland, and of their several amounts, the largest being the grand jury cess, or county cess, and the next the poor rate, Hancock 3891–3897——Net local taxation of 2,741,000 l. in 1868, ib. 3897.

2. System of Valuation, and Amount of Rates in the Pound:

Increase of late years in the value of land in Ireland, though the rates are still levied on Griffith's valuation, Lambert 1828–1842——Different system of valuation in England and in Ireland, so that the high rates in the pound in the latter country do not fairly represent the comparative burden, Hancock 3952, 3953. 3977-3980. 3988–3996——Total of 4 s. 3½ d. in Ireland, and of 4 s. in England as the amount of local rates in the pound, ib. 3977——Large increase of local taxation in Ireland since 1845; much less amount per head than in England, ib. 3988–3990. 3997–3999.

3. County Cess, including Highway Rate, &c.:

Payment by occupiers in Ireland of the whole by the county cess, without any powers of deduction from the owner, and without exemption in the case of small occupations Lambert 1729-1732——Separate collection of the county cess and the poor rate; expediency of but one collection, ib. 1733. 1807–1811——Enumeration of items comprised in the county cess expenditure, the whole amounting to something over a million for all Ireland, or about 1 s. 6 d. in the pound, ib 1734–1742——Way in which the cesspayers are represented at the presentment sessions for baronies; jurisdiction and action of this body as to the administration of the county cess, ib. 1762–1767. 1781–1801. 1805.

Evidence as to the great advantages of the system in Ireland over that in England for the administration of the highway rate and the repair of the roads, Grey 3572. 3735 et seq.——Payment of the whole of the county rate, including the highway rate, by the occupiers, Grey 3666, 3667; Hancock 3905.

In 1868 the county cess amounted to 1,122,000 l., Hancock 3891——Several bodies by whom the county cess is sanctioned or levied, a final sanction or fiat being given by the judge of assize; advantage of this system, ib. 3898, 3899——Various purposes to which the county cess is applied, the largest item being the repairs of roads and bridges, which absorbs about half, ib. 3900–3904. 3933, 3934.

Strong feeling in Ireland in favour of a division of the county cess (as of the poor rate) between owner and occupier; such division has been recommended by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, and witness believes that owners do not object to it, Hancock 3906, 3907. 3918. 3926, 3927. 3981–3987. 4010–4012——Explanation relative to the constitution of the road sessions, or body for administering the county cess; great defect in there being no security for a representation of the cesspayers, ib. 3908–3918——Expected increase of rent if the owners pay half the county cess, ib. 4013, 4014.

4. Poor Rate:

Information relative to the arrangement in Ireland by which the occupier pays the whole of the poor rate, but deducts half from the owner, Lambert 1711–1728——In the case of small property in Ireland not exceeding 4 l. a year, the poor rate is paid by the owner, ib. 1719, 1720——Power of the occupier to enter into agreement with the owner to pay the whole of the rate, ib. 1721–1726——Total of 829,000 l. as the amount of the poor rate in 1868, ib. 1743, 1744——Payment by the owners of less than one-fourth of the whole of the rates, ib. 1745–1750——Particulars relative to the constitution of boards of guardians in Ireland, and the representation of owners thereat, as paying half the poor rate, ib. 1751–1761. 1768, 1769.

Division of the poor rates in Ireland between the owners and occupiers in all cases above 4 l., the practice being for the latter to deduct half the rates from the rent, Grey 3544–3549——Excellent results of this system, ib. 3550. 3564 et seq.——Equal interest taken by the small occupiers in Ireland as by the large occupiers, in the administration of the rates, ib. 3618–3625——Good attendance of ex officio members at boards in Ireland, ib. 3721, 3722. 3728–3735——Different area of assessment for the poor rate in Ireland and in England, ib. 3722, 3723.

The poor rates and burial rates in 1868 amounted to 921,000 l., Hancock 3891——Information as to the representation of owners and occupiers at boards of guardians in Ireland, the rate being divided between the two, and the result of the system being excellent, ib. 3918–3929. 3981. 4010, 4011——Economy of management consequent on the division of the rate, and the interest taken by owners in its administration, ib. 3928——Various purposes to which the poor rate is applied; small item expended in out-door relief, ib. 3930–3937. 4015.

Good effect in Ireland of the division of rates between owner and occupier, Caird 4232–4236.

5. Police:

Payment by the State of the whole of the police expenses in Ireland, whereas in England a police rate is levied, Grey 3663. 3703–3705——Small payment for police by the ratepayers, the charge having been undertaken by the State by way of compensation for free trade, Hancock 3904. 4000–4006.

6. Drainage Rates:

Practice as to the administration of drainage rates by district boards; improvement suggested, Hancock 3976.

7. Infirmaries and Lunatic Asylums:

Payment by the occupiers of the charge for infirmaries and lunatic asylums, it being proposed to apply the revenues of the Irish Church to this purpose, Hancock 4007–4009.

8. Rates for Town Purposes:

Explanation on the subject of rates for town purposes in Ireland and the bodies by whom levied; particulars hereon as to the various rates in Dublin, their amount and incidence, Hancock 3938–3975.

poor rate in 1868; 1743, 1744——Payment by the owners of less than one-fourth of the whole of the rates, 1745-1750.

Particulars relative to the constitution of boards of guardians in Ireland, and the representation of owners thereat, as paying half the poor rate, 1751-1761. 1768, 1769——Way in which the cesspayers are represented at the presentment sessions for the baronies; jurisdiction and action of this body as to the administration of the county cess, 1762-1767. 1781-1801. 1805.

Much stricter administration of the poor law in Ireland than in England as regards out-door relief; much lower rates than in England in consequence of such strictness, 1770-1780. 1812-1827——Effect of the workhouse test in Ireland in increasing vagrancy, 1802-1804. 1843-1847——Importance of employers of labour who contribute to the poor rate, having full share in its administration, 1819-1827——Increase of late years in the value of land in Ireland, though the rates are still levied on Griffith's valuation, 1828-1842.

[Second Examination.] Power of parochial boards in Scotland under the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83, to raise the poor rate in three different ways; opinion adverse to such power in local boards, 2337-2340. 2364-2369——General practice throughout Scotland of assessing half the rate upon the owners and half upon the occupiers, 2340, 2341——Different constitution of parochial boards in burghal parishes and in non-burghal parishes, 2342, 2343.

Power of the collectors in Scotland to levy the whole rate from the occupiers, who are entitled to deduct half from the owners, 2344, 2345——Provisions in regard to levying the county rate in Scotland from the owners, 2346-2351——Great difficulty in the rating of means and substance, so that the practice was abandoned, 2352, 2353.

Definition of owners, according to the Scotch Poor Law Act, 2357——Doubt as to any difficulty in rating the owner, 2358——Special Government officer by whom the assessment in Scotland is made, 2361-2363——Doubt as to the mode in which the school rate, which formerly fell upon the heritors, is now levied, 2370-2372.

Lancaster. There is a local board at Lancaster, and a general district rate is levied, as well as a water rate, in addition to the poor rate; amount of these in the pound, Grant 4643-4648. 4656-4660. 4949——Houses under 5*l.* rateable value are exempt from rating for certain purposes, save to the extent of 8*d.* in the pound, ib. 4646. 4761. 4889——Statement as to there being now no borough rate, though there was in former years, ib. 4648-4655. 4905-4910——Payment of the police out of the corporation funds, the corporation having property in land and houses, and owning the waterworks, ib. 4661-4665.

Circumstance of the corporation and the local board being composed of the same persons, there being however separate accounts and distinct administrations, Grant 4667-4676——Information as to the audit of the accounts of the corporation and of the local board; opinion as to the expediency of a professional audit, ib. 4677-4688. 4911. 4915-4919. 4941-4948——Particulars relative to the payments made by the borough out of the poor rate, towards the county rate, in respect of the county lunatic asylum, the burial, &c., ib. 4689-4734——Separate collection of the general district rate and of the poor rate; advantage if there were but one collection, ib. 4735-4738. 4765, 4766. 4938-4940.

System of compounding for the poor rate, as regards small tenements, the owner paying the rates at a deduction, Grant 4762-4764. 4887, 4888——Particulars relative to the valuation and assessment for the general district rate and for the poor rate, the poor law assessment being adopted by the local board, and there being a separate valuation for the county rate, ib. 4767-4779. 4925-4937. 4954——Regular attendance of some of the ex officio guardians at the Lancaster board, ib. 4780, 4781——Statement as to the poor rates in Lancaster Union having been largely reduced under the present system of administration, ib. 4811-4820. 4868. 4950-4953. 4976-4980.

Collection of a highway rate in most of the townships of the Lancaster Union, each township managing its own highways, Grant 4821-4826——Particulars relative to the distinction between townships and parishes in Lancashire, more especially as regards the townships in Lancaster Union, ib. 4825-4843——Several causes to which the increased rateable value of property in Lancaster township is attributable, ib. 4862-4865——Important effect generally of the improved regulations as to assessment in recent years, ib. 4863-4867——Respect in which the exemption of houses under 5*l.* from rates tends to produce a bad sanitary effect, ib. 4889-4891.

LIVERPOOL:

1. Water Rate; its Incidence partly upon Landlords.
2. Improvement Rates; Expediency of their being borne partly by Owners.
3. Payment by Landlords of the Rates on small Houses.
4. Division of the Sewers Rate between Landlord and Tenant.
5. Expenditure for Lunatics.
6. Other Details generally relative to the Rates and their Administration.

1. Water Rate; its Incidence partly upon Landlords:

Sundry particulars relative to the water supply of Liverpool, as administered by the town council, more especially as regards a 6*d.* rate in aid, one-half of which is deducted by the occupier from the owner; strong approval of the incidence of this charge upon the owners or landlords, Beloe 2797–2835. 2915–2919. 2967, 2968——Exceptional instances of landlords exacting their share of the water rate from their tenants, ib. 2809, 2810. 2820, 2821——Very heavy water rates formerly paid by the occupiers, as compared with the present charge, ib. 2825–2835——The water rate, so far as it falls on the landlords, is virtually a property tax, ib. 2942. 3056.

2. Improvement Rates; Expediency of their being borne partly by Owners:

Information relative to the Liverpool Improvement Bill of 1867, and the decision of the town council, by the casting vote of the mayor, to abandon the clause providing that the improvement rate should be divided between landlord and tenant; evidence adverse to such decision, Beloe 2824. 2836–2848. 2925–2927. 2973–2975. 3012 et seq.——Witness was absent from the council when this clause was discussed, or the result would have been different, ib. 2836. 3044——Immense expenditure upon public works, parks, and other improvements at Liverpool, witness contending that the improvement rates for these purposes add largely to the value of owners' property, and should partly be borne by owners, ib. 2845–2848. 2925–2927. 2954. 2973–2975. 2980, 2981. 3012 et seq.

3. Payment by Landlord of the Rates on small Houses:

System in Liverpool by which the landlords pay the rates on all small property, a considerable discount being allowed them; the rents are not raised in consequence of this arrangement, Beloe 2811. 2853. 2943–2951. 2959–2961.

4. Division of the Sewers Rate between Landlord and Tenant:

Explanation relative to the sewer rate at Liverpool, it being divided between the landlord and tenant, Beloe 2854–2856. 3005–3007.

5. Expenditure for Lunatics:

2. Present Constitution and Working:

Details relative to the constitution and mode of election of local boards, and the qualification, as owners or as ratepayers, of those who are elected, Taylor 484-496——System of plural voting in the election of members; advantage of such system, ib. 484-486. 529, 530. 620, 621——Importance of a good chairman and good clerk in the constitution of local boards, ib. 527, 528. 624——Varying proportion of owners and occupiers on different boards; obstacle to fixing any uniform proportion, ib. 537. 622, 623. 645-652——Satisfactory working generally of local boards, as at present constituted; fairness on the whole of the way in which they exercise their discretion in levying the rates, ib. 578-580. 593-602. 620, 621. 673.

3. Suggestions for an Amended Constitution, with reference more especially to a Division of Rates:

Contemplated election by owners of half the representatives at local boards, if half the rates be paid by owners, Read 1325-1333——Advantages of a system of election of owners at local boards, concurrently with a division of rates, as compared with the system of ex officio members at boards of guardians, ib. 1365-1383. 1513, 1514. 1621——Suggestion with a view to very small owners having a voice in the election of local boards, ib. 1422-1424——Probable advantage if owners and occupiers at local boards were elected by the same body of ratepayers, ib. 1470-1472——Way in which the owners of very large areas of land might be represented at the local boards, ib. 1587, 1588.

Expediency of owners being elected, as preferable to the system of ex officio guardians, Wyatt 2107-2110. 2129-2131. 2134; Glossop 2192-2195——Obstacle to a satisfactory representation of owners under the present system of election of boards of guardians, Wyatt 2122-2128——Advantage as regards the rating of owners, if they are directly represented at boards of guardians, Glossop 2191.

Advantage of owners being fully represented at boards of guardians, and being elected for the purpose if there be a division of the rates; approval at the same time of ex officio guardians, Squarey 3144-3150. 3214-3218. 3285-3290. 3309-3311. 3323-3338——Satisfactory administration of the highway rate and county rate under the present system; approval however of some elected guardians of unions being imported into the administration, ib. 3151-3155. 3183-3187. 3223, 3224. 3261, 3262. 3339-3346.

Considerations as to the best constitution of the boards for administering the rates in England in the event of these being divided between the owners and occupier; doubt as to the necessity of a direct election of the former in lieu of the ex officio system, Grey 3597-3608. 3626-3631. 3651-3654. 3701, 3702. 3753-3766——Contemplated discontinuance of ex officio members if there be an equal election of owners and of occupiers, ib. 3783.

Adverse feeling now directed against occupiers as members of boards of guardians, it being very desirable that they should have the co-operation of the owner, Dashwood 3846-3853. 3865-3870——Necessity of owners being fairly represented at local boards if they pay half the rates, ex officio members being in such case undesirable, ib. 3862-3864——Evidence in favour of owners being placed in the same position as occupiers as regards

Main Drainage (Metropolis). Approval of portion of the main drainage rate falling on the owners, Innes 5023. 5025. 5121, 5122.

May, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is clerk to the guardians of the Macclesfield Union, and is also clerk to the local board of health, 5235–5238——Different functions and different officers of the local board of health and of the town council, the accounts also being separate, and the rates separately collected, 5239–5268——Improvement required in the audit of the accounts of the town council and the local boards, 5250–5255. 5453–5458.

Payment of the borough rate out of the poor rate in the township of Macclesfield, it being required solely for the police; practice as to its collection, 5258. 5269–5281. 5313, 5314——Payment also of a cemetery rate out of the poor rate, 5271–5276——Explanation in regard to the collection of the county rate in certain townships partly in and partly out of the borough of Macclesfield, 5282–5288. 5292–5297.

Contribution of the borough of Macclesfield out of the poor rate to the county asylum, whilst having little if any voice in the expenditure, 5289–5291. 5298–5303——Payment of water rates by the consumers according to the consumption, 5304–5312——Particulars relative to the River Weaver tolls and the expenditure in connection therewith, the surplus, which is considerable, going in aid of the county rate, 5323–5334. 5352–5358. 5459–5470.

Statement as to Macclesfield not having a separate quarter sessions, the county magistrates having authority to levy rates within the borough, and the police being under the town council, 5336–5351——Different systems of assessment and composition in the case of the poor rate, including the borough rate and the general district rate, an amalgamation of these rates being very desirable, 5359–5370.

Details relative to the representation of owners and occupiers respectively, in the management of affairs at Macclesfield, &c., 5371–5427——Practice of owners not to interfere in the election of guardians, owing to the confidence reposed in the latter, 5375–5383. 5412–5427——Approval of owners voting in the election of guardians, without being required to send in a previous claim to vote, 5410——Indirect payment of poor rates by the owners, 5420, 5421.

Very rare attendance of ex officio guardians in the Macclesfield Union, 5428, 5429. 5450–5452——Strong feeling at Macclesfield in favour of the ratepayers being represented in the administration of the county rate; check thereby to undue expenditure, 5430–5436——Establishment of highway boards throughout Cheshire, their constitution being satisfactory, 5437–5440——Explanation relative to the payment for the roads in the borough of Macclesfield out of the general district rate, a highway rate being levied in those portions of the townships outside the borough, 5441–5449.

Importance of the receipts from the River Weaver tolls as a means of meeting the cattle plague rate in Cheshire, 5470——Non-representation of the borough with reference to the care of its lunatics in the county asylum, the guardians being however entitled to visit the asylum, 5471, 5472.

Metropolis. Proposition, as previously laid down by witness before a Select Committee in 1866 and 1867, that all rates levied for metropolitan improvements should in justice fall partly upon the ground landlords and reversioners, Sir J. Thwaites, 4017 et seq.——Contemplated levying of the proposed rate on property, in the same way as the property tax is levied, so that each beneficial interest may be reached, ib. 4022 et seq.

Explanation that the proposed charge upon owners in the metropolis should be imposed as a new tax upon property, and should be accepted by owners in that light, Sir J. Thwaites 4051. 4088. 4096–4098——Contemplated substantial relief to the occupier by the shifting of payment to the owner, ib. 4052–4061. 4088. 4096.

Very unequal assessment of property in the metropolis, an amended and uniform system being much required, Hunt 4402–4406——Approval of metropolitan improvements being charged upon the coal and wine duties, ib. 4504.

Illustration of the expediency of shifting portion of the burden of the increased rates in the metropolis from the occupiers to the ground landlords, Baxter 5871–5875. 5895–5897.

Return showing, for each parish, &c., the total amount of local taxation in the metropolis for the year ending March 1867; the rateable annual value of property in the metropolis according to the county and poor rate basis, with the rate in the pound on each of those rentals; also the population, the area in statute acres, and the number of persons per acre, App. 282–285.

Total of 3½ d. in the pound as the amount of the county rate in Middlesex in 1869, representing upwards of 170,000 l., Pownall 1850–1858——Statement as to the assessment of the county, and the amount raised having more than doubled in the last thirty years, ib. 1853–1856——Causes of the exceptionally large amount of the rate, Wyatt 2062, 2063.

2. System of Assessment:

Amended provisions to be applied as regards assessment in Middlesex under the new Assessment Act, Wyatt 2087, 2088. 2137, 2138. 2143, 2144.

3. Administration by Magistrates:

Limited dissatisfaction among ratepayers through not being more fully represented in the administration of the county rate, Pownall 1877; Wyatt 2057——Statement as to the more economical administration by county magistrates, who are nominated than by borough magistrates, who are elected, Pownall 1885, 1886. 1902–1906——Due representation of occupiers in the administration of the county rate in Middlesex, many of the magistrates being very large occupiers and ratepayers, ib. 1885, 1886. 1898-1901. 1951–1953——Great care exercised by the magistrates in the administration of the rate, due economy being practised as regards prisons, lunatic asylums, &c., ib. 1873–1879. 1902. 1936. 1946.

4. Extent of Control of the Magistrates over the County Expenditure:

Very large expenditure over which the magistrates have little or no control, Pownall 1872. 1916 et seq.——Examinations relative to the several heads of expenditure by the justices as bearing upon the question of the preservation of the peace and of magisterial functions generally, ib. 1916–1950——Several items of expenditure besides that for lunatic asylums over which the magistrates have no control, Wyatt 2043–2046.

Statement of the county expenditure for 1868, distinguishing the amounts expended under statute, and over which the quarter sessions have no control, and the amounts expended over which the quarter sessions are supposed to have control, App. 281 —— Total of 106,420 l. in the former case, and of 65,706 l. in the latter, ib.

5. Lunatic Asylums:

Separate rate for lunatic asylums included in the county rate, Pownall 1852,1853—— Advantage of the functions exercised by the county magistrates in connection with lunatic asylums, ib. 1932–1937.

Management of each of the two county asylums by a committee of eighteen magistrates, Wyatt 1959——Separate rate in the county for the asylums, the expenditure being about 53,000 l. a year, or 1 d. in the pound, ib. 1960–1966——The rate is for the purpose of repairing and building, and for paying off the debt, ib. 1960——The parishes pay for their patients, ib.

Large item amounting to 15,000 l. a year, in respect of foreign lunatics, or lunatics for whom no settlement can be found, Wyatt 1969-1975. 2069-2071——Practice as to the assessment of the asylum rate in certain unions that are partly in Middlesex and partly in other counties, ib. 1979–1985——Charge of 9 s. 7½ d. a week made for each patient taken from the parishes, the charge at Hanwell being 10 s. 2½ d. a week; particulars hereon, ib. 1986. 1990–1992. 2001. 2006.

Very trifling extent to which the county expenditure for lunatics is within the discretion of the magistrates; careful administration in order to prevent excess, Wyatt 1988–2001. 2030–2042. 2079——Amount of debts chargeable upon the county rate in respect of the several prisons and asylums, ib. 2002–2005——Pressure by the Home Office upon the magistrates to provide an additional asylum, ib. 2007–2012——Explanation of the charge upon the county in respect of some criminal lunatics at Broadmoor, ib. 2013–2016.

5. Lunatic Asylums—continued.

Reception only of pauper lunatics in the county asylums, Wyatt 2017–2019——Very large expenditure in the erection and extension of Colney Hatch, ib. 2020–2026——Facility of managing a very large number of inmates in one asylum, ib. 2029. 2093–2096——Charge of about 3*s.* 2*d.* per inmate represented by the sum now required on account of buildings at Colney Hatch, ib. 2066–2068.

6. Prisons and Feltham Industrial School:

Information as to the amounts recovered by the county from Government in respect of the prosecution and maintenance of prisoners; loss to the county in the matter, Pownall 1869–1871——Several prisons of the county of Middlesex, these being altogether exclusive of city prisons, Glossop 2148. 2179–2182——Particulars relative to the Industrial School at Feltham, its origin, cost, and operation; voluntary character of this expenditure, which is about one-eighth of the whole county expenditure, ib. 2149–2157. 2169–2175. 2178. 2189, 2190.

Information relative to the Treasury payments for certain prisoners; unduly low allowance per head as compared with the cost to the county, Glossop 2158–2165. 2185–2189——Circumstance of the Home Secretary having represented to the magistrates that another prison was required, ib. 2183, 2184——Hardship on the county through large numbers of the prisoners or criminals coming from other counties, ib. 2189, 2190.

7. Coroners:

Unduly large charge for coroners, the magistrates having been overruled by the Home office, Pownall 1944, 1945. 1954, 1955——Grievance in the very large expenditure for coroners in Middlesex, Wyatt 2089–2092.

8. Police:

Separate administration of the police in Middlesex; the county magistrates having no authority over the force, Pownall 1857–1868——Absence of inconvenience through the rural police not being under the magistrates, Glossop 2166–2168. 2176, 2177.

9. Militia Store-houses:

Exception taken to the charge for militia store-houses, Pownall 1938–1941.

10. Superannuation of Officers:

Difficulty as to the provision of adequate superannuations for all the county officers out of the county rate, Pownall 1892–1897.

11. Audit of Accounts:

Practice as to audit of the county accounts, there being no professional auditor, Wyatt 2101–2103.

Middleton, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chairman of the Leeds board of guardians, and was formerly a member of the town council, 5473, 5474——Supplies particulars relative to the borough rate, highway rate, poor rate, and other rates levied in the township of Leeds, the whole amounting to 6*s.* 5*d.* in the pound, 5475–5484. 5492–5523. 5551–5554——Action of the town council as the local board of health, 5485–5489——Operation of the Compounding Acts in Leeds, 5490, 5491. 5602, 5603. 5615——Three sets of collectors for the rates; great improvement if there were but one collection, and if one body had the entire supervision, 5503–5508. 5528–5531. 5542–5546.

Practice as to the audit of the accounts of the town council at Leeds; conclusion as to the want of an amended audit, by means of professional auditors, 5508–5527. 5537–5541. 5561–5567. 5576–5580——Payment of all the rates by the occupier, 5532, 5533. 5555–5557——Voting qualification of owners in their capacity as occupiers; necessity of their claiming to vote, if they are not occupiers, 5534–5536. 5568–5570——Considerable expense to the borough in respect of lunatics sent to asylums, 5547–5550.

Evidence in support of the view that, save in exceptional cases, the burden of the rates really falls upon the occupier rather than the owner, 5557–5564. 5571–5575. 5585–5607——Publication of an annual statement of the accounts of the Leeds town council, 5581–5584——Doubt as to there being much dissatisfaction as regards the amount of the rates, or of the rents, 5608–5613——Ample school accommodation for the poorer classes, 5614.

Militia Rate. Discontinuance of this rate, the ballots for the militia being suspended, App. 291–294.

Militia Store-houses. See Hampshire, 8. Middlesex, 9.

Mines. Statement as regards mines that the owner is not rated, save when he receives the produce in kind, and that then he is rated as occupier, Fry 166–182. 189, 190. 208, 209 ——Exemption from poor rates, by the Act of Elizabeth, of all mines but coal mines, ib. 175. 191——Great variety of practice as to the mode of rating the occupiers of coal mines, in order to arrive at the proper assessment; compromise generally agreed to, ib. 197–207.

Mortgage of Rates. Control of the Home Secretary over the mortgaging power of local boards; want of check upon the application of the money, Taylor 642–644.

Mortgagees (Division of Rates). Doubt as to its being advisable to follow the mortgagee in the event of a division between owner and occupier, Innes 5176.

N.

Norfolk. Average of about 2 s. 6 d. in the pound as the amount of the local rates in the agricultural parts of Norfolk, Read 1385, 1386——Increase of rents in Norfolk owing to the application of capital to the land, chiefly by the tenants, ib. 1501–1506. 1524. 1533–1540.——See also Farmers.

O.

Occupiers. Practice of levying all rates primarily on the occupier, Fry 144, 145——Circumstance of rates having been originally levied upon occupiers, who in ancient times were for the most part owners, and occupied their own houses and land, Baxter 6037–6039.

Conclusions of the Committee favourable to the principle of a division of rates between occupiers and owners, Rep. iii, iv.

See also the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Offices (City of London). Exemption from the house duty in the case of large houses owned by witness, and let out in offices, there being no residential tenant; reason for such exemption whilst shops are liable, Innes 5005–5013. 5160. 5188–5195. 5232–5234.

Out-door Relief. Objectionable system of out-door relief in England, to which is attributable the more larger proportion of pauperism than in Ireland or Scotland, Read 1444. 1489–1492. 1544–1548. 1656–1661——Much stricter administration of the poor law in Ireland than in England, as regards out-door relief; much lower rates than in England, in consequence of such strictness, Lambert 1770–1780. 1812–1827——Effect of the workhouse test in Ireland, and of the denial of out-door relief in increasing vagrancy, ib. 1802–1804. 1843–1847——Undue expenditure in out-door relief in England under the present system, Dashwood 3883, 3884. 3886——Excessive amount of the poor rate in England as compared with Ireland, owing to the liberal out-door relief in the former case, Hancock 4015, 4016.

Owners. Definition, in the Land Drainage Act of 1861, of the owner as the person entitled to the rack-rent, Fry 98–100. 127. 129——Definition of owners, according to the Scotch Poor Law Act, Cochran 371, 372; Lambert 2357——Separate definition of "owner" in the Local Government Act of 1858, for voting purposes, and for other purposes, Taylor 682, 683——Definition of the owner in the Liverpool Act of 1862, as the person receiving the rack-rent, Beloe 2857, 2858. 3053–3055——Examination as to the mode in which the owner or landlord should be determined in the case of ground rents, leases, mortgages, &c., with a view to a division of the rates, ib. 3012 et seq.

Conclusion of the Committee in favour of making owners as well as occupiers, directly liable for a certain proportion of the rates, Rep. iii.

Poor Rate:

Statement showing that in 1846 the poor rate was applied to upwards of twenty distinct purposes besides the relief of the poor, Fry 79–81——Several heads under which the poor rate is now generally divided, ib. 82, 83. 87——Great variety of precepts under which different charges are paid out of the poor rate, ib. 84–86——Indirect charges imposed upon the rate since 1846, ib. 88——General practice of levying the rate upon the occupier, ib. 94.

Exception taken to the assessment of manufactories for the poor rate on the value only of the premises and plant, Taylor 556–560. 665–669——Belief that the average rate in England and Wales is about 3 s. 4 d. in the pound, including all the local burdens, Read 1276. 1384——Large portion of the poor rate which does not go in payment to the poor, ib. 1468. 1578–1580——Advantage of the direct expenditure for the poor being specified as a separate rate, ib. 1496.

Particulars relative to the assessment of the poor rate upon tenants with reference to the amount of rent and of profit; heavy burden thereby in the case of poor land, as in Norfolk, Read 1309–1320. 1524–1541. 1549 1553. 1668–1680. 1691–1703——Conclusion that property generally, as well as land and houses, should be rated to the poor, Pownall 1884. 1899. 1914——Question considered whether the poor rate might not be charged upon owners, or deducted, in the same way as the income tax, Wyatt 2112–2117. 2135, 2136——Expected efficiency in the administration of the poor rate by owners, Andrews 2606–2608.

Approval generally of the present system of levying the poor rate through the overseers, Squarey 3280–3284——Advantage of large unions as regards the administration of poor relief, ib. 3291–3295——Low amount at which the poor rates have been kept in Ireland, whilst in England there has been a great increase of local rates; instance of this in Northumberland, Grey 3717–3719. 3774–3782.

Paper submitted by Mr. Fry, showing the several charges which have from time to time been cast upon the poor rate, in addition to its primary purpose of providing for the relief of the poor, App. 293, 294.

Population. Argument that the rates are for the benefit of the population, and that all property tending to amass population should be rated, Taylor 431–435. 666–672.

Pownall, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, and has had nearly forty years' experience of county affairs, 1848, 1849——Total of 3 ½ d. in the pound as the amount of the county rate in Middlesex in 1869, representing upwards of 170,000 l., 1850–1852——Separate rate for lunatic asylums included in the county rate, 1852, 1853——Statement as to the assessment of the county, and the amount raised having more than doubled in the last thirty years, 1853–1856.

Separate administration of the police in Middlesex, the county magistrates having no authority over the force, 1857–1868——Information as to the amounts recovered by the county from Government in respect of the prosecution and maintenance of prisoners; loss to the county in the matter, 1869–1871——Very large expenditure over which the magistrates have little or no control, 1872. 1916 et seq.——Great care exercised by the magistrates in the administration of the rate, due economy being practised as regards prisons, lunatic asylums, &c., 1873–1879. 1902. 1936. 1946.

Opinion that owners as well as occupiers should contribute to the county rate, 1880. 1889–1892. 1907——Expediency of ground rents in the metropolis contributing to the county rate; this should apply only to future contracts, 1880–1883. 1908–1915——Conclusion that property generally, as well as land and houses, should be rated to the poor, 1884. 1899. 1914.

Due representation of occupiers in the administration of the county rate in Middlesex, many of the magistrates being very large occupiers and ratepayers, 1885, 1886. 1898–1901. 1951–1953——Statement as to the more economical administration by county magistrates, who are nominated, than by borough magistrates, who are elected, 1885, 1886. 1902–1906——Advantage of the county rate and poor rate being collected together, 1887, 1888——Distinction between the poor rate and the county rate as regards the question of the owner contributing, 1889–1893——Difficulty as to the provision of adequate superannuations for all the county officers out of the county rate, 1892–1897.

Examination relative to the several heads of expenditure by the justices as bearing upon the question of the preservation of the peace and of magisterial functions generally, 1916–1950——Advantage of the functions exercised by the county magistrates in connection with lunatic asylums, 1932–1937——Exception taken to the charge for militia storehouses, 1938–1941——Unduly large charge for coroners, the magistrates having been overruled by the Home Office, 1944, 1945. 1954, 1955.

Quarries. Circumstance of open quarries and open workings generally being rateable whilst underground quarries, &c. are exempt; origin of this distinction, Fry 183–188. 191, 192.

R.

Railways. Practice of rating the owners of railways as occupiers of the land for railway purposes, Fry 193–196——Conclusion as to the great injustice involved in the rating of railways in Birmingham and elsewhere, and in the exemptions enjoyed by the companies; details in support of this view, Avery 5636. 5687–5693. 5728, 5729. 5754. 5777–5786.

Read, Clare Sewell (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—In the capacity of owner and occupier has considered the question of the division of rates between occupiers and owners, 1274, 1275——Opinion that a division of rates would not, as a rule, be any pecuniary benefit to the occupiers of land, as the landlords would recoup themselves in the rent, 1276 et seq.——Belief as to the increase of rates falling entirely on the occupier, 1284, 1285. 1291. 1301–1303——Exceptional instances of reduction of rent on account of increase of rates, 1283. 1345, 1346——Benefit to the occupier by a reduction of rates, 1284–1287. 1291.

Grounds for the conclusion that a division of rates between owners and occupiers would be a great advantage, as causing the former to take a much greater interest in the administration of the rates, 1289, 1290. 1322–1344. 1349–1354——Incidence of the general or stationary rate upon the owner, though the occupier is affected by any fluctuation, in the shape of increase or decrease, 1291–1308. 1316–1321——Increased competition for land, notwithstanding increased rates and decreased profits, 1309–1320——Larger proportionate increase in local taxation than in the rateable value, 1321. 1355–1358.

Contemplated election by owners of half the representatives at local boards, if half the rates be paid by owners, 1325–1333——Approval of half the rates being charged upon the income tax, as the best means of assessing property, 1347, 1348.

[Second Examination.]—Disapproval of any interference with existing agreements and leases in applying a division of rates, 1359–1364. 1412–1421——Advantages of a system of election of owners at local boards, concurrently with a division of rates, as compared with the system of ex officio members at boards of guardians, 1365–1383. 1513, 1514. 1621——Conclusion favourable to an equal division between owner and occupier of the local rates generally, including poor rate, highway rate, county rate, &c., that is, if they be divided at all, 1384–1397. 1457, 1458. 1497–1500. 1554. 1640.

Average of about 2 s. 6 d. in the pound as the amount of the local rates in the agricultural parts of Norfolk, 1385, 1386——Expediency of some more uniform system in the selection of county bridges, 1398–1400——Inconvenience through the creation of a great variety of areas, in lieu of the parish, for purposes of local government; amendment desirable, 1401–1411.

Explanation that witness would not force a division of rates into operation in any case until there was a re-arrangement of rent, 1414–1421. 1681–1689——Suggestion with a view to very small owners having a voice in the election of local boards, 1422–1424——Proposal that county financial boards be composed equally of owners and occupiers, and that one such owner and one such occupier be elected by each board of guardians, 1427–1431. 1558, 1559.

Further statement as to poor rates and other local rates being a burden upon land, and falling eventually upon the owner, save so far as fluctuations are concerned, 1432–1436. 1512. 1519–1523. 1560–1577. 1668–1674——Probability of tenants preferring to pay an increased rent if the landlords would pay all the rates, 1437–1441——Advantage of a classification of the poor rate and other rates in order that it may be clearly seen how the money is applied, 1442, 1443. 1496.

Very slight effect of the amount of rates and their payment by occupiers, as regards employment and the rate of wages, 1444, 1445. 1459–1469. 1473–1481. 1507–1510——Objectionable system of out-door relief in England to which is attributable the much larger proportion of pauperism than in Ireland or Scotland, 1444. 1489–1492. 1544–1548. 1656–1661——Question considered as to the tendency of high rates and increased rents to alienate capital from farming pursuits, 1446–1453. 1473–1481. 1501–1506. 1524–1541.

1547. 1680. 1691–1703—— Probability of a larger and more generous expenditure of poor rates, if half were paid by the owners, 1464–1469. 1498. 1515——Large portion of the poor rate which does not go in payment to the poor, 1468. 1578–1580.

Probable advantage if owners and occupiers at local boards were elected by the same body of ratepayers, 1470–1472——Expediency of collecting the whole rate from the tenant, who should deduct half from the rent, 1493——Suggestions on the subject of Government contribution towards local taxation, and Government control in the matter, 1494, 1495. 1511. 1555. 1556——Explanation that witness is not very strongly in favour of a division of rates, though on the whole he considers it advisable, 1498, 1499.

Exceptional instances of landlords raising their rents, so long as these are fair, 1512. 1542. 1704–1706——Improbability of landlords raising their rents if they had to pay the county rate, 1516, 1517——Particulars relative to the assessment of the poor rate upon tenants with reference to the amount of rent and of profit; heavy burden thereby in the case of poor land, as in Norfolk, 1524–1541. 1549–1553. 1668–1680. 1691–1703—— Great competition for land further adverted to, 1543. 1692.

Less inducement to the occupier to keep down the poor rate by giving employment, &c., if half the rate fell upon the owner, 1581–1586——Way in which the owners of very large area of land might be represented at the local boards, 1587, 1588——Doubt as to any more economical administration of the county rate, if half were thrown upon the owner, 1589–1591. 1605——Very limited discretion of the magistrates as to the charges paid out of the county rate, 1592–1604——Removal of some inequality as regards incoming tenants, if the whole of the county rate were borne by the owners, 1606–1608.

Importance attached to a concentration of business under county boards elected on an improved plan, 1609–1611. 1642–1654 —— Abandonment of highway boards in Norfolk on account of the increased expense, 1612–1615. 1666, 1667——Alterations suggested in the system of administration of highways; different areas upon which the larger and the smaller roads should be thrown, 1616–1639—— Tendency to increased expenditure on roads by extending the area of charge, and by dividing the highway rate between the occupier and owner, 1619–1630.

Proposed distinction between different kinds of bridges as regards the area of charge, and of administration, 1631–1637——Expediency of the main part of the county rate being paid by Government, 1641——Means of separating the financial administration of the county police from the magisterial administration, 1642–1649—— Advantage of the county board acting as a sort of court of appeal for assessments and for local sanitary matters, 1654, 1655——Probability of a county financial board applying a more effective check to expenditure than the magistrates now apply, 1662–1665.

Further statement opposed to a compulsory division of rates between owners and occupiers, until there is a re-arrangement of rents; probability otherwise of an increase of rents beyond half the amount of the rates, 1681–1694——Pressure of increased rates on farmers further adverted to with reference to the smallness of agricultural profits, 1695–1703.

READING:

Different purposes to which the borough rate and the general district rate at Reading are applied, there being a separate administration for each rate, Rogers 2640–2651. 2703–2713——Collection of the borough rate as part of the poor rate; amount of the former in the pound, ib. 2640. 2652. 2662–2665. 2748. 2765–2768——The general district rate is about 2 s. 8 d. in the pound, and produces about 10,000 l., ib. 2652, 2653 ——Very small income produced by the borough fund, ib. 2657, 2658——Payment of the Reading police out of the borough fund, ib. 2659–2661.

Information relative to the collection and assessment of the general district rate, there being some exemptions, Rogers 2666–2675. 2685. 2789——Arrangement as to lighting and paving, the highway rate being included in the general district rate, and being unfairly the subject of some exemptions, ib. 2676–2679. 2789——Absence of difficulty in levying the borough rate in parishes partly in and partly out of the borough, ib. 2680–2684——Explanation as to the general district rate being levied on the owners at a reduced assessment, under the Local Government Act of 1858, ib. 2686–2690.

Statement as to there being no direct representation of owners in the town council, Rogers 2691–2700——System of borrowing money for permanent improvements at Reading; charge upon the district rate for the repayment of these loans, with the interest, ib. 2703–2711—— Several items of expenditure of the district rate, ib. 2712, 2713—— Particulars relative to the assessment for the poor rate, and the practice as to compounding, the rate being 3 s. 4 d. in the pound, ib. 2715–2726. 2729. 2748. 2753–2760—— Difficulty as to paving and lighting when new streets are formed, ib. 2739–2742—— Large increase of poor rates owing to the union workhouse, ib. 2745, 2746.

1. Poor Rate: its Division between Owner and Occupier:

Explanation as regards the assessment of the poor rate in Scotland, that one-half of the gross sum required is levied from the owners, and one-half from the occupiers, there being two separate collections, Cochran 316–320——Ancient origin of the system of rating both owners and occupiers, so as to divide the tax between the land and the inhabitants, ib. 353–355——Advantage of the direct charge upon the occupier, in the case of the poor rate, as giving him an interest in the administration, ib. 363——Definition in the Scotch Poor Law Act, whereby the owner or lessee of a house where the land is let on building lease, is held to be the proprietor, and is assessed accordingly. ib. 371, 372.

General practice throughout Scotland of assessing half the poor rate upon the owners, and half upon the occupiers, Lambert 2340, 2341——Power of the collectors in Scotland to levy the whole rate from the occupiers, who are entitled to deduct half from the owners, ib. 2344, 2345——Doubt as to any difficulty in rating the owner, ib. 2358.

Payment of half the poor rate in Scotland by the owner, and of half by the occupier, each moiety being collected separately, Caird 4131–4133, 4334–4336——Satisfaction of owners in Scotland with the arrangements whereby they pay a portion of the rates. ib. 4150, 4151——Increase of the poor rate in Scotland, though not to such an extent as to affect rents, ib. 4160–4162.

2. Parochial Boards:

Information relative to the different constitution of the parochial boards for administering the poor rate in the burghal parishes, in the landward parishes, and in the parishes that are partly burghal and partly landward, Cochran 346–352——Different constitution of parochial boards in burghal parishes, and in non-burghal parishes, Lambert 2342, 2343——Very little antagonism between owners and occupiers in Scotland in the administration of the rates, Caird 4227–4229. 4331——Influence exercised by owners or their factors at local boards when several parishes belong to one owner, ib. 4304–4307. 4339.

3. System of Assessment of Poor Rate:

Particulars relative to the classification permitted under the Assessment Act as regards the occupiers moiety of the poor rate; illustration in the case of the parishes of Old Machar and St. Nicholas, Aberdeen, Cochran 320–345. 373–379——Difficulty and disputes under the former system of taxing means and substance, so that occupancy with a classification was substituted, ib. 321–324. 373–379——Absence of classification in the greater number of parishes, ib. 330. 380.

3. System of Assessment of Poor Rate—continued.

Power of parochial boards in Scotland, under the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 83, to raise the poor rate in three different ways; opinion adverse to such power in local boards, Lambert 2337–2340. 2364–2369——Great difficulty in the rating of means and substance, so that the practice was abandoned, ib. 2352, 2353——Special Government officer by whom the assessment in Scotland is made, ib. 2361–2363.

Explanation as to the abolition of rating in Scotland according to means and substance, and as to the amended system now in operation, Caird 4354–4361.

4. Division of Highway Rates between Owners and Occupiers:

Division between owners and occupiers in Scotland of the charge for the repair of the roads; satisfactory working of the arrangements on this score, Caird 4134, 4135. 4146–4149——Varying system in Scotland as to the repairs of the roads and their management, ib. 4340–4344.

5. Payment of the County Rate and other Rates by Owners exclusively:

In Scotland the whole of the county cess is paid by the owner; provisions on the subject, Lambert 1716. 2346–2351——Payment of all the rates by landlords in Scotland, except half the poor rate, and a proportion of the highway rate, Caird 4284–4288. 4332.

6. Practice as to Municipal Rates and their Administration:

Enumeration of borough or municipal rates in Scotland, some being leviable on both owner and occupier, some on the owner only, and some on the occupier only, Cochran 356–358——Explanation relative to the constitution and mode of election of the municipal councils, as in Aberdeen; undue power of election in the lower class of voters, ib. 364–370.

7. Rate for Schools and Schoolmasters:

Doubt as to the mode in which the school rate, which formerly fell upon the heritors, is now levied, Lambert 2370–2372——Practice as to payment by the tenants towards the parish schoolmaster's salary, Caird 4136–4145. 4330. 4332, 4333.

SEWERS RATE:

1. State of the Law as to the Incidence and Assessment of Sewers Rates.
2. Particulars relative to the Constitution and Operation of the Sewers Commision appointed by Act of Henry the Eighth.
3. Objections to the Sewers Rate being imposed on Occupiers exclusively.

1. State of the Law as to the Incidence and Assessment of Sewers Rates:

Statement as to the sewers rate and special drainage rate being required by law to be assessed upon the owner in respect of his ownership; exceptional character of such assessment, Fry 95–111. 117——Circumstance of the sewers rate, under the Act 23 Hen. 8, being held to go back not only to the owner but to the prospective owner, ib. 104, 105. 161–165——Assessment upon the occupier of the general sewers rate levied under the Act 4 & 5 Vict., ib. 108, 109——Practice as to the sewers rate being always levied upon the occupier, who deducts it from the rent, ib. 110–113——Decision of the Court of Queen's Bench three or four years ago that the sewers rate is a tenant's tax; conflict of this decision with the Act of Henry the Eighth, ib. 112–117.

Explanation relative to the provisions and practice under the Metropolitan Act in regard to the sewers rate, and its payment by the owner or occupier, Fry 133–142. 147. 152–154——Special provision in the Act of Henry the Eighth as to the land being seized in distress in default of payment of rate, if assessed upon the landlord, ib. 148, 149——Distinct legislation relative to the sewering of lands and the sewering of houses, ib. 2281——Provisions of the Sewage Utilization Act of 1865 adverted to in reference to the sewering of houses, and the mode of levying the rate for the purpose, ib. 2315–2317——Power under the Nuisances Removal Act in regard to the making of sewers; defect of the Act as regards assessment, ib. 2318–2325——Express provision on the subject of Crown property contributing to the sewers rate, ib. 2336.

2. Particulars relative to the Constitution and Operation of the Sewers Commission appointed by Act of Henry the Eighth:

Information on the subject of the sewers rate, as regards lands, under the Act of Henry the Eighth; irresponsible body of commissioners by whom this rate is administered, Fry 2282–2303. 2326–2335——Reference to the Land Drainage Act of 1861 as continuing the then existing Commissioners of Sewers; provisions in this Act for rendering the owner liable, ib. 2283. 2304–2306.

Particulars relative to the constitution and functions of the Commission of Sewers for the district from Lombard's Wall to Gravesend Bridge, the first Commission having been in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and the last renewal in July 1861, Hayward 4506–4524.

2. Particulars relative to the Constitution and Operation, &c.—continued.

4524. 4604–4611——Statement of the powers of the Commission in regard to rating, the rate, or wallscot being levied upon the owners according to average, andvarying in the different levels into which the district is divided, Hayward 4523 et seq.——Total of seventeen different levels; rate per acre in each, the amount varying from year to year according to the expenditure required, but the average being about 10*s.* an acre, ib. 4525. 4536–4539. 4562–4568. 4612–4614.

Practice in levying and collecting the rate, the occupiers generally making the payment, though the legal remedy is against the owner; there is, however, power to distrain upon the land, Hayward 4526–4529. 4544–4561. 4623——Object of the rate to protect the levels from inundations from the sea, and carry off the waters which come from the uplands into the marshes, ib. 4540–4543——Power of the Commissioners to vary the levels or to throw them all into one, so as to equalise the rate; objections to such alteration, ib. 4567–4571. 4590, 4591. 4612–4614.

Explanation relative to the audit of the accounts of the Commission; how far there is control over the Commissioners in this respect, or over their acts generally, Hayward 4572–4586. 4619, 4620——Practice of levying the rate over an extended area when exceptional outlay is required, ib. 4590, 4591. 4614——Statement as to the staff of the Commission, and the expenses of management in comparison with the total expenditure, ib. 4592–4600——Several Acts by which the Commissioners are governed; they proceed substantially under the Act of Henry the Eighth, ib. 4604–4609. 4621, 4622.

Satisfaction given by the Commission as at present constituted, Hayward 4615, 4616——Objection by the owners to the levying of a loan for certain permanent works; this would largely have reduced the rates, ib. 4615. 4632–4634——Ancient origin of the size of the various levels, they having been taken in from the river from time to time, ib. 4624–4626. 4635–4638.

Paper submitted by Mr. Hayward showing the functions assigned to the Sewers Commission, and the constitution of the Commission, App. 286, 287.

3. Objections to the Sewers Rate being imposed on Occupiers exclusively:

Statement as to the sewers rate in the metropolis being unfairly imposed upon occupiers by owners, Sir J. Thwaites 4049, 4050. 4093——Mention of the sewers rate as a rate in which the landlord or owner should share, Baxter 5901–5903. 5986.

See also Liverpool, 4.

Somersetshire. Statement as to the great increase in the rates generally in witness's parish, and throughout Somersetshire; much of the increase arising from the new poor law charges, Andrews 2376–2396. 2403, 2404. 2450–2473. 2523–2525. 2609–2633.

Special District Rate. Necessity of a special rate when a new charge is imposed, if the parish is not wholly included in the district for which the rate is required, Fry 89. 91.——The special district rate is still kept up where it has been pledged for loans contracted, Talyor 412, 413.

Squarey, Elias Pitts. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As a tenant farmer in Wiltshire, and as a land agent in London, as well as in other capacities, has paid much attention to the subject of local taxation, 3078–3084——Submits grounds for the conclusion that the local rates in the country are paid ultimately by the landlord, but that any increase or excess of rates beyond the average falls upon the tenant until there is a re-adjustment of the rent, 3085–3095. 3099–3107. 3208–3213. 3225–3228. 3231–3243——Considers it desirable that a portion of the rates should be paid by the landlord, in order to remove the sense of fancied wrong on the part of the tenant, 3094–3115.

Approval of the contributors to the county rate being represented in its distribution, 3096, 3097——Inaccuracy of certain conclusions as to the incidence of local taxation with reference to the farmers' profits, 3099–3101. 3109–3112——Gain to the tenant in the event of a decrease of rates below the average, 3104–3106——Increased value of land generally, whilst farmers' profits have on the average decreased, 3107–3111. 3300——Particulars relative to the increase of rates, to the extent of 24 per cent., in the parish of Britford, in Alderbury Union, between 1847 and 1868; 3116–3128. 3254, 3255. 3264–3276. 3301–3307.

Doubt as to owners taking much more interest in the expenditure if they paid half the rates directly, 3129——Suggestion that one-half the increase beyond the average, be paid by the landlord; this should apply to all rates, 3130 et seq.——Advantage of owners being fully represented at boards of guardians, and being elected for the purpose, if there be a division of the rates; approval at the same time of the system of ex officio guardians, 3144–3150. 3214–3218. 3285–3290. 3309–3311. 3323–3338.

Satisfactory administration of the highway rate and county rate under the present system; approval, however, of some elected guardians of unions being imported into the administration, 3151–3155. 3183–3187. 3223, 3224. 3261, 3262. 3339–3346——Belief as to there being the same attention to economy as regards the poor rate, since the Union Chargeability Act, 3166-3172——Evidence on the subject of the increase in the value of land concurrently with increased rates; very inappreciable effect of the latter in checking improvements, or increased value, 3188-3200. 3270-3276. 3296-3298. 3347-3350.

Further statement that a division of the surplus rates between landlord and tenant is very desirable, though ultimately the whole rates are in any case a charge upon the land, 3201-3207. 3225-3243. 3256-3258. 3308. 3312-3315. 3338. 3353-3360——Particulars on the subject of the very large increase of rates on witness's farm, since the Union Chargeability Act, 3211-3213. 3244-3253——Injurious effect of high rates upon small property in towns, 3219-3222——Opinion that the clergy in the country are not rated too highly, as compared with the farmers, 3259, 3260. 3316-3322.

Doubt as to there being room for much improvement in the mode of collection of the county rate, poor rate, and highway rate, 3277-3279. 3351, 3352——Approval, generally, of the present system of levying the poor rate through the overseers, 3280-3284——Advantage of large unions as regards the administration of poor relief, 3291-3295——Absence of benefit to the small freeholders in Wiltshire by a division of the rates, 3357-3359.

Street Improvements. Power of local boards to construct new streets by consent, and to exercise borrowing powers for the purpose, Taylor 561-570.

T.

Taylor, Tom. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Secretary of the Local Government Act Office, 383——Various areas or places comprised under the term "district," for the purposes of the Local Government Act of 1858; 384, 385——Passing of several local Acts in the reign of George the Third, for town improvements, 386——Great variety of rating provisions in different local Acts for improvements, previously to the Consolidation Clauses Acts of 1847: 386, 387. 391——Statement as to returns of the various rates having been first collected in 1861 under the Local Taxation Returns Act, 388-390.

Power of the central authority to apply the Public Health Act of 1848 to any place, whereas the Local Government Act can only be adopted voluntarily, 391-393——Provision in the Public Health Act for the levying of a special district rate as well as a general district rate; inconvenience experienced, so that since the Act of 1858 the only rate levied by local boards for general purposes is the general district rate, 394-397. 408, 409. 412, 413.

Enumeration of purposes or improvements to which the general district rate may be applied, 398-402——Important distinction between the repairing of roads out of the general district rate and out of the highway rate; difficulty and litigation upon the question of local boards having power to make a highway rate, 403-407. 423.——Explanation as to the general district rate being leviable only upon one-fourth of the assessable value of certain classes of property, 403-430, 431. 549-554. 595.

Doubt as to much difficulty or complaint since the Act of 1858, as regards the power of local boards to make sub-areas within their districts for any purposes of the Act, 410, 411. 673——Great labour in providing an accurate return of the cost of highways in the Kingdom, on account of portion of the repairs coming out of the general district rates, 414-418——Total of 674 local boards in the country, 419——Circumstance of the vestries or local boards in the Metropolis being exempt from the Local Government Act, 420-422.

Assessment of the general district rate upon occupiers, save with certain specified exceptions, 424-426——Option of the local board to levy the rate upon the owner in the case of property under 10 l.; 426. 513-516. 534-536. 603, 604——Similar basis of assessment for the general district rate as for the poor rate; exemption as regards mines adverted to, 427-429. 545-548. 573-577——Grounds for the conclusion that the rates are for the benefit of the population, and that all property tending to amass population should be rated, 431-435. 555. 662-672——Adoption of the Act of 1858 by the greater number of boroughs, 436.

Statement of purposes for which a private improvement rate may be levied by local boards, 437, 438——Provision as to the private improvement rate being levied upon the occupier, who may deduct three-fourths of it from his rent, 439-441. 526——Provision also, that the owner is to pay the rate, if the premises are unoccupied, 442-445——Power of the local boards to levy private improvement charges, instead of rates, and to recover summarily from the owner, 445-447. 571, 572——Comparatively small amount raised by private improvement rates, 448-453.

Evidence in explanation and approval of the arrangement by which the general district rate is charged entirely upon the occupier; incidence of the rate in any case upon the occupier, 454–471. 519–521. 533. 538. 581, 582. 605–619——Statement as to the first cost of waterworks, provided by local boards, being usually taken out of the general district rate, and being thus borne by the occupiers, 472–475. 478——Different objects for which the public water supply rate and the private water supply rate are levied, 476, 477——Regulation as to the payment of water rates or water charges by the inhabitants, when the supply is provided by the local board, 479–481.

Details relative to the constitution and mode of election of local boards, and the qualification, as owners or as ratepayers of those who are elected, 484–496——System of plural voting in the election of members; advantages of such system, 484–486. 529, 530. 620, 621.

Information supplied publicly to the ratepayers as to the objects and amount of the general district rate before it is levied, 497–501——Twofold mode of audit of the accounts of local boards, the audit by borough auditors being very deficient, 502, 503——Obligation as to the local publication of the accounts, 504, 505——Great neglect of local boards in sending returns to the Home Office; intended infliction of penalty, in order to secure regularity of returns, 507–512.

Further statement as to the power of subdivision under the general district rate, for separate rating; frequent exercise of this power by the local boards, 517, 518. 539–544. 593–596——Impression that since the Public Health Act it has not been open to owners and occupiers to make contracts by lease for a division of the district rates, 522–525——Importance of a good chairman and good clerk in the constitution of local boards, 527, 528. 624——Varying proportion of owners and occupiers on different boards; obstacle to fixing any uniform proportion, 537. 622, 623. 645–652.

Exception taken to the assessment of manufactories for the poor rate on the value only of the premises and plant, 556–560. 665–669——Power of local boards to construct new streets by consent, and to exercise borrowing powers for the purpose, 561–570——Satisfactory working generally of local boards, as at present constituted; fairness on the whole of the way in which they exercise their discretion in levying the rates, 578–580. 593–602. 620, 621. 673.

Explanation with further reference to the application of the Act of 1858, and the local proceedings necessary before a district can be created, 583–592——Necessary sanction of the Home Secretary before places with less population than 3,000 can adopt the Act, 588——Opinion that as regards the class of districts which are neither boroughs nor towns, some overhauling will be necessary to prevent increased complication, 625–627——Considerable number of country districts which have come under the Act, 628–631.

Rare instances of drainage operations by local boards, which increase the value of land, 632, 633——Importance of drainage near towns on the score of health; absence of any provision by which the respective benefits to the agriculturists, and to the inhabitants of the towns, could be fairly apportioned, 633–641——Control of the Home Secretary over the mortgaging power of local boards; want of check upon the application of the money, 642–644.

Question considered whether the direct payment of half the rates by the owners would not increase their interest in the administration, 645–652——Approval of its being left to local boards to take the initiative in matters of health, subject to power in the Secretary of State to interfere in case of default, 653–659——Approval of certain permanent structural charges falling on the owners, if it be decided to apportion the rates between owners and occupiers, 660, 661.

Absence of control in the matter of lighting and watching rates not under local boards, 674–676. 679–681——Practice frequently as to the self-election of improvement commissioners; rare instances of any audit of their accounts, 677, 678.

Separate definition of "owner" in the Act of 1858, for voting purposes and for other purposes, 682, 683——Advantage of a consolidation of the Acts under which local boards work, 684–686——Further statement that till the Act of 1861 the rates under Improvement Acts were not included in any general returns, 687——Entirely local character of the purposes for which the rates are raised, 688, 689.

Thames Embankment. Very indirect benefit of the Thames Embankment to ratepayers in the east of London, Hunt 4502–4504.

Thwaites, Sir John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Proposition, as previously laid down by witness before a Select Committee in 1866 and 1867, that all rates levied for metropolitan improvements should in justice fall partly upon the ground landlords and reversioners, 4017 et seq.——Contemplated levying of the proposed rate on property, in the same way as the property-tax is levied, so that each beneficial interest may be reached, 4020, 4021. 4100–4114. 4123–4125.

Conclusion

Conclusion as to the fairness of levying a moiety of metropolitan improvement rates upon the owners of property by reason of the greatly enhanced value permanently conferred by such rate, 4022 et seq.——Belief that save as exceptions to the rule the occupiers of houses virtually pay the rates, and that the fact of an increase or decrease of rates is not usually considered in the rent, 4036-4061. 4081-4092. 4094-4096. 4118-4122——Statement as to the sewers rate in the metropolis being unfairly imposed upon occupiers by owners, 4049, 4050. 4093.

Explanation that the proposed charge upon owners in the metropolis should be imposed as a new tax upon property, and should be accepted by owners in that light, 4051. 4088. 4096-4098——Contemplated substantial relief to the occupier by the shifting of payment to the owner, 4052-4061. 4088. 4096——Admission as to some special arrangements being necessary in order to meet the case of life interests in ground rents, 4062-4079.

Proposed share of owners in the administration if they pay half the improvement rates, 4117——Paper submitted showing the aggregate taxation of the metropolis, and other particulars, 4126.

Tithes. Tithes are no burden upon the occupier, Squarey 3115——Similar incidence of tithes and of rates, both being a charge upon the land, Baxter 5885-5891.

Trades and Professions. Statement as to local taxation pressing very heavily upon trades and professions, in which the profits are small, whilst merchants who make great profits sometimes escape almost entirely, Beloe 2849-2852. 2938-2941. 2969-2971.

Turnpike Tolls. Conclusion as to the equitable character of turnpike tolls; examination on this question, Fry 2243-2248. 2261-2273. 2279, 2280.

U.

Union Chargeability Act. Instances of alteration of rent on account of the Union Chargeability Act, Read 1283. 1345, 1346. 1572-1576——Belief as to there being the same attention to economy as regards the poor rate, since the Union Chargeability Act, Squarey 3169-3172——Particulars on the subject of the very large increase of rates on witness's farm, since the Union Chargeability Act, ib. 3211-3213. 3244-3253.

W.

Waste Lands. Doubt as to the rates preventing the reclamation and improvement of land, Caird 4383-4389.

Water Rates. Statement as to the first cost of waterworks, provided by local boards, being usually taken out of the general district rate, and being thus borne by the occupiers, Taylor 472-475. 478——Different objects for which the public water supply rate, and the private water supply rate are levied, ib. 476, 477——Regulation as to the payment of water rates or water charges by the inhabitants when the supply is provided by the local board, 479-481.——See also Liverpool, 1.

Waterlow, Sir Sydney Hedley. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is largely interested in dwellings for the working classes in London, 3361-3364——The companies represented by witness have now 1,117 tenements in occupation in ten parishes; particulars hereon as to the relative amount of ground rent and of rates in each parish, 3365-3373——Larger amount of the rates than of the ground rent in some parishes, the conclusion being that in such cases the occupiers pay the rates, 3371-3376. 3422. 3471, 3472. 3528-3536.

Evidence to the effect that when building ground is taken the landlord gets less ground rent if the rates are high than if they are low, but that all subsequent increase of rates during the lease falls upon the occupier, 3377 et seq.——Tendency of heavy rates, as in the east end of London, to discourage companies in the erection of improved dwellings for the lower classes, and to cause the crowding of families in one or two rooms, 3380-3385. 3407-3421. 3450-3462——Higher or lower rents charged accordingly as the rates are high or low, the latter being paid by the companies or owners, 3390-3397. 3404 et seq.

Increase in the value of land in the metropolis, as used for building sites, 3398-3403——Practice of the companies represented by witness as to erecting tenements several storeys high, in order to keep down the proportion between the ground rent and the gross rent, 3419, 3420. 3440. 3477. 3511-3523——Maximum of rent paid in most instances by the working classes, 3437-3439——Payment of an average taxation of 8¾ d. per week by each tenant under witness's companies, the average rent being 5 s. 8½ d. per week,

Respects in which the occupier is more affected by, and more interested in local taxation in the case of house property than in the case of land, 3440-3449. 3492 ——Objections to a further imposition of local taxation upon ground rent during existing contracts, the rates having already affected the ground rents in the first instance, 3463–3470. 3485-3488——Selection of sites by witness's companies in places where the working classes reside, the rates being as a rule high in such localities, 3473–3476——Heavy assessment and taxation in proportion to the ground rents, on account of the houses being several storeys high, 3477–3481. 3528–3536.

Weaver Navgiation (Cheshire). Particulars relative to the River Weaver tolls, and the expenditure in connection therewith, the surplus, which is considerable, going in aid of the county rate, May 5323–5334. 5352–5358. 5459–5470——Importance of the receipts from the River Weaver tolls, as a means of meeting the cattle plague rate in Cheshire, ib. 5470.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALFRED HARDAKER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. Hardaker.
13 June 1870.

1. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Pawnbroker.

2. Are you also the Secretary of the Liverpool Pawnbrokers' Association?—I am.

3. How long have you been a pawnbroker?—Twenty-four years.

4. Have you been 24 years in business?—Not on my own account; it is 24 years since I entered as an apprentice.

5. How long have you been in business on your own account?—Eleven years.

6. Have you given your attention to the Acts which regulate your business?—I have.

7. Can you state what those Acts are?—Yes.

8. Which is the first Act?—The 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, which is known to us as the principal Act, which consists of 36 sections.

9. What is the next Act?—The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 98, which is an amendment of the principal Act.

10. What is the next Act?—The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27, which inflicts penalties for trading without a license.

11. Is there an Act of the 2 & 3 Vict. authorising the magistrates to mitigate penalties?—Yes.

12. Is there another Act, the 23 Vict. c. 21?—Yes; that is an amendment upon a portion of clause 6, and enables pawnbrokers to charge for duplicates under 5*s.*

13. There is also another law regulating the duty which is paid by you under the 25 Geo. 3, c. 48, is there not?—Yes.

14. Mr. T. Hughes.] Which is the Act under which you are allowed to charge a halfpenny for pawn tickets?—The Act of 1860, the 23 Vict. c. 21, which I have just named.

15. Chairman.] Can you give the Committee a general view of the principal Act of 39 & 40 Geo. 3, as it affects your trade?—I think I can; it is necessary to refer to the Act of Parliament, and beginning with the 2nd clause, from the 2nd paragraph of that clause, down to the 10th, it will be found that a rate of profit is drawn out, allowing a pawnbroker to charge a halfpenny per month for every complete half-crown of money lent; this is a portion of the rate, which is exceedingly simple, and well understood by us and by our customers; and I believe that in no case, so far as my knowledge extends, has it ever been exceeded. But the 11th paragraph introduces another element by which all pledges above 42*s.* and not exceeding 10*l.* shall be charged for at a rate of 3*d.* per pound per month, and no more.

16. At the time when this Act was passed, do you know that the usury laws were in force, and that this was a privilege to you to charge more than the regular rate of interest?—I believe so; but with regard to the element here introduced, of calculating at the rate of 3*d.* in the pound per month, I wish to illustrate the difficulties which a pawnbroker has to undergo in trying to carry out that portion of the Act, and I have prepared a short statement showing the interest to be paid from 2*l.* 3*s.* up to 2*l.* 10*s.*, which I will, with their permission, read to the Committee. For 42*s.* I am enabled to charge 8*d.* per month. If I lend 2*l.* 3*s.*, the correct interest is $6\frac{3}{4}d.$ and $\frac{18}{20}$ths per month; for 2*l.* 4*s.*, $6\frac{1}{2}d.$ and $\frac{8}{20}$ths; for 2*l.* 5*s.*, $6\frac{3}{4}d.$; for 2*l.* 6*s.*, $6\frac{3}{4}d.$ and $\frac{11}{20}$ths; for 2*l.* 7*s.*, 7*d.* $\frac{4}{20}$ths; for 2*l.* 8*s.*, 7*d.* $\frac{18}{20}$ths; for 2*l.* 9*s.*, $7\frac{1}{4}d.$ and $\frac{8}{20}$ths; and for 2*l.* 10*s.*, $7\frac{1}{2}d.$

17. I suppose

13 June 1870.

17. I suppose the object of your mentioning those figures is to show that the statutory rate does not correspond with any known coinage?—Yes, and the difficulty under which we work in trying to carry out this rate.

18 Then you have the power of relieving yourselves of this trouble by charging the coin just below the rate; you are not bound to charge the maximum figure, are you?—No; but I want to illustrate the difficulty which the public have in understanding a rate like that, as well as the difficulty which we ourselves have in calculating it.

19. You mean that the absolute rate prescribed by statute is one which cannot be paid in current coin?—I do.

20. Have you noted any other sections to which you wish to call the attention of the Committee?—The last paragraph of section 2 is, that the "said several sums shall be taken in lieu of and as a full satisfaction for all interest due, and charges for warehouse room." That we find to work very unsatisfactorily, as whatever may be the nature of the security the same rate is to be charged. I may illustrate it with regard to, say, a silver watch, which pays the same interest as a bed, or any large article of furniture would pay. We contend that this prevents a pawnbroker from taking in such articles as would be a great convenience to the pledger, in consequence of the small remuneration which he is allowed to charge according to the Act of Parliament; and for this we seek to have the liberty to make special contracts, enabling us to charge on such goods as to cover the expenses of warehousing and working.

21. That is where the goods require large warehouse space and much attention?—Yes; and a careful porterage, such as furniture, glass, china, pictures, and any delicate class of articles which require special care for their preservation, which a pawnbroker cannot give to his ordinary stock.

22. Have you any observations to make on clause 3?—That introduces the same element as I have pointed out in the 11th paragraph of clause 2. It provides that all intermediate sums between the 2*s.* 6*d.*, which I have spoken of, and 12 s. shall be charged for at the rate of 4*d.* in the pound per month, which also introduces fractions which are very difficult to calculate correctly, and are scarcely ever understood, by the customers.

23. Do you mean that, when you deal in shillings, the 4*d.* in the pound does not give any known coin for the shilling?—Yes; the interest of 3*s.*, for instance; the interest for a half-crown is a halfpenny, and the interest for 3*s.* is to be calculated at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum.

24. And that does not result in any known coin?—In a great many cases it does not.

25. What, then, do you propose as a remedy for this objectionable mode of making the calculation?—A simple rate of not less than a halfpenny, for a certain amount of money lent per month, without the intermediate calculations. Our suggestion is, that the rate should be charged which is now in existence in Ireland, namely, a halfpenny for each 2*s.* lent, or part of 2*s.*

26. Is that a uniform rate for all sums?—For all sums up to 10*l.*

27. Under what Act is that?—Under 28 Geo. 3, c. 49.

28. Mr. T. Hughes.] That is an Act of the Irish Parliament, is it not?—Yes; and it is the Act under which the trade is worked at the present time.

29. Chairman.] Is 10*l.* the limit of the pawnbroking in Ireland, then?—Yes, as well as in Great Britain.

30. Have you any observations to make upon clause 4?—The same objection that we make to the fractions of money: in London, I believe, clause 4 is carried out strictly; but in country towns, where farthings are not usually a current coin, this clause is almost universally evaded by pawnbrokers; where a farthing becomes due a halfpenny is taken. That is the custom in country towns, although, of course, there are exceptions of pawnbrokers, who will not condescend to do that sort of thing.

31. You mean that they do not give the change of a farthing, as required by this clause?—They do not.

32. Have you any observation to make upon clause 5 of the Act?—This creates considerable confusion taken in connection with the third clause, as it provides that a portion of a month shall be charged for. That of course adds very much to the confusion of the calculations.

33. Then what is your view with regard to this charge?—That we should be entitled to charge for a whole month after a certain number of days of grace. It is by law seven days. After seven days, a month and a half can be charged; but I am of opinion that we might extend the days of grace to 10, 12, or even 14 days (as far as I am personally concerned), and then that we should be able to charge two whole months. In Ireland the days of grace are only three, and after that time the whole month is charged for. They have no half-months there at all.

34. What is the practice now with regard to the days of grace?—Generally, in the country, to take a whole month after the seven days.

35. Mr. Morley.] After what date?—After the seven days' grace. A full month is always due in the first instance; every pledge pays for one month, however short a time it may have been in pledge; but after the first month seven days are allowed to elapse before we can legally charge for a month and a half, and 14 days before two months can be taken for; but it is the custom in the country to charge for two months after the expiration of one month and seven days.

36. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is that in the country as distinguished from London?—Yes.

37. Chairman.] Then is it your view that after the first month the charge should be for an entire month?—Yes; that is for the sake of carrying out a simplified rate of profit.

38. Mr. Charley.] Allowing how many days of grace?—I should be willing to allow 14 days' grace; but there are different opinions as to that.

39. Mr. Morley.] What would you recommend charging?—Two months.

40. Supposing that a party comes after a month and 10 days, what would you charge?—Two months; I object to half months at all.

41. You do not believe in half months?—I do not, because I know it has not worked well.

42. Mr. T. Hughes.] But I understand the practice at present to be this: that after one month the pawner has a right to come to you for seven days in the next month and take out his pledge upon the payment of one month's interest?—Yes.

43. You

43. You are ready, then, to extend that seven days to 14 days, you on the other hand getting the privilege at the end of 14 days of charging a second month?—I am.

44. Mr. Morley.] Then would you be content to take the money at the end of the month and 13 days, charging only one month, and so sacrificing 13 days' interest?—Yes, I should myself, rather than have to charge for the half month.

45. Mr. Charley.] As I understand, you wish to avoid fractions of either time or money?—Yes, that is our desire.

46. Chairman.] Have you any observation to make upon clause 5, in addition to what you have stated?—No, nothing more.

47. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] Are the difficulties of which you are speaking, as to half months, confined to clause 5?—Yes.

48. Mr. T. Hughes.] You are ready to give an extra seven days of grace, that is, 14 days in all, at the beginning of every new month, provided that on the expiration of those 14 days, supposing that the pledge is not redeemed, you have a right to charge for the month; is that so?—Yes, we can do that now; but cannot afford to give the extra days of grace with so unremunerative rate of profit.

49. Mr. C. H. Mills.] In the first instance, is a month paid down?—Not until redemption of the pledge.

50. Mr. Hambro.] You have said that there was considerable difficulty with regard to the fractions of the farthings in dealing with the public; could you not afford to carry on your business if you threw back all fractions of farthings to the pawners?—No; the present rate is not remunerative now, even taking advantage of the fractions of farthings.

51. And it would be still less remunerative if you threw back the fractions of farthings?—Yes. The great advantage of a monthly rate would be that it would be understood by the customer, and the present rate is not.

52. You have stated that one reason why you wish to be able to make a special charge on large objects is that they take up so much room; is it not perfectly in your power to decline to take those pledges if you like?—Certainly.

53. And, therefore, you take those things entirely of your own free will and accord, do you not?—Yes, or we decline them; but that is a great hardship to the pledger.

54. Do you not think it a hard thing for the pledger to have to pledge his bed?—Yes, but it is a harder thing for him to have to sell it outright.

55. In the country, you say that the Act is constantly evaded as regards those fractions; is the Act evaded in London also?—I am not quite acquainted with that. I think generally it is carried out, but there are evasions.

56. Do you think the Act is evaded in Liverpool, with which you are acquainted?—I know it is.

57. Is it very extensively?—Very extensively.

58. Do the police take any steps to detect the evasion of this Act?—Not that I am aware of.

59. Might I ask if you have evaded the Act?—I have, in self defence.

60. In the country, you say that after seven days beyond the month they charge for two months; is there any Act which entitles them to charge for two months?—None; it is an evasion.

61. The Act does not appear to be very stringently carried out?—It is not.

62. Mr. Charley.] Can you charge for the whole of the second month after the first 14 days now?—Yes.

63. What would you gain by an addition of seven days' grace?—Simply a rectification of the rate, so as to have a monthly rate; that is our great object.

64. Colonel Beresford.] Have you any reason to believe that the bulk of the trade would agree to any such proposal as that?—I have.

65. Mr. Morley.] I do not see very clearly that you have the power of charging between 2*s.* 6*d.* and 5*s.*; where do you see that?—The third clause gives that power. By it, any intermediate sum lent upon any pawn or pledge which shall exceed 2*s.* 6*d.*, is to be calculated at the rate of 4*d.*, and no more, for the loan of 20*s.* by the calendar month.

66. Do you reckon that upon every subdivision of the amount between 2*s.* 6*d.* and 5*s.*, say 3*s.* 3*d.*?—Yes, that is the calculation.

67. Mr. Charley.] The impossible figure, as I understand, is after 42*s.*?—No; worked out by clause 3, it applies as well under 42*s.*; but I explained that, first, because it came in clause 2, before I got to clause 3. The same principle must be carried out in clause 3 as is introduced in the 11th section of clause 2.

68. Mr. Whitwell.] Did the Committee understand you rightly when you said that the farthing alluded to in clause 4, was in the country almost invariably made a halfpenny?—It is.

69. In Ireland, is only a halfpenny charged for the first month?—That is so, for 2*s.* and under 2*s.*

70. And for each consecutive month?—Yes.

71. And what days of grace are there allowed in Ireland?—Three.

72. And no more?—And no more.

73. Mr. Morley.] Is there a publication which is called a Table of the Rates of Profit, as recognised by your trade, published by Jackson and Keeson?—Yes, such a table has been published. The pawnbrokers purchase it for their own guidance.

74. I see, then, that for 10*s.*, 2*d.* is charged for a month. According to clause 3, you are to charge for any intermediate sum between 2*s.* 6*d.* and 40*s.*, at the rate of 4*d.* for 40*s.*, are you not?—No; at the rate of 4*d.* for every 20*s.*

75. Then is not that in excess?—No; you will find it explained in the 5th paragraph of clause 2. It is a sum composed of half-crowns, and any number of complete half-crowns comes to complete halfpennys.

76. Chairman.] Have you any observations to make upon clause 6 of the Act, which relates to the entry of pawns in the books, and other matters?—We have no particular objection to this clause. It is highly necessary, of course, that a pawnbroker should keep proper books, but it is a little difficult to carry out as it is here set down. It inflicts upon the pawnbroker so many difficulties, that it is impossible to carry it out strictly. The difficulty also of getting from the pledger a correct name and address is one with which we are very much troubled. We cannot ensure correct replies to those questions. We think that it is very unnecessary that we should be obliged to ascertain if the pledger is a lodger or a housekeeper, because it is really no security, as the answer to that question is given just as the pledger thinks proper, the same as with the address. It is a common thing for false addresses to be given.

77. Do you see any objection to your being compelled to take down the name and address in those particulars?—Not at all.

78. Is any other responsibility imposed upon you by the Act than that of asking questions?—No further than that if we do not carry out those particulars, we are still liable to a payment of a penalty of 10*l.*, even if we omit, for instance, the "H" for housekeeper in our book.

79. Is it not very easy to ask a person's name and address, and whether he is a housekeeper or a lodger?—Yes; but it answers no purpose at all, for we have no means of knowing whether the information is correct or not.

80. Do you believe that many of the addresses which are given are false addresses?—I do.

81. Do you think that it is a common thing to give a false name and address?—It is, in most instances.

82. Is that the case where the pledge is honestly made by a person who has not stolen or otherwise improperly obtained the commodity?—Yes, very frequently so; I suppose because the pawnbroker may not know the real name and residence of the pledger.

83. Do you think that people who come to pawn goods wish to conceal their name and address from the pawnbroker?—Yes, in many cases.

84. They do not wish it to be disclosed that they are pawning their things?—That is their reason.

85. Are there any other points on which you wish to give evidence?—We think that the reference to the booking might be simplified very much. It states here that pledges under 5*s.* should be entered in a separate book, and that pledges over 5*s.* and not exceeding 10*s.* should be in another book, and should be entered within four hours after the pledging. That is very unnecessary; in many towns, for instance, it is the custom to book all pledges as they are received.

86. Do you know for what purpose those separate books were to be kept?—I do not; I believe that it is carried out in London, but in the country we use two books; one for all pledges for 10*s.* and under, and another for all pledges above 10*s.*, as required by the Act.

87. Is it your view that one continuous journal would answer all the purpose?—I think two would be sufficient; one for all under 10*s.* and one for all above 10*s.*

88. Why do you make a distinction between pledges above and below 10*s.*?—Because the pledges above 10*s.* have to be sold by auction, and are called in the trade "Auction pledges."

89. Therefore you think that that is the true line of division?—Yes. The whole clause would require, I think, modernising and redrawing; it is very abstruse and curious, and is a very long and complex one.

90. Have you any other observation to make upon this clause?—On the portion requiring pawnbrokers to give a note (which is what is known to us as the duplicate), the same objections apply to the "housekeeper" and "lodger;" and we think that it is necessary, that a pawnbroker should be obliged to place upon the face of his ticket the interest to be charged per month, which is not provided for in the Act. We think that that would be the best preventive of overcharge which could possibly be suggested; but to do that would require a simplified rate of profit with a charge per month. It would be impossible to carry it out now, with the present complicated rates.

91. But would you be prepared, if there were a simple rate of profit, to have stamped on that ticket the rate, so that the person pawning would know exactly what the charge was?—I would.

92. And the same with regard to the charge for warehousing, if you were allowed to make one?—Yes, a fair and proper contract note I should recommend. The latter portion of this clause also relates to the charges to be taken for duplicates. It will be seen that all tickets at that time, under 5*s.*, were to be given gratis; that was altered by the 23 Vict. c. 21, which allowed a pawnbroker to charge a halfpenny for those tickets. That was the result of an agitation got up by the pawnbrokers, some 10 or 12 years ago, with the hope of getting an entire revision of the Act; but it dwindled down, at last, to asking Parliament for what it was thought could be got, and that was the extra halfpenny. However, it has been found now that that does not make the trade a remunerative one, and therefore we are seeking to have an entire revision of the whole Act.

93. What is your idea of the revision of this rate of charge for the duplicate?—It would depend upon the rate of profit. I think that some of the evidence which will be produced before the Committee will go very strongly to show that small pledges, received for a short time, do not pay the working expenses involved; in that case it would be a question whether to increase the ticket fee at the time of receiving the pledge, or whether a satisfactory rate of profit could be devised which would sufficiently pay for the working of those small pledges.

94. Without charging for the ticket?—Yes, in either case; I am not quite sure which would be the best plan.

95. Having regard to the rate of charge which you propose to the Committee, do you propose to make any addition for the duplicate, and if so, what is the addition which you would propose?—I have no proposition to make with regard to the charge for tickets.

96. The rate which you propose is upon the assumption that the charge for the duplicate will be continued as it is, is it not?—Yes, but I think that it is very necessary that a clause like that should be a separate one; it belongs entirely to the rate of profit, and it is mixed up in this very long clause relating to the booking and the duplicate.

97. Have you any further observations to make on clause 6?—I think not.

98. Have you anything to say, with reference to clause 7, which relates to the amount of profits in duplicates endorsed on pledges?—This clause obliges the pawnbroker to endorse the amount of profit which he receives on the ticket upon the delivery of the pledge. It is carried out pretty generally, I believe, in London, but not quite so much in the country, where many small pawnbrokers, who work their own business without assistance, do not endorse the amount of interest. My own opinion is, that it has been inserted with the view of preventing overcharge; but I am quite certain that it has not been of any avail in that respect, because it is of no benefit whatever to the pledger. The pledger cannot see what amount of profit the pawnbroker places upon the duplicate, and it is no proof of how much has been taken.

99. Is it not intended to be a record against the pawnbroker, so that, in case of complaint of overcharge, there shall be no dispute upon the subject?—That is one reason, no doubt, for the clause.

100. If a complaint is made before a magistrate, is not this entry referred to as deciding the amount of charge?—It is; but I have known the endorsement to be different from the amount taken.

101. Is that on account of the people being unable to read, or from what does it arise?—The person who redeems does not see the duplicate again.

102. Has he a right to see it before this endorsement is put on it?—Not unless the pawnbroker is summoned before a magistrate to produce it.

103. Do you not, then, consider that under the clause the person redeeming has a right to see the endorsement made?—I do not think so, by this clause. It is not the custom to show the pledger the amount endorsed. In large houses of business this is carried out very strictly, for the purpose of balancing their accounts each night.

104. Then, according to your view, the pawnbroker makes this entry himself without the other party to the transaction knowing anything at all about it?—Yes.

105. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] You stated that it would answer no purpose to have the name or address of the pledger; how would you identify him, if you did not take his name or address?—I am not aware that I said that it answered no purpose. I was referring then to the "housekeeper" and "lodger."

106. I understood you to say, in answer to a question from the Chairman, that it answered no purpose to give the name or address, or to say whether the pledger was a housekeeper or lodger?—Not the name and address; I think it is very desirable, but difficult, to get them.

107. Do you not think that it is necessary to have the name and address as a means of identification?—Certainly; but it does not always answer that purpose, because if a false name is given it is of no use.

108. But then the same false name would have to be given when the person came to redeem the pledge, would it not?—Yes.

109. The pledger produces a duplicate, does he not, when he comes to redeem?—Yes.

110. And upon that duplicate appear the name and address of the pledger, whatever name may have been given, false or real?—Yes.

111. Have you any other means of identification, except that?—None.

112. Chairman.] Do you mean that when a person produces a duplicate your are under an obligation to see that it is the same person to whom the duplicate was given?—No; section 15 of the Act states that the person producing the ticket shall be considered the owner.

113. Therefore, you do not hold yourselves responsible to identify, in any way, the person to whom you return the pledge, if he produces the duplicate?—We do not.

114. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] But is there no provision in case the duplicate be sold by the pledger; is there any endorsement required upon it to show that he has parted with it?—No.

115. Is the possession by the person producing the duplicate, your warranty for giving up the goods?—Yes; under clause 15.

116. Chairman.] Is it the practice to ask the person in any way whether he is the individual named and described in the duplicate, when he produces it?—No; not unless a notice has been given by the original pledger; in that case of course the ticket is stopped, and inquiry is made.

117. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You stated that you considered it would be sufficient to keep two books; how many books is it the custom now in London to keep?—Three; you will find that pledges under 5 s. are to be kept in one book, under 10 s. in another book, and over 10 s. in another book, within four hours after the goods being pledged.

118. Therefore there are three books?—Yes.

119. Then I understand that you wish to have with regard to those tickets either an increased rate for the ticket, or else you want to have an increased sale for the pledge?—Yes.

120. Mr. Hambro.] I understood you to say that you objected to the present custom under which it is necessary to take a pledger's name and address, and that you thought that was an unnecessary part of the present system?—No; if I conveyed that impression, it was in error, and I did not intend to do so. The "housekeeper" and "lodger," and the number of the house I objected to, and the penalties being imposed when the pawnbroker does not comply with, what appear, unnecessary requirements.

121. You have told the Committee twice I think, that the trade is not a remunerative one; am I correct in that?—Yes.

122. I should very much like to find out whether many pawnbrokers, for instance, become bankrupt, or go through the court?—Not many, as a large capital in cash is necessary before commencing the business.

123. Should you say that the enormous number of pawnbrokers' shops that we see, is a sign that it is a bad business?—Yes, I think it is, but not because of the number of pawnbrokers.

124. Mr. Charley.] Do you, as a matter of fact, make entries under the "L" and "H" now?—Yes.

125. Although you are not quite certain whether they are accurate or not?—We are never certain as to whether they are accurate or not.

126. Do I rightly understand you to say that you propose to do away with the amount being endorsed on the duplicate?—I should not recommend doing away with it; but I would recommend that the rate of profit should be placed upon it when issued. Clause 7 is not a sufficient protection to the pledger.

127. I see that you propose in your Bill, that the rate should be written, in the first instance, upon the duplicate?—Yes.

128. Mr. Morley.] Would it be easy or difficult to obtain returns of the relative proportion of pledges below 10 s. and above 10 s.?—You will receive evidence from the witnesses on their own places of business as to that.

129. Will you tell me what your experience is as to the general proportion of the number of the pledges below 10 s. and above 10 s.?—The proportion of pledges below 10 s. is very much in excess excess of those above 10 s. as a rule. I have tried to get some returns from Liverpool upon that point prior to this inquiry; but I can only make an estimate, and I estimate that the total number of pledges received in Liverpool in one year amounted to something like 9,088,000. Of those, only about 50,454 were for sums above 42 s. The number of pledges received for 2 s. and under, amounted to 4,500,000 out of the 9,088,000.

130. Can you tell me whether it is true that a very large proportion of those that are of the smaller kind are redeemed?—It is.

131. Is it a much greater proportion than in the larger sums?—Yes, I should say that it was.

132. You certainly conveyed the idea that you would be less particular about taking addresses, and so on; of course you are aware that in your trade, as well as in every trade, there is a class of men that would take advantage of the people if they could?—There could be no advantage gained, if a proper duplicate were issued, bearing the pawnbroker's name and address, the date of the loan, a description of the goods, the amount lent, and the charge to be made for such loan.

133. Is it not right that there should be every possible safeguard that a person going in with property that may not belong to him should be identified as far as it can be done?—Quite so. My opinion was that a clause more simple than this should be drawn, and that such things as "housekeeper" and "lodger" do not assist in any way.

134. Would you not, for the respectability of your trade, try to compel closer attention to the character of the person pawning?—I should, decidedly; I think it is an important particular.

135. You sell all the pledges under 10 s. in any way you please, I think?—Yes.

136. That is to say, you can call in a person to buy them en masse, or you can divide them, or exhibit them in the window with a price affixed, after a certain period?—Yes.

137. Those above 10 s. you are obliged to sell through an auctioneer, are you not?—We are.

138. Who is the auctioneer in that case?—Generally we have special auctioneers.

139. Are they a recognised class of auctioneers, or are they persons specially employed by your trade?—It is a special trade almost, that of a pawnbrokers' auctioneer; for instance, Messrs. Debenham & Storr, of King-street, Covent Garden, are the principal auctioneers; there are several others; Messrs. Johnson & Dymond, in Gracechurch-street. In Liverpool we have some four or five. They have themselves been pawnbrokers, or pawnbrokers' managers, and they know the value of all classes of goods.

140. Have you looked at all at the Irish system of pawnbrokers' auctions?—Yes.

141. Do you think there would be an advantage in the introduction of something of that kind with us, that being a more distinctly public transaction?—It would be more public, but I do not see any advantage in that, because goods sold by auction generally result in a loss, and there could be no advantage to the pawner in that; the large pledges in Ireland are sold, but nothing, I think, under 4 s. is sold; I am not clear upon that point. At any rate, Dr. Hancock recommends that nothing less than 4 s. should be sold. The expense incurred by auction sales would swallow up any profit which the goods might fetch, supposing them to fetch a profit, and our experience is that they do not. My own experience last year was that I lost 117 l. by goods sold by auction.

142. Mr. Whitwell.] Is it not necessary to enter the names in the interest of the police?—Yes.

143. Would you recommend that a pledger should be subjected to a fine for giving a wrong name?—That is almost a legal question; I do not know that we have expressed an opinion upon that point. We find generally that the whole of the penal clauses in this Act refer to pawnbrokers, and not to the public in any way. It might have a good effect if a pledger should have some penalty inflicted if he did not answer the questions in a proper way.

144. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] The 10th section provides that a person not giving a proper account of himself be liable to punishment, does it not?—Yes.

145. Mr. Whitwell.] I think you stated that the pledges under 5 s., on account of the pledgers receiving their tickets gratis, very frequently did not pay the expense of transacting the business?—That portion of the clause has been amended by the 23 Vict. c. 21, which enables the pawnbroker to charge a halfpenny for that ticket.

146. And that halfpenny you say is not sufficient?—It is not sufficient.

147. What would you propose; that it should be provided that your scale of interest be adopted?—If the Irish rate were adopted I should be quite content with the charge for tickets as it is now.

148. With regard to the transfer of the tickets, would there be any advantage in the original pawner endorsing his name on the ticket, and the subsequent holders of the ticket doing the same, till it came into your hands?—I do not think it would be, because it could be done by the purchaser himself, and the pawnbroker would not know whether the signature was genuine or not.

149. Do you think there are many instances in which pawnbrokers accept the pledge, although the party pawning the goods does not accept the ticket?—I do not.

150. Mr. M. Guest.] You want to raise the first scale of entries in the book to 10 s., do you not?—Yes.

151. What is the object of doing that?—To simplify the labour.

152. Why would it not be as good at 5 s.; do you not get a better article in for 10 s.?—I am simply referring to this clause, and saying that it would be more convenient to pawnbrokers to have only two books instead of three books.

153. Then why not begin at 5 s., instead of 10 s.?—That is, as it exists now, and the division is proper, because those under 10 s. can be sold retail, while those above must be sold by auction.

154. Do you not want a change to 10 s.?—No. I contend that the book for pledges of 10 s. and under 10 s. should be one, and that the book for pledges above 10 s. should be another, instead of having another division at 5 s. The number of pledges from 5 s. to 10 s. is limited.

155. Mr. Charley.] I think you stated that the practice in town and country is different, and that in the town there are three books, and in the country two?—I believe that is correct.

156. Do pawnbrokers consider they are bound by this section to provide three books?—Yes.

157. It does not seem so from the language of the section; the only difference seems to be with regard regard to the time at which the entry is to be made; in the one case it is to be made forthwith, and in the other case within four hours; but it seems to be the same book; is not that so?—It is the custom to use three books in London, known as "Low," "Medium," and "Auction," as we call them. The "medium" pledges are those from 5 s. to 10 s., the "low" pledges are under 5 s., and the "auctions" above 10 s.

158. Mr. C. H. Mills.] But that is an arrangement of your own. Surely it is not according to your Act, is it?—I think it is understood that they shall be entered in three books; it is more convenient however, in consequence of the entries being at different times.

159. Mr. Charley.] The language of the Act is, "All and every person and persons who, from and after the commencement of this Act, shall take by way of pawn or pledge any goods or chattels whereon shall be lent any sum of money exceeding 5 s., shall forthwith enter or cause to be entered in a book or books to be kept for that purpose, a description of the goods and chattels," and so forth. Then it states, that "in all cases where the money lent on any such goods or chattels shall not exceed the sum of 5 s., such entry shall be made in such book or books by all and every such person and persons so taking the same by way of pawn, pledge, or exchange as aforesaid within four hours." "Such book" evidently means the same book as that in which the sums lent exceeding 5 s. are entered. Then the Act states that pledges above 10 s. shall be entered in a book separate from all the other pledges?—At any rate the four hours seem to be unnecessary in connection with that.

160. It is not so stringent as the other part of the clause, which says "forthwith"?—"At any time during the same day that the pledge was received," would answer every purpose in my opinion.

161. Chairman.] It does not seem to be very clear that you shall have a separate book by the Act of Parliament, but it is the practice, is it?—It is the practice in London, but very little in the country; I have known it to be carried out in the country.

162. Have you any observations to make upon the subsequent clauses of the Act, 9 & 10 Vict.?—Nothing further than that we think that they require simplification and modernising; for instance, in the 8th clause a person unlawfully pawning goods shall be liable to be publicly whipped. We think that all the clauses, up to 15, require amendment and simplification.

163. Have you anything to observe upon clause 16?—Clause 16 relates to delivering a copy of the note or memorandum, when lost, or, as it is known to us, giving a declaration to be signed by a magistrate. It is rather confused, and difficult to carry out, and it does not give any protection to the pawnbroker; he is liable for the goods, even after they have been delivered on that declaration, signed by a magistrate. In some parts of the country an alteration would be very desirable, where the pledger has not the convenience to get the declaration signed at once. In large towns, of course, that is not the case, but in the country towns, where magistrates do not sit daily, it is a very difficult matter to get a declaration signed in time to get the goods, especially if the ticket is lost on a Saturday. Of course, we have no interest whatever in this clause, further than that it should be fairly and properly drawn. The charge for signing declarations in some towns, I know, is excessive; in some towns it is 1 s., whatever the amount lent; but in Liverpool the charge is 2 d.; in some towns there is no charge made at all; there is no regulation whatever as to the charge to be made upon signing by the magistrate.

164. Are you not bound to deliver the goods to the right owner, notwithstanding that you deliver them under declaration?—It has been so ruled in several cases before magistrates, where the real owner still held the note.

165. Then you have an interest in seeing that the declaration is proper, have you not?—In that respect we have; we think it ought to absolve the pawnbroker from further liability, provided he has delivered the pledge in pursuance to a declaration signed by a magistrate.

166. If the magistrate makes an order for the delivery of the pledge, you think that the pawnbroker should be absolved from liability?—Certainly he ought. The Act states that, at the request and application of any person or persons who shall represent himself, herself, or themselves as the owner or owners of the goods, the pawnbroker shall be obliged to deliver a copy of the note; therefore they get it signed, and redeem the pledge; and still if the original pledger brings the original ticket the pawnbroker is still liable.

167. You mean that, notwithstanding you have acted under clause 16, still clause 15 would override clause 16, and make you liable?—It has been held to do so, where the note had not been lost, mislaid, or destroyed."

168. Have you any notice given to you when an application is made to a magistrate for a declaration?—The person applying for the declaration goes to the pawnbroker for a copy of the original duplicate taken from the books, which it is the pawnbroker's duty to give. It is a printed form, which all pawnbrokers keep.

169. Can he obtain that on simply informing the pawnbroker that he has lost his ticket?—He must describe the day, the article, the amount lent, and the name it was pledged in.

170. Mr. T. Hughes.] Have you a copy of the pawn-tickets?—Yes; I will hand in a copy of the pawn-tickets: pawn-tickets vary very much in different towns, according to custom and fancy.

171. Mr. Charley.] What is the difference between the 12th and 13th sections?—The one is, that the pawnbroker is to produce the goods; and the other is, giving the power to police officers to search warehouses for the goods.

172. Mr. Whitwell.] Can you refer me to any case where it has been ruled that a pawnbroker, having discharged his liability under a certificate declared before a magistrate, has to repay under the production of the original duplicate?—There was such a case, within only a few months, at Liverpool.

173. Can you give me the case?—Yes.

174. Where was it reported?—It was only in the magistrate's court. It was a gold watch, pledged for 4 l., and the original pledger went to the pawnbroker and stated, "I have lost the ticket of the watch; please put a stop-ticket upon it." That is giving notice in reality. The pawnbroker did so; and some time after that a person came with the ticket and stated that she was the purchaser of the ticket, and that it was not to be given up to anybody but herself. The twelvemonths expired, and the original pledger then presenting herself, demanded a declaration, which the pawnbroker, according to this Act, was bound to give. The declaration was given, signed by the magistrate, and the watch redeemed. A few days after that the holder of the ticket applied, and of course the watch had gone, and the pawnbroker could not deliver it to her. A summons was taken out, and the magistrate ordered that the pawnbroker must pay the value of the watch.

175. Mr. M. Guest.] Would that be the general rule?—I think so, in most cases. The magistrate thought that the pawnbroker knew that the ticket was in existence; but we are not clear that it was shown to the same assistant that made out the declaration.

176. Chairman.] The pawnbroker is responsible for all his assistants, is he not?—No doubt. Upwards of 12 months had expired since the transaction, and it is very difficult to remember so far back.

177. Then the magistrate held, however, that the pawnbroker had not got the benefit of clause 15, because he had been guilty of negligence?—That was so.

178. Mr. M. Guest.] If a robbery was committed on your premises, would you be liable for the goods stolen if the tickets were brought to you?—Not if proper care had been taken.

179. Chairman.] Do you know of any case where the pawnbroker, no kind of negligence being attributable to him, was held liable to deliver the goods notwithstanding that he had given the pledge over again, under the latter part of clause 16, which provides, that "Whereupon the pawnbroker shall suffer the person or persons proving such property to the satisfaction of such justice as aforesaid, and making such affidavit or affirmation as aforesaid, on leaving the said copy of the said note or memorandum, and the said affidavit or affirmation with the said pawnbroker, to redeem such goods or chattels?" —I believe I am correct in stating that it has been done, but I cannot recall any special case at present.

180. Mr. Whitwell.] If you ask the Committee to alter clause 16, I think you will have to cite some instances which will show that it is necessary to alter it?—Probably we may be able to do so.

181. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] There is no hardship; there is nothing under either of these clauses to make you accountable for the goods, is there, unless there is negligence?—No.

182. Chairman.] Has your attention been called to the latter part of clause 15, which requires that the pawnbroker shall only be indemnified where the real owner has been the person who makes the declaration signed by a magistrate?—Yes; in large towns the magistate never sees the person applying; it is the custom for an official to take them in altogether, 50 or 100 at a time, without any inquiry, and they are signed with the initials; in some cases great inconvenience has arisen by the magistrate's signature having been forged; we think that it ought to be a rule also that at any police office some distinguishing stamp should be used. Very frequently the magistrate only signs his initial across the declaration, and we have no proof, unless we happen to be perfectly acquainted with those initials, whether they are genuine or not; I have known cases where they have been forged.

183. Are we to understand from you, that the magistrates do not hold themselves bound to sign under the clause to authenticate the declaration?—I think so.

184. Have you any observation to make on clause 17?—Yes; this introduces another portion of the subject. The 17th clause defines the time of forfeiture, and states that all goods shall be forfeited within one year from the date of the pledging. This we desire to have shortened, especially with a certain class of goods, such as wearing apparel, and others, which suffer very much, at the present time, by being kept so long as one year. We have asked that the time should be shortened to six months. It is strongly recommended by Dr. Hancock in his report upon the Irish law of pawnbrokers, and he even goes further than we do, by saying that some pledges should be kept no longer than three months; but we think that an uniform term of forfeiture, such as six months, would be much more convenient, and it would be no hardship upon the pledger, because there would be only half the interest to pay to renew that pledge for another six months; it would be a very great advantage to the pawnbroker and in auction pledges also to the pledger, as in that case the goods would fetch very much more after six months than they would after 12 months. I am speaking now of the pledges referred to in the latter portion of this clause which are above 10*s.*, and which are directed to be sold by auction. It will be seen further on in the Act that the pawnbroker is bound to pay the overplus on all those goods if it is applied for. Our experience proves that at the end of 12 months the goods become very much deteriorated. We think that the materials used in the manufacture are probably not of the same quality as they were when this Act was passed in 1800. We suffer very much more from moths than we used to do; and I expect, from the same cause, that deleterions materials are used in the manufacture of goods.

185. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not rather the change of fashion?—In a very great measure we suffer from that also. The rapidity of the change of fashion, of course, is very much greater than when the Act was passed.

186. Would you not wish that to apply to pledges below 10*s.*, as well as above 10*s.*?—Yes; for all pledges an uniform period of forfeiture.

187. Chairman.] Do we understand you that the Irish Act limits the time to six months?—The time in Ireland for all pledges not exceeding 20 s., is six months, over 20 s. and not exceeding 40 s., 9 months, and over that amount, 12 months. Dr. Hancock recommends a shorter period of forfeiture, and that all goods under a certain price should be kept only three months.

188. To what amount does he recommend that pledges should be kept only for three months?—I think Dr. Hancock refers only to 40*s.* In his report he says, that "The periods for which pawnbrokers are required to keep pledges previous to sale, are for a large class of pawn too long. "That a period of three months for loans under 40 s., and six months for all loans above 40*s.* should be fixed as the implied period for which pledges are to be kept, in all cases where no other time was fixed by express contract."

189. Is it your recommendation to the Committee that there should be one uniform term of six months for all pledges?—Yes. We think that different periods would lead to much confusion in the minds of the pledgers.

190. What is your view of clause 19 of the Act?—

Act?—We think that that clause ought to be repealed, because it confers no benefit upon the pledger. It adds to the difficulty of clause 17, by obliging the pawnbroker to keep his goods 15 months instead of 12 months; and our experience shows, and we will prove that while not more than from five to ten per cent. of the ordinary pledges are forfeited in 12 months, no less than 40 per cent. of the pledges which have to be kept the other three months become forfeited; that shows that it is merely putting off the evil day of payment, and that when the time comes, the accumulations of interest are so great that the goods become forfeited.

191. What is the proportion of the whole quantity of goods which are forfeited at the end of 12 months?—It varies from five to ten per cent. Some few years ago it averaged about 4½ per cent.; but of late years it has increased very much.

192. Are all the rest redeemed within the time?—All the rest are redeemed within the time.

193. Then do you receive many notices under this clause?—Not in comparison with the number of pledges received.

194. But with the number about to be forfeited?—Yes.

195. What proportion of them?—I am not prepared to say what proportion, but it is considerable.

196. Colonel Beresford.] Are five per cent. of the people who pledge goods aware of that provision as to the three months?—Yes; it is very well known.

197. Chairman.] Can you give us an idea of the number of persons whose pledges would be forfeited at the end of 12 months who give notices; is it many or few?—A great many in proportion to the number of pledges absolutely forfeited.

198. Mr. Alderman Carter.] It would be about 60 per cent., would it not; you do not know how many are "backed," as you call it, out of the whole number?—No; I have no doubt that some of our witnesses will be able to prove it.

199. Colonel Beresford.] Do you propose to reduce the time to six months, and not get the three months additional?—Yes.

200. Chairman.] Have those clauses any effect with your dealings as fixing the money which you can advance upon goods?—They have.

201. Would you be able to advance more money upon goods if the time were shorter, and you were not liable to that three months notice? Very much so, more especially with the six months forfeiture, because the goods would be forfeited at a time when they were more saleable. For instance, it is the custom to pledge all winter goods at the end of the winter, that is to say, in March or April, and those goods would become forfeited in the following October or November, just in the beginning of winter when they might be required; whereas if they are not forfeited until the following spring, they are frequently not redeemed, but have to be kept another three months, and then when they become forfeited, they are for sale at the wrong season.

202. Then do you think that it would give greater facilities to the pledger as well as the pawnbroker if this long period were altered?—I do.

203. Something like 80 per cent. of the whole pledges taken in, are redeemed within the first three months?—Yes.

13 June 1870.

204. Chairman.] Is there much distinction between large and small pledges in regard to redemption, that is to say, are the small pledges chiefly forfeited, or the large ones?—I cannot state the proportion.

205. In a general way what is the tendency?—The number of small pledges taken in is so much greater than that of the high class of pledges, that I could hardly give the proportions.

206. Mr. Hambro.] The clause says that when the sales take place, they shall be duly advertized in the newspapers at certain times; is that usually done?—It is done in all large towns, but I cannot answer for small ones.

207. In what papers is it generally advertized?—In the daily papers; in Liverpool generally in the "Mercury" on a Friday.

208. The pawnbroker is obliged to pay the overplus on articles which sell for more than they are pledged for; is that overplus often asked for?—Not very often; and more frequently there is no overplus to pay, if it were applied for.

209. Chairman.] In the advertizement do they attend to the direction that the month of the pledge shall be stated?—In the catalogue they do. The advertizement is worded generally that they are pledged prior to such a date.

210. Mr. Hambro.] Is the "Pawnbrokers Gazette" published for general information, or is it exclusively confined to the trade?—It is for subscribers, it is not interesting to anyone but the trade.

211. Is it a paper which the public can buy?—I suppose it is; it is 3*d.* a copy; I suppose it can be obtained.

212. I ask the question because I have experienced considerable difficulty in getting it myself?—I do not know about that; the editor is present now.

213. Chairman.] The clause states that, "An advertisement giving notice of such sale, and containing the name or names, and place of abode of the pawnbroker or pawnbrokers with whom the said goods or chattels were in pledge, and also the month such goods were received in pawn, is to be inserted on two several days in some public newspaper;" is that inserted in the advertisement?—No, except generally, in this way; that if the goods were to be sold on the 25th June, say by myself, it would run thus: "Alfred Hardaker, 25, Prescott-street, goods pledged on or before the 26th June 1869."

214. That would not be a compliance with the Act, would it?—I do not think it would be possible to carry out all the provisions of section 17.

215. Have you a notice of sale, and also a copy of one of your catalogues?—I have not one at present, but we will furnish copies of them to the Committee.

216. Mr. Charley.] Have penalties often been recovered for not inserting those advertisements?—I have never heard of any.

217. Would not the goods be forfeited at a bad season of the year, if they were forfeited at the end of the six months?—No, they would be forfeited just at the right season; because when the goods are done with for a certain season, then is the time they are pledged. For instance, the goods used for winter, such as heavy shawls and over-coats, and that class of thing, are pledged in March or April; and the lighter class of goods are either redeemed, or new ones are purchased. To the pawnbroker those goods are forfeited at the beginning of the summer, when he cannot sell them, and he has to keep them 18 months before they are profitable, instead of six months.

218. Colonel Beresford.] Do you propose to reduce the time to six months as regards all classes of pledgers?—Yes.

219. Including the working people?—Yes.

220. Are you prepared to assert that that would not be in numberless cases something little short of sheer confiscation of the property?—Confiscation of the property is not known in our trade, because we are always liable for the overplus, above 10*s.*; and all pledges may be renewed.

221. What per-centage of goods remain up to the 12 months?—From 5 to 10 per cent.

222. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I think you have said that a very large proportion was redeemed before three months?—Yes, 80 per cent.

223. Mr. Orr Ewing.] What is the per-centage redeemed within one month?—I am not prepared to say. It is a very large proportion.

224. Could you ascertain how much it is?—I can ascertain, but I have not it with me at present.

225. What is the per-centage redeemed within one week?—I cannot state that.

226. It is very large?—It is very large in some businesses, in what are called weekly trades, where the goods are pledged on the Monday and redeemed on the Saturday.

227. Can you give the per-centage for three months, two months, one month, and one week?—Yes; I can prepare it.

228. If it be the case that so large a per-centage is redeemed in so short a time, how can you make it out to be so essential that you should be able to sell the property in six months?—Because we think it unnecessary for the very small number left to have them on our hands so long.

229. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is not the principal argument this: that if you keep them for 12 months you have to sell them when they are of little value; that the winter goods you have to sell at the beginning of summer, and the summer goods at the beginning of winter?—Yes.

230. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Is it really the case that pledges are made with pawnbrokers according to the seasons in that way; or is not rather according to the necessities of the people, which may arise at any season of the year?—Yes; but at the same time a person pledging as a rule pledges what he can best do without.

231. Sometimes they pledge everything which they have, do they not?—I am not aware of that.

232. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not a usual thing for you to have the winter goods at the end of the winter left with you all the summer?—Yes, and vice versâ.

233. Colonel Beresford.] What do you mean by "fashions;" have you fashionable people coming to you to pledge goods?—Very much more than was the case 15 or 20 years ago; the very poorest people now purchase fashionable and flimsy articles to wear.

234. Then is your judgment, or is the judgment of the people whom you employ about these things, so bad, that you advance more money than they will realize at the end of 12 months?—It is partly owing to the want of judgment amongst the assistants, and partly owing to the keen competition.

235. And you want a good deal more competition under the Bill, I believe?—I am not aware that we want more competition, but we want better paying for what we do, that is our great object.

236. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I suppose you would not object to more competition if you were better paid?—If I were able to fight competition fairly and honestly I should not object to any amount of it.

237. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Why do you say that you are not able to fight competition fairly and honestly?—Because the man who thinks proper to evade the law can take whatever profit he likes, and if I want to respect it I cannot get a living.

238. Chairman.] Do you mean that the law is so stringent that the men who adhere to it cannot get on unless they do as other people do who carry on business without regard to the law?—Yes; I think we shall be able to show you that by the statements of witnesses who will prove the very small per centage of profits which they make on very large capitals.

239. Mr. Whitwell.] Is the pawnbroker liable for any deterioration caused by his negligence in the value of the pledges?—If negligence can be proved, but not otherwise.

240. Has any case ever been proved?—I have known a case of robbery where negligence was proved by the pawnbroker having a lock-up shop and not living on the premises.

241. Do you know any case where wearing apparel or furniture having been damaged while in the keeping of a pawnbroker the pledger has received compensation?—Yes, where goods have been broken while in a pawnbroker's custody; in the case of pictures, looking-glasses, and things of that kind I have known compensation awarded to the pledger, because the damage has been held to be caused by carelessness on the part of the pawnbroker or his assistants; but for damage by moth or fire, over which the pawnbroker has no control, he is not liable.

242. Is it not the fact that from the system of storage adopted by the pawnbroker, the goods deteriorate in value the longer they are kept?—They do to some extent.

243. Chairman.] Are you satisfied with clause 18, which directs that some goods shall be sold separately from others at particular seasons of the year?—This clause is strictly adhered to, I believe, in London, but in the country it is not carried out. It refers to what may be called "fine art pledges," and they are so very few and rare in country towns, that pawnbrokers sell what few they have, by auction, with the other class of goods as under clause 17.

244. They are not sufficient to make a separate auction, as provided by this Act?—That is so; a country pawnbroker might not have an article of this kind more than twice or three times in the year.

245. Mr. M. Guest.] I suppose they are generally over the value of 10*l.*?—No doubt. Then he can sell them as he pleases. In London this class of goods abounds, of course, to a greater extent, such as books, bronzes, statues, busts, carvings in ivory, and so on, and musical and mathematical instruments; country pawnbrokers in many instances know very little about such things as those; but still, if they happen to have an article of that kind forfeited, it must, according to this clause, be sold by auction on a particular day.

246. Mr. Hambro.] May it be sent to London to o be sold, or must it be sold in the country own?—It might be sent to London, I believe.

247. Chairman.] I suppose that adds considerably to the expense if they have to send it o London?—Yes.

248. Do you propose that this should be entirely repealed?—I think that there is little necessity for it, and that clause 17 would answer ll purposes, where the goods should be sold by auction, properly placed on view, and advertised.

249. Then you anticipate clause 19; have you any observations to make upon clause 20?—Clause 20 refers to the booking of the goods sold and the payment of overplus; we have no objection to that, except that the time allowed for the application for overplus we think is extreme; it gives a term of three years after the date of the sale, and, consequently, keeps a pawnbroker's books open for all that time.

250. But why should you keep money which does not belong to you six years; six years is the limit by ordinary law within which a person may claim a debt; are those amounts of overplus very numerous?—The whole of the goods sold have to be entered in a book, and kept ready for an application, which can be made at any time within the three years; therefore the account referring to any particular sale is kept open for that time.

251. If it were not for this provision you would be liable under the ordinary law, would you not, for six years?—Yes, I suppose we should; I am merely expressing the opinion of a large number of our trade in some country towns, who think this rather a hardship.

252. If you are bound to keep the books at all, what does it matter whether you keep them one year or three years; you would not destroy them, would you, at the end of the year?—No, but it would define the term of the liability.

253. But the liability is defined at once; immediately after the sale you are liable to pay the person the money, are you not?—Yes, and at any time within three years.

254. The liability is clear and fixed, is it not?—Yes.

255. And the books must necessarily be kept for that period?—Yes.

256. Your liability being fixed, what harm is there in your keeping the books three years?—It is not the keeping of the books, but it is the liability to pay the overplus for so long a period that we object to.

257. But by the ordinary law any person holding money is liable for six years to repay it, is he not?—I believe so, but I am not quite sure how that would be under the Statute of Limitations.

258. Then you have the advantage of a shorter period, have you not?—Yes.

259. Colonel Beresford.] Have you found that any of your customers would be glad to have that time reduced?—I do not know.

260. Chairman.] Do many people, in point of fact, come to inquire into the account after 12 months after the sale?—It is not general in the country, with the exception of times when perhaps the papers have drawn attention to it, or something of that sort. There was very recently an article in one of the daily papers in London, drawing attention to that fact, which caused a great many applications to be made to the pawnbrokers, but not much to the enrichment of the pledgers.

261. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] Does any considerable portion of the profit of a pawnbroking business arise from the unclaimed overplusses?—No, nor upon the sale at all.

262. Have you any record showing what proportion of overplusses accrue in the course of a year?—Yes; the next witness will produce his book.

263. Will he be able to show the proportion of unclaimed overplusses?—Yes, and the exact price of every article.

264. Chairman.] Have you any observation to make as to clause 21?—As to the second portion of it, with regard to pledges being taken from children, it has been varied. In the Act it is 12 years of age; in London and Liverpool by local Acts it has been made "apparently under" 16, which I perfectly agree with, but in manufacturing towns it would be considered a great hardship if it was made 16 years, because I have heard that it is the custom, in Glasgow, for instance, that children are sent by their parents while they themselves are engaged at the factories. I have no evidence to offer upon that point beyond the experience of different witnesses from different parts of the country. For myself I am quite satisfied with the 16 years, and I believe the whole of the London trade are also; the latter portion of the section referring to the times at which pledges shall be received, has been amended, and the time has been fixed in the winter from eight o'clock in the morning to seven in the evening, and in the summer months from seven in the morning to eight in the evening; that has been found to work rather unsatisfactorily, because it is influenced by local customs and local circumstances. In Manchester, for instance, it is the custom to open at a very early hour on a Monday morning; I believe as early as six o'clock, but it is also their custom to close at six every evening in the week, with the exception of Saturdays, and on Fridays at one o'clock in the afternoon for a-half holiday; all that of course is contrary to the Act of Parliament.

265. Do you think that there ought to be any liberty to alter those periods, or should they still be regulated by Act of Parliament?—I think myself that it is a matter that might be left entirely to be regulated by the requirements of certain localities. I see no reason why the hours at which business should be done, should be regulated for pawnbrokers more than for any other trade; I can understand that at the time when this Act was passed, probably the pawnbrokers were a different class of men from what they are now, and it might have been intended as a preventive and protection against receiving stolen property, but I am quite sure that such a thing cannot apply now.

266. Then would you have no limit at all, so that a pawnbroker might keep open till 12 o'clock?—As I have instanced in Manchester, they are not likely to do so. In Liverpool our hour is seven all the year round; the customs are different in different towns.

267. Mr. Whitwell.] Would you make it permissive to town councils to regulate the time for opening and closing, making pawnbrokers for all other things subject to the general law?—I think it is a subject which might safely be left open entirely; I do not think that pawnbrokers could abuse a matter of this kind; it is a freedom which is extended to every other trade with the exception of pawnbrokers, and I am quite convinced, convinced, from my own experience, that there is no occasion to limit the hours at all.

268. Mr. Orr Ewing.] If a pawnbroker thought proper to keep his business open all night, you think the authorities should have no power of preventing it?—I do not think it likely that he would require to do so.

269. But if he did require it, what then?—I can see no harm which can arise from that unless a pawnbroker was going to do an illegal trade.

270. You have already stated, have you not, that some members of the profession do not obey the law at present?—Yes.

271. May not those very same parties abuse the law if they are not restricted?—I do not think so; this is a matter of convenience more than gain, or they might now exceed the hours allowed by law, which they do not: indeed the hours are generally shorter than required by this section.

272. Chairman.] Does the early closing give any facility to giving notices by the police to the pawnbrokers of robberies?—The notices are generally delivered the first thing on the following morning.

273. Is there not a facility given by the pawnbrokers, all having closed comparatively early the evening before?—I do not think so.

274. Supposing that they were closed at 11 or 12 o'clock at night, the notices next morning would be of little use, would they not?—Probably so, if pawnbrokers did largely receive stolen goods; but it is the custom now to keep open till 11 o'clock on Saturday night, and I am not aware that it produces any ill effects.

275. Mr. M. Guest.] Do you mean for taking pledges in, or for getting pledges out?—Both taking pledges out and pledging.

276. I suppose the object of the Act was that pledges might be redeemed on a Saturday night at 11 o'clock?—No doubt.

277. Mr. Charley.] Are prosecutions, under this section of the Act, frequent?—I never knew any to arise.

278. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you see any reason to alter the age, from 16 to 12, in Liverpool?—Not at all; I should not recommend it.

279. Would you recommend that 16 should be the age for other towns?—Personally I should, but I do not know how it might affect certain towns.

280. Mr. Charley.] It is 16 in the Metropolitan Police Districts, and in the City of London, is it not?—Yes, it is.

281. Chairman.] Have you any objection to offer to the 22nd clause?—No further than that I think that it is not of much use at present, because a detailed table of the rate of profit cannot be placed in view.

282. Are there any other clauses in this Act to which you wish to call the attention of the Committee?—I think not. There is nothing that I am at all interested in. The other matters are more for the consideration of legal gentlemen.

283. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Does the law which regulates pawnbroking apply to Scotland?—Yes.

284. You are not obliged to keep a record of property upon which you advance above 10*l.*, are you?—No; that is not pawnbroking.

285. Colonel Beresford.] You say that the 22nd clause is not complied with, do you not?—It is not complied with, so far as the country is concerned; but when it is complied with, it is of no use; because the rate which is generally shown is the rate consisting in the 10 sections of clause 2, giving the rate to be paid, on equal half-crowns.

286. Chairman.] You would be bound to affix your notice exactly in accordance with clause 2 of the Act, which nobody would be able to understand?—Yes; if it was carried out in the fractions. I think the placing of the rate of interest upon the tickets when issued would be a very much better means than this of preventing overcharge, as I have before stated.

287. Have you anything to observe upon the subsequent Acts which have been passed beyond what you have already stated?—I have not.

288. Do all pawnbrokers transact business independently of the Acts of Parliament, by advancing money on goods beyond 10*l.*?—Pawnbrokers of large capital do.

289. Do they all, as a rule, transact business beyond the Pawnbrokers' Acts?—Only those who possess a large capital, which enables them to do so.

290. Is that a numerous class?—In London it is a numerous class, but in the country it is not so numerous. Pawnbrokers have smaller capital generally in the country towns.

291. Do you yourself transact business beyond 10*l.*?—Yes.

292. Are you there perfectly free to do just as you please?—Yes, as to the time to which the pledge may be kept, and the charge which I please to make.

293. Do you transact business then as an ordinary person, lending money on goods?—I do.

294. Is any difficulty experienced in transacting that business, from the want of an Act of Parliament?—None whatever; and it is done under special agreement, properly signed and stamped.

295. Does the agreement prescribe all the conditions of redemption, sale, and so forth?—It does.

296. Have you the form of agreement which you use?—I have not got the form of the one which I use myself, but I have two forms which have been sent to me by a printer, because I happened to require some, and he sent me these to select a pattern from (producing Papers). We can get copies of the London agreements from most of the gentlemen who will give evidence.

297. Mr. Whitwell.] Do you approve of these agreements which you have produced?—I scarcely do; I should make some alteration in them.

298. Colonel Beresford.] Have you any objection to state what may be the average interest you charge in that way on sums over 10*l.*?—About 20 per cent.; or 10 per cent., if they get to a large amount.

299. Chairman.] You have spoken a good deal about the business of a pawnbroker being unprofitable; do you mean that the business taken as a whole is unprofitable, or that particular parts of the business under particular sections of the Act are unprofitable?—The whole of the business done under the Act of Parliament we refer to as being unprofitable. The greater portion of it is the class known as "low pledges," and the pledges which are redeemed within the shortest time, and by which we are supposed to make the most money.

300. Do you consider that that is unprofitable?—Yes.

301. Then what is the part of the business which is sufficiently profitable to compensate for the the unprofitable part of it, so as to make it worth conducting as a whole?—The great profit arises from a pawnbroker's sale stock, which is not confined to forfeited pledges. Mr. Dicker will be able to show you that while on his sale stock he makes something like 28 per cent. gross, it is reduced to about 6 per cent. on his pawnbroking capital.

302. Do you mean that he conducts an independent business?—Yes; in plate, jewellery, watches, and fancy goods.

303. Do many pawnbrokers supplement their regular pawnbroking business by dealing with several commodities?—Yes, it is the custom.

304. When you speak of the business as not being profitable, what do you consider is the rate of profit which would be a profitable return?—We think that something like the Irish rate would repay us.

305. But do you mean that you carry on your business absolutely at a loss, or that you do not obtain such a per-centage of profit as a man of business ought to obtain?—Not absolutely at a loss, but a very small per-centage.

306. Can you give the Committee any idea of the net return on the capital employed?—I am not prepared with any figures of my own, but other witnesses will be able to show it, as they have been going over their books for a very long period.

307. Speaking for yourself, do you consider that the pawnbroking business which you carry on does not yield you a large profit?—A very small profit on the capital employed and the labour required.

308. Have you to make good many losses from receiving pledges that are stolen property, or otherwise, that you have to return?—No; very few.

309. Is that generally the case in your district?—Yes.

310. Is it your view, that if you had those reliefs for which you have asked, and ordinary freedom of contract, you would be able to conduct the business at a profit?—We think so.

311. Do you think that these extra claims which you would be entitled to make would be such as to diminish the disposition of people to pledge goods?—That I cannot say; it might be so.

312. Might it not decrease your business, in consequence of the higher charge?—Probably it might.

313. Do you think that at present the rate is such as to encourage or discourage the pledging of goods?—I do not think the rate has any influence upon that whatever.

314. Do you mean that people pledge entirely according to the emergencies of their position, without regard to what they pay?—Yes; we have frequently cases where larger profits are offered to us if we will take certain classes of goods which we cannot take; and frequently larger profits are offered if we will make larger advances on goods on a sudden emergency. There are cases where a doctor is called in suddenly, and a fee has to be paid, probably a guinea. The articles may be worth only 15*s.* to lend upon, and we have frequently offers of larger profit if we will lend a guinea; but we cannot do that, because the Act of Parliament prevents us.

315. Do you think that pawnbrokers would be disposed to adhere more closely to the value of the goods, if they had the rates which you propose?—I think so; I think competition would regulate that.

316. You think it would be a great advantage to persons pledging?—Yes. There is a class of low pledges which pawnbrokers cannot take, or will not take, because of the small remuneration, and the people go to what are called "leaving shops" or "dolly shops" in England, and "wee pawns" in Scotland.

317. In your district, are there many of those "leaving-shops"?—I have heard so from the police, but I am not aware of them. They carry on their business of course very secretly, being unlicensed.

318. Do you think that they are resorted to to any great extent?—I do.

319. Do you think that those people would come to pawnbrokers, if they could be dealt with under the alterations that you propose?—I do.

320. Mr. Ridley.] Should you say that it is the general rule of the trade that pawnbrokers have other business to rely upon besides pawnbroking business proper?—Not to rely upon. The pawnbrokers' profits are helped by the sale trade.

321. Do pawnbrokers confine themselves to that trade pure and simple, or is the greater part of the business done by men who supplement their business by ordinary trade?—By men who supplement their business by sale shops in large towns, where the sales can be done.

322. Colonel Beresford.] Is there any single case in which the minimum interest which you get is less than 20 per cent. per annum under 10*s.*?—Yes, all pledges redeemed within one month only pay one-twelfth of 20 per cent. per annum.

323. In the case of those articles which are pledged with you every week in the year, taking a sixpenny article, what does that cost in the course of the year?—The labour required to take in that pledge is more than the profit which accrues from the pledge.

324. I suppose that you have hundreds and thousands of cases of sixpenny articles pawned every week in the year, taking the country throughout?—No; it is exceptional.

325. It comes to between 2*s.* and 3*s.* in the year for 6*d.*, does it not?—That is the exception.

326. Do not men pawn the same thing every Monday, as sure as the week comes round, and take it out on the Saturday?—They do; but if you take the profit upon the transaction it is not excessive, considering the labour there is to do.

327. Mr. M. Guest.] But you get 100 per cent. upon it, do you not?—It is not a per centage at all; it is only very bad pay for so much work done.

328. Colonel Beresford.] It might be on one transaction; but when you have a great number of transactions the profits must be enormous?—No; the larger the number of transactions the larger must be the staff to work it; the small pledges are no profit at all.

329. Then why do you take them in?—To keep our assistans employed, and to keep capital employed; besides, we can never say how long a pledge may remain.

329.* And yet you complain of the labour?—Very properly so.

330. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you charge anything for the ticket for 6*d.*?—Not generally; it is the custom in the trade not to charge for tickets under 1*s.*, though we are empowered by the Act to do so.

Mr. A. Hardaker. 13 June 1870.

331. If you did not charge anything for the ticket, what would you receive for a sixpenny pledge if it was taken out, say, in the course of the week?—One halfpenny.

332. For that you would have to take in the goods, value them, make out the ticket of the duplicates, and then attend to the customer when he came back?—Yes; and warehouse the pledge in the meantime.

333. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You keep a day-book, do you not, and that day-book goes on for years?—The day-book does not last for years.

334. Could you provide the Committee with statistics of your business, say for 1869, giving the amount of pledges that you had of 6*d.*, and up to 10*s.*, and all those above 10*s.*?—Yes, it could be done, but it would require a great deal of time to dissect all the pledges as to amounts; I think that in some of the evidence which we have now to submit, the books produced will show the proportion; we have pledge-books in the room now which can be produced.

335. You have stated that your business is not very profitable, but you have not stated what you consider a remunerative per-centage, and we shall not be able, except by ascertaining the extent of your business, to see whether you have a right to complain that it is not profitable?—I have not prepared any statistics with regard to my own business, because, being the secretary to the Pawnbrokers' Reform Association, I have had the whole of the preparation of the evidence in connection with this Committee; I have been engaged upon it for some weeks now, and I am doing the work as honorary secretary. We have no Parliamentary agents employed at all. I have prepared no statistics of my own, but the gentlemen who will give evidence after me have their figures prepared, and have their statistics ready to be produced.

336. Perhaps you would give the Committee the statistics of the trade (which would not be so invidious to you), stating how long each pledge had remained in the possession of the pawnbroker, and the amount of money that has been received since from those poor people?—I do not think that it can be ascertained how much money had been received on particular pledges, or from one particular pledge.

337. But you have averages, as to the per-centage, that are redeemed at the end of three months; and I think that if you have so much information you might make up that table (which would be very interesting) as to the average amount lent upon every pledge?—We shall show the averages by the next witness; his average is 6*s.* 11*d.*

338. I am afraid that we may have a case which is most favourable to the pawnbroking interest, and I think it would be much more satisfactory to the Committee if it were more general?—We have no desire to hide anything from the Committee; we shall place everything at their disposal that we can possibly obtain; but I do not think it is possible to get the average of the amount lent by every pawnbroker in the kingdom. I do not think the pawnbrokers would send me the returns necessary to tabulate it.

339. Have you not the books?—I have not.

340. Could you not get returns from each?—That would be the only course.

341. If they have nothing to conceal, would they object to it?—I do not think so; they might not object to send them to somebody independent of the trade; but they might object to sending them to me, because pawnbrokers are very chary of allowing other members of the trade to know exactly what they are doing.

342. Has not their secretary their confidence?—I rather think he has in public matters, but not so far as to know all they make.

343. If you endeavour to get it, and they refuse it, we can draw our conclusions from that?—If you will be kind enough to waive that until one or two other witnesses have been examined, I think you may change your opinions with regard to it. I do not think that I should get any returns which would be sufficiently reliable. In the first place I cannot get at all the pawnbrokers in Great Britain.

344. Could you do it for Liverpool?—Yes, I could try.

345. Chairman.] What information do you think they would be able or disposed to give, judging from your own experience?—It would take a great deal of time to get the number of pledges received, and the amount lent upon each; the books for the whole year would have to be gone through carefully.

346. Could they give us a classified return of pledges under 10*s.* and above 10*s.*?—Yes, that I could get, I think.

347. And the number in the year, and the total amount lent within the year?—Yes.

348. Could they give us the amount received under the halfpenny provision, and the amount received for interest?—Yes; you will find when you have examined the other witnesses that the ticket fees really amount to a very small portion of the profit after all.

349. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] What is the name of the association of which you are secretary?—The Liverpool Pawnbrokers' Association; and also the Pawnbrokers' Reform Association, which is for the whole of Great Britain.

350. Are you representing both those associations here?—Yes.

351. What are the objects of the Liverpool Pawnbrokers' Association?—They are to defend its members in actions of trover, or actions of that kind, which may be instituted against them on doubtful points of law, but in no case arising from an evasion of the law.

352. Are they not in a position to furnish the information for which we are now inquiring?—We have no power to make them do so.

353. What is the nature of the Reform Association?—It is simply to obtain an alteration in the Act of Parliament.

354. I take it that before they come to Parliament for an alteration in the law, they are fully informed of the grounds upon which they are doing so, and are fully prepared to furnish those grounds to the Committee; will they not be able to furnish this information for which the honourable Member on my right has been inquiring?—The whole of the pawnbrokers may not require the change.

355. But are not the association in possession of that information upon which they are proposing an alteration of the law, and have come to Parliament for an Act?—Not with regard to the statistics of each person's trade.

356. What information can they furnish, if not that?—The evidence of witnesses who are coming forward with information respecting their businesses, and the whole particulars of their businesses, and we can multiply that evidence.

357. You have given a great deal of evidence to-day to-day showing the objections to the working of this Act, which almost appear on the face of the Act itself. It requires very little business experience to see certain objections, at least, which you have pointed out. Is not the Pawnbrokers' Reform Association in a position to show generally, without reference to the Act, the disadvantages of which you complain?—Yes, I think we are.

358. Could it not give us the statistics which the honourable Member has been inquiring about?—We have never applied for them, and we have not them at hand now. We have sought for statistics, but they have not been replied to sufficiently for us to place any reliance upon them.

359. Chairman.] I understand that the Reform Association is a general association representing the pawnbrokers in all parts of the kingdom?—Yes.

360. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] Are you not furnished with statistics from the various pawnbrokers over the country who are members of this association?—No, I am not.

361. Do you not get returns from them as to the operations which they carry on in business?—We have endeavoured to do so.

362. How do you ascertain the grounds of their complaint with regard to their general business?—From their expressed opinions that they are dissatisfied with the working of the Act, and from my own knowledge that it is generally evaded in all towns.

363. But with regard to the smallness of the profits, and the unremunerativeness of the business generally, how did you get that information?—Simply by their having told us so.

364. Upon a general statement?—Upon a general statement.

365. You say that upon the whole business it is unremunerative, but that there are particular parts which are more remunerative than others; how did you get that information as to those particular parts?—From those witnesses who have sent us their evidence, and who are prepared to come and give it here.

366. You have no documentary evidence or statements from the pawnbrokers in different parts, have you?—I have not; I have some statistics which were got together some ten years ago with relation to this business; I do not know whether they would furnish what the honourable Member requires; it is made as to the number of pledges taken in, and the time they have remained in pledge.

367. Have you any means of showing in some tabular form the various sources of profit in the different branches of your business?—Not collectively; the different witnesses could show that.

368. Chairman.] Do you think you could get this information for the Committee: the number, and the total value of pledges under 10*s.*, and the same over 10*s.*, the receipts for fees on tickets, the receipts for interest, the profit and loss on the sale of unredeemed pledges, rent and expenses of establishment, and capital employed?—Yes; I think so.

369. Colonel Beresford.] Do you keep a set of books?—Yes.

370. Do you balance your books every year?—Yes.

371. That is a rule I suppose in the trade generally, is it not?—Yes.

372. Then of course the complaint which you make, that you do not make sufficient profit, is arrived at by your balance of profit and loss for the year?—Yes.

373. Mr. Whitwell.] The honourable Member for Leeds asked you some questions as to those pledges upon which the sum of 6*d.* was advanced, and you endeavoured to show that there was no profit upon that, but a loss; that is to say, that the article taken in has to be ticketed, and placed where it is easily accessible, and entered so as to be brought back again when reclaimed, even at the end of a week. Supposing that a sixpenny advance does not pay, what is the least advance for a weekly re-pledging that would pay?—A pledge that would pay the working expenses, I think, is generally a pledge of 5*s.*; that is the first that begins to pay a pawnbroker.

374. Upon which you would get, how much?—Three halfpence.

375. And you think that no article will pay unless it renders to you the sum of 1½*d.* for service rendered?—Yes, and not in all businesses that amount; because in some businesses the cost of working is much heavier than in others, where the rents and expenses are heavier.

376. Then if a business consisted wholly of goods, which only paid 1½*d.* each pledge, would it pay as a whole?—It would not.

377. Would it pay if you raised that amount to 2*d.*?—It would in some districts.

378. Supposing that a thousand articles were pledged every week on a particular day, what staff would have to be kept up to receive, register, docket, put on shelf, and restore them?—It would require some six or seven hands.

379. Would those be low-priced hands?—There would be a manager, or "First," as he is called, who would receive a good salary, and a "Second," and a "Third," and the rest would be boys.

380. Taking the ordinary class of shops in a large town, what would be the number of pledges of that low character, paying ½*d.*, 1*d.*, and 1½*d.*, that would be received and pledged on Monday, which is the day on which most pledges are received in the week?—I believe from 800 to 1,000.

381. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Does your unremunerative business arise from your small pledges?—Yes, chiefly, except where losses occur on the sales of forfeits.

382. Would you have any objection that the amount should be limited to 2*s.* 6*d.*, below which you should not advance at all?—Personally, I should not.

383. Do you think the trade would object to it?—Yes, and I think the public would.

384. Have you pledged many blankets?—I do not receive many.

385. That is not your line of business, I suppose?—No.

386. Do you pledge bed-clothing?—Nothing but what is perfectly clean.

387. You do not pledge what has been worn?—Nothing.

388. You are, perhaps, in the highest class of the business?—No; my stock is about 5,000*l.*

389. What is the nature of the articles that you take in?—Medium; my pledges would average probably from 5*s.* to 6*s.* each.

390. Do you deal much with the working classes?—Yes; the working classes are the class that pledge under 30*s.* or 40*s.*

391. But you never take bed-clothing?—Yes; but I have not much of it.

392. Do

Mr. A. Hardaker.

13 June 1870.

392. Do you take blamkets?—Yes; when they are clean or new.

393. I suppose that in many towns in England, as well as in Scotland, the number of blankets pledged is something enormous, is it not?—No; I do not think that, taking the position of average working men, they have many blankets to pledge.

394. There are a great many working men who have got them, are there not?—Not in larger quantities than any other articles of clothing.

395. The working classes are very numerous, and therefore one or two blankets pledged for each would be a good many. Would you be surprised if there were 30,000 pairs of blankets pledged in Glasgow?—I should be very much surprised.

396. Do you think that bed-clothing and body clothing should be allowed to be pledged at all?—I do not see that we have any right to object to any security offered if it is the person's own.

397. However much evil effect it may have upon their bodily comfort or health?—We cannot tell that; if it is abused at all, of course we cannot help it.

398. Do you not think that it is the duty of the law to interfere in such a case for the protection of the working classes?—I do not think that any law can make the working classes better than they please to be themselves; I am quite positive that any law attempting to repress pledging under 2*s.* 6*d.* would not have any such effect; it would lead them to be taken to the beerhouses and to the dolly-shops.

399. Mr. M. Guest.] Beerhouses cannot take them by Act of Parliament, can they?—No: but it is well known that a portion of the unlicensed trade is done at those places.

400. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Have you any idea how this money is used that is given for these small pledges?—I know, in my own place, which is within a few doors of a baker's shop, that the money paid out of my shop on a Monday goes, to a very large extent, into his till. We require silver again in change for gold, because we require a good deal of small money; and I get the same money back again, and I know it because it is always floury. The baker says it comes back daily by half-crowns and shillings, as it is paid out of my own shop.

401. When are wages generally paid in Liverpool?—I think, on a Friday night.

402. Then, perhaps, the money for the wages had gone in the way I was indicating, and they come to you to get the money for bread?—The wages are generally disbursed in clothing necessary for Sunday wear; that is, some portions, perhaps, paid to the pawnbroker. The pledge is brought back again on the Monday, and then the money is laid out again for the requirements of the week; to pay the rent, and to buy the necessary flour and bread for the week.

403. The money for the wages is taken to redeem the pledges at the pawnbroker?—Yes; with the exception, of course, of what is required for the Sunday's food, and other necessaries.

404. And it is used on Sunday, and then brought back to you and pledged again?—That is constantly done.

405. Do you think that that is a very wholesome state of matters in the country?—I see no objection to it, if the clothing is of sufficient quality to be taken.

406. Even at the risk of moths eating up the clothes?—That is of course for them to look after; the pawnbroker takes every care he can.

407. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] In what part of the town of Liverpool do you carry on your business?—In Prescot-street, a continuation of London-road, above Moss-street; it is getting out of the town.

408. It is not Victoria-street?—No.

409. Mr. T. Hughes.] It appears to me that your theory leads to this, that it would be better for the Legislature to do nothing at all about pawnbroking; but that if it does, you wish this Act to be amended in the way you have stated?—I think it would be better that the Legislature should re-model and make the business more remunerative to pawnbrokers to take in a lower class of goods, and keep them out of unlicensed shops.

410. I inferred that you thought that no protection whatever should be given to the pledger, and that that would be right?—That is, so far as freedom of contract is concerned.

411. Your position is, if you thought you could get it, that there should be perfect freedom?—Yes; I believe in that principle applied to all trades.

412. But as you cannot get perfect freedom, you have named to the Committee the changes which you wish in that direction?—Certainly.

413. Colonel Beresford.] You mentioned "leaving shops" just now; how is it that they come to get any business; do they charge less than you do?—No, very much more; but it is the only way in which people can realise on a class of security which a pawnbroker will not take.

414. What is the probability that you will get any of that business, if you charge more than you do now?—It does not pay us now to take that class of pledges.

415. Still, you will not get that class of pledges then, will you?—We shall try for it, if it is made remunerative; an article taken to a leaving-shop is, as it were, sold at a certain price for instance, 1*s.* (that is the pretence of doing business), and it is redeemed at the week's end for 1*s.* 6*d.* A pawnbroker would have to keep that article 36 days for a halfpenny; therefore if it is a bulky article, and requires much attention, he refuses it.

416. You stated, in answer to an honourable Member, that a sixpenny article ought to pay, a minimum, 1½*d.* every time it was pledged; are you aware that that comes to 1,300 per cent. a year?—That may be, but it is not a question which has anything to do with per-centage.

417. Of course the 1½*d.* includes the price of the ticket?—Yes; and then it does not pay for the labour bestowed upon it; it is not a per centage upon money at all.

418. You want the law made so as to shut out those people coming to you at all, then, do you?—Unless we can get a rate that will pay us to do the trade; if they did not agree to pay the rate of course the pawnbrokers would not lend money on the articles.

419. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What proportion of your pledges consist of wearing apparel?—A large portion.

420. More than 50 per cent.?—I do not suppose it does consist of more than that in mine but it would be more in some businesses.

421. But as a rule, would 50 per cent. be wearing apparel?—I should think it would.

422. So that if persons were prohibited from pledging wearing apparel it would knock off one-half of the business of pawnbroking?—Yes, and more.

423. Mr. Hambro.] Do you think that the facilities for obtaining money afforded by the pawnbroking system lead to improvidence and drunkenness among the working classes?—I do not think so.

424. Chairman.] Do you know whether in Liverpool it is the practice to deposit things with publicans or beershop keepers to obtain beer?—I have heard so from the police.

425. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] You do not carry on your business in a part of the town where there is a large labouring population, do you?—No, I do not.

13 June 1870.

Mr. JOHN DICKER, called in; and Examined.

426. Chairman.] ARE you a Pawnbroker?—I am.

427. Have you been long engaged in that business?—I have been engaged in the business the whole of my life. I am the son of a pawnbroker, and at a very early age I was put to the business, and I have been a master pawnbroker for about 29 years in London.

428. Are you connected generally with the trade by any occupation?—I am treasurer of the Metropolitan United Pawnbrokers Protection Society, which numbers amongst its members many of the more wealthy and influential of the pawnbroking trade.

429. That has given you a considerable knowledge of the trade, I presume?—It has.

430. What houses of business have you in London?—I have four houses of business; one at Poplar, one at Limehouse, one in Commercial-road East, and another at Clerkenwell.

431. Do you manage any of those houses yourself?—I have the general supervision of them all, but I am assisted by two sons whom I have in the business.

432. Are your sons in charge of the houses?—I have a manager at each house; I have one house managed by a man who has been in the employ of our family for nearly 50 years; I have another who has been in my own employ for 26 years, and another for 17 years.

433. What is the general character of the business conducted in those houses?—They are ordinary working businesses, in which every branch of the trade is represented; the "auction," the "medium," and the "low" trade; the "auction" pledges being those above 10 s., and which if unredeemed have to be sold by auction; the "medium" pledges, those from 5 s. to 10 s., and the "low" pledges under 5 s.

434. Have you a large capital invested in those houses?—I have the statistics connected with one house, and I find that in that house I have 14,000 l. employed, and it is not the largest house that I have.

435. Have you experienced much inconvenience, or any inconvenience, in the conduct of your business, from the stringent state of the law relating to pawnbrokers?—I am most interested in getting the rate of profit altered. My evidence goes principally in that direction; for I think that an Act of Parliament like this, which fixes one rate for all transactions, would be easily understood in any trade, whatever the trade might be, to be both inconvenient and clumsy. A law which ties us to one rate of profit, regardless of the varied risk or trouble involved, must be a bad one, and must work inconveniently. One reason why I desire to get the law altered is because the rate of profit was laid down 70 years ago. Seventy years ago the expenses connected with the pawnbroking business were entirely different from what they are now. When I first came into the business, my father's houses were managed almost entirely by apprentices, but expenses connected with the staff are now very much increased. In addition to that, one's rent and every other thing is altered; and either the profit must have been excessive at the time when the law was adopted, or else the business having grown in one direction, whilst being tied in the other, must have worked unfairly to the trader. Another reason is, that I find that this Act of Parliament leads to evasion; and I have learned that very much more since I have been engaged in this attempt to obtain a reform in pawnbroking. I think that a law is a very bad one indeed which is very generally evaded, or to a very large extent evaded, and I find that to be the case as regards this law. Then I am of opinion that a law in such respects must be very demoralising, if the assistants and the men who are employed in the business have to part with their integrity in order to serve a master. You see that there is an arbitrary standard fixed in the pawnbroking business. It is not like any other man's profit. A pawnbroker can tell whether he goes wrong or not; the law says he may take a penny, and a man who takes a penny farthing, in my opinion, does a social harm; and I am influenced very much by that feeling in trying to get the law altered.

436. Do you disapprove then altogether of the attempt to regulate the profit of the pawnbroker by Statute, or do you think that the mode of regulating it is bad?—I consider that the mode of regulating it is bad; and I feel that the conclusion to which this Committee will come, whatever may be their opinion to start with, is that it will be necessary to allow freedom of contract when a man wants money, and a pawnbroker has money to lend. I think that the rate of profit must be altered and made higher, for the reason that at the present time it does not pay on a large number of transactions; so many as, I am sure, will astonish the Committee. The business does not pay. It is very well to speak of the per-centages; but if one transaction does not pay, multiplying it will not make it pay. I have the whole of my books here, and I make the offer to the Committee to submit them to an accountant, if they think proper, and I am willing to be sworn as to every fact in them.

437. When you speak of having freedom of contract, do you mean that there should be no rate at all fixed by law, or that there should be a rate which should be adopted unless parties contracted to the contrary?—I think that there should be a rate for the sake of convenience, because whatever freedom of contract you may allow, the great bulk of the transactions will be carried on upon some recognised standard. If the law did not set up a standard, the pawnbrokers very soon would do. There would not be any bargaining about the loan as a rule; time is of as much consequence to the pawners as the interest they pay; and a man would want to get a loan in the readiest manner possible. Bargaining over every transaction is a thing which was never contemplated by anybody who has any part in this attempt at reform.

438. Then is it your view that there should be a simple and convenient rate of charge, which should be binding in every contract, unless the parties made a special contract for themselves?—Yes. I am of opinion that the Irish rate, suggested by Mr. Hardaker, is the best, and that the form of contract should be such as to insure the bona fides of it, so that there should be no mere pretence of carrying out a special contract; but that it should be done in a prescribed manner, and not without the signature of the person making the contract.

439. But you think it desirable that the pawnbroker and the person pledging should have the liberty of making any special contract they please, if they choose to do so?—In every instance, if it seemed to their advantage; but my experience tells me that it would not be resorted to, save in the most exceptional cases

440. But you object to a law which compels both parties, being perfectly intelligent people, to deal in a particular way and no other, under a penalty if they deal other?—I do; and speaking not more as a pawnbroker than as one of the public, I am sure that such restrictions as exist, if continued, will produce only harm to the public. The rates, though they were no doubt laid down, in the first instance, to protect the public, are liable to produce just the harm which grew up under the Usury Laws.

441. Then are you of opinion that the Usury Laws having been repealed, as regards the rest of the community, there is no reason why they should not be entirely repealed as regards pawnbrokers?—That is my opinion; I may say that 10 years ago I was in favour of this freedom of contract, and I am sure that it is the only thing that will not lead to an evasion, and that will not do injury by shutting out trade which the public have a right to have done for them.

442. Then you would have a public rate which would take effect whenever there was no special contract?—Whenever there was no special contract.

443. You were going to give us an account of the character of the business; will you now proceed to do so?—In the first place, with regard to the statement that I have laid before the Committee, a pawnbroker's accounts are as simple and as easy to understand as any accounts which possibly can be brought before a Committee. It is the custom of the pawnbroker, at the end of his day's business, to balance the whole of the day's transactions, and he can do this with the same accuracy as a banker can, with the exception that if mistakes are made over the counter there is a discrepancy in the accounts; but those mistakes are not numerous, and, in my experience, they are always against the pawnbroker; he debits his account, in the first instance, with the cash which he leaves off with the night before.

444. It is verified by the cash in the till?—Yes; after which the item met with is the principal sum received during the day; the next item is the interest on that, and the interest on those transactions can be shown by the production of tickets if desired, endorsed, except as to those redeemed within one month. As there is only one month's interest to record on that, it is not thought necessary to endorse it, but of course the balance will show that the correct amount is taken; the following item to that is ticket fees; the next is the cost of sale which forms part of nearly every pawnbroker's business, and lastly the profit on the sale. On the other side the items are the money lent, any goods bought during the day, and the expenses, being the sums of money paid out, while the final item is the cash which he has remaining after the business of the day. Those accounts are kept on a most uniform system I think by the pawnbrokers of London with whom I am most acquainted. The daily balance is then carried into a monthly book, and at the end of the 12 months those accounts are totalled up, and stock is taken. In these books I find the whole of the stock-taking accounts connected with the house upon which I am giving evidence; my anxiety is, that the whole thing shall be laid before the Committee for them to form their own conclusions upon it; I have some accounts of which I have prepared several copies.

445. Will you now give us some statement of the amount of business carried on in the house of which you have spoken?—Yes. (Handing in Statements.)

446. Do I understand that in this shop you buy goods as well as advance upon them?—The goods which are bought in the shop over the counter form a very small item indeed; I prohibit it because of the risk. If a thing by any chance is bought over the counter, although numerous questions would be asked of the person selling, and it happened to be stolen, the difference in value as represented by the person losing it, and what it is really worth in the trade, is so great, that it probably brings a pawnbroker under censure by the magistrates in a very unfair way.

447. Do you confine yourself almost entirely to advancing?—I do; I do a tolerable sale trade for the end of the town where my houses are situated, and the goods we buy are considerable in amount, but they are bought from wholesale houses, and from Messrs. Debenham and Storr's, and other auction rooms. Statement A is divided into sections. The first section shows (and I have my private ledger, which I shall be glad to submit to the Committee) the amount of the capital invested; the pledged stock is the first item, and that is 8,919 l. The value of the lease is 800 l., we having laid out about 1,400 l. or 1,500 l. upon the house. Then there is the premium on stock, which may be supposed to be capitalised interest. If one pawnbroker takes the business of another, he has, in addition to paying for the stock, to give a consideration for the interest due on pledges upstairs; therefore, when buying the stock of another, he has to pay something more than the sum lent, because the man who sells the business has been lying out of his interest.

448. The accrued interest on pledges, over and above that which the pawnbroker receives at the time of taking the pledge?—That is so.

449. Mr. T. Hughes.] And that is charged as capital, by the custom of the trade?—Yes. The next item is the cash; you see that it varies in the two statements. In one it is 573 l. and in the next it is rather more than 1,000 l. That is the cash which it is necessary to put into the till, to have ready to put into the till if it is wanted. The amount of sale stock is 3,034 l. 14 s. 5 d.

450. M

450. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] Is that forfeited pledges?—To a very small extent, it is forfeited pledges; but it is that part of the stock into which forfeited pledges go; they do not, however, materially affect the profit upon the sale.

451. Chairman.] Is that the stock which you bought to sell again?—In the year to which I am now referring we bought over 3,600*l.* by that means, while the unredeemed pledges are something like 1,800*l.* or 1,900*l.* As regards the unredeemed pledges sold by public auction, on these, amounting to upwards of 900, a loss of 26*l.* resulted.

452. Mr. Whitwell.] At what time of the year is the balance sheet made?—My stock-taking is in May, and this is from the 13th of May 1864 to the 12th of May 1865. I chose it as being the most profitable year I could lay before the Committee. The next statement refers to the last year I had experienced at the time I drew it up, but I have had a stock-taking since then.

453. Colonel Beresford.] Do Statements A, B, and C represent three of your houses?—No; Statements A and B represent one house, Statement C refers to another house entirely; not my house at all. The gross capital employed at my house at this date was 14,217*l.* 6*s.* It is an amateur account; but if one of the results elicited will be to show that I ought to make more money by it, I shall be pleased. Section 2 shows, in the first place, the profit that was derived from interest that year, which amounted to 1,406*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, while in ticket fees we received 193*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* The earnings of sales were 1,144*l.* 17*s.* That is from the sale trade; but I put it in here that I may show the whole of the profits first, and you will find them dissected afterwards.

454. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is that the profit on the 3,000*l.*?—That is the profit on the 3,000*l.*

455. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] But the sale is not confined to pledges sold, is it?—No; nearly the whole of it is the selling of goods which did not come to me as unredeemed pledges. The gross sum earned in both departments is 2,744*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*; and as to the expenses, those expenses are actual items, not any one of them being estimated. Those sums are the actual totals at the end of the year. This book has the daily items in it, and they are cut up under certain headings, and at the end of the year they are added up. The gross expenses are 1,393*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*

456. Mr. T. Hughes.] Some of those expenses seem very high; for instance, is not the painting and repairs a large sum?—It is a larger sum than it was last year.

457. Did it average that?—It would in this particular house, because the premises were very old fashioned premises, and we have laid out altogether between 1,400*l.* and 1,500*l.*, and I have not had the place years yet.

458. Chairman.] Then, including depreciation of capital, by what you call valuing the lease, it would not be so much?—We have laid out a great deal on this house, but it was necessary, and I do not think it has increased the value of the rent, because of the depreciation of property in the neighbourhood. We paid, I think, 300*l.* for the lease in the first instance, which was a very short one, and we have obtained a renewal of it since. This happened to be a partnership account, and this is the item which we have agreed to value the lease at, at any time.

459. Mr. Whitwell.] What are the losses of 179*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* with the item of 26*l.* 6*s.* by sales?—The 26*l.* 6*s.* is the loss which was occasioned by the auction sales. There are other losses included in that, such as arose from the sale of jewellery and things of that sort, which are not of of a kind to put into the stock, but which are sold to refiners or dealers who buy such articles; for instance, old fashioned watches, or similar goods.

460. Then were those losses on pledges?—Those were losses on pledges.

461. Mr. T. Hughes.] The expenses are enormous, I see, for the keep and wages being upwards of 600*l.*?—They are the actual sums paid by me. This house is managed by a man who has been in our employ for nearly 50 years; he is not paid too large a salary. The salaries are carried out weekly in this book, and they amount in the total to that; there can be no disguise whatever about that.

462. But do you assert that on a turnover of that kind it costs 600*l.* a-year, to pawnbrokers in general, to get their business done?—I can show that it is so. The question is this: whether a man trading with 14,000*l.* ought not to find employment to as large an amount as that; I hold an opinion that the obligation rests upon a man to give reasonable employment; but I think it will be found that the general result in similar cases will be that a man who employs a capital of 14,000*l.* will employ labour to a larger amount than 600*l.* That is my average in the different houses, and it is an average which I see, in some few instances, where I have the opportunity of going into particulars. But these figures are actual items, and I thought it as well to put it in that way.

463. May we fairly argue from these, as averages?—Yes. One result, which I have attempted to show by this, is the ultimate cost of a pledge; and I find that the cost of a pledge does not vary very much under ordinary circumstances.

464. Mr. Whitwell.] Do you charge anything for partnership?—No, not the slightest amount.

465. Your head manager has how much?—He has 2*l.* a-week, which is 104*l.* a-year, and his wife and family live in the house; I have a married "second," I have a married foreman, in the sale shop, and four or five other hands besides that, and a servant; there are seven and a servant.

466. Chairman.] Then the result of all this is that the charges, without any remuneration to yourself, amount to 1,293*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, leaving a net earning of 1,451*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*?—Yes.

467. Now, do you wish to give some evidence to show the profit and loss of the pawnbroking business, separate from the sale department?—The next section shows the pawnbroking department excusively; the items will be seen to be carried down from above, and they give an amount of 11,182*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*

468. Mr. C. H. Mills.] How do you come to have the lease of your premises only on the pawnbroking department?—For this reason: nearly the whole of the two houses are taken up by the pawnbroking warehouses; we have a second shop, but you will see that I have charged a proper proportion of the expenses to the sales. It is shown very fairly, I think, that I have only charged upon the pawnbroking capital the proper items and the correct amount of expenses

469. There is nothing charged for the premises to the sale department, is there?—No. My predecessor decessor carried on no sale there, but still he occupied both the houses.

470. But you could not carry on that sale business unless you had the house, could you?—If I thought there would be any suggestion of the kind, I would have adopted it. It would not have affected the result to any appreciable extent if I had reduced that sum by 400 l., and charged half to each. After deducting three-fourths of the expenses, and having reference to the capital employed in the two departments, it leaves a net profit on the pawnbroking of 629 l. 12 s. 3 d., the net earnings being 5·940 per cent.

471. Mr. Whitwell.] I quite agree with the honourable Member opposite, that you have made half of your profits by sales, and you have charged the sale with no rent; should you not have charged the rent?—I have charged the proportion of the expenses in section 4; these expenses include rent.

472. But there is no interest on the premises?—I have charged one-fourth of the rental to the sale shop, although more than three-fourths of the houses are taken up by the pawnbroking stock.

473. Chairman.] What you mean to convey, I suppose, is that the extent of the premises which are required to keep a large number of pledges is much greater than the extent of the premises which are required for the purchase and sale of goods?—There is simply a shop devoted to the sale.

474. You do not want any warehouse-room for the sale of goods, but they are all contained in the shop, I suppose?—No; they are all contained in the shop. The rest of the house is stocked and filled with pledges.

475. According to this account, then, it would seem that the earnings on the pledges yield only 5·64 per cent., and the earnings upon the sales yield 27 per cent.; is that so?—Yes. The object of that is to show, that if we had no restrictions as to capital, we should have no difficulty in making the business pay the same as other trades; but in that part where I am restricted as to the rate of profit, a result is shown the parallel of which I do not believe that you can meet with in any other trade. I do not think that any other business could be instanced where 11,000 l. was invested and produced a smaller net result than 629 l.

476. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You charge your expenses according to the capital employed, do you not?—Yes, I thought that was the fairest way to put it. I may state that the interest and the charges allowed by the Act of Parliament are in every instance scrupulously carried out, and, therefore, this is a statement of what a pawnbroker's business of such an amount will produce, without any evasion, or any unfair or improper practices, which, as I have said before, we find are carried on to a very considerable extent in some places. Of course there are numbers of the London trade, and numbers in the country no doubt, who are just as scrupulous as myself, but still I am aware of the fact that a large number of the trade seek to supplement their profit by some illegal means.

477. In the latter part of your statement you give the number of pledges which you took within the year as being 69,656, do you not?—That is the number of pledges, and the amount lent, that shows the average of the pledges to be 6 s. 11 d.

478. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But that is much above the general average, is it not?—I do not know; but I dare say that, as compared with the country, it would be higher.

479. What is the total sum advanced?—The total sum advanced is 23,954 l. 7 s. 2 d.

480. According to your view of the cost of a single pledge you make it 3¼ d., do you not?—In this instance the pledges cost 3¼ d.

481. Assuming them to be 6 s. 11 d. on an average?—Yes; and the statement just above that will show that the expenses amount to 4 per cent. on the gross amount lent.

482. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Where do you get the gross earnings from?—They are exhibited in section 2, and they are taken from the book made up at the stock-taking, which shows the total interest to be 1,406 l. 15 s. 1 d., and the ticket fees 193 l. 2 s. 5 d. I have been anxious to point out to the Committee the amount of ticket fees. The number of pledges was nearly 70,000, and that Act of Parliament giving the additional half-penny, scarcely affects me at all in a business of this kind. There are businesses where they do very low pledges, where they get, of course, a corresponding number of half-pence, but all above 5 s. we were allowed to charge a ticket fee for before; and in a business of this kind it really affects my profits to a very small extent in deed.

483. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Do you believe that you would only make 5½ per cent. in an ordinary business?—That is all that I make; I have no doubt that the deductions will be subjected to close scrutiny, and the per-centages will be shown to be correctly put down there.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN DICKER, re-called; and further Examined.

484. Chairman.] HAVE you any further statement which you wish to make to the Committee?—I do not know whether I made it sufficiently clear to the Committee that only a small part of the profit derived from the sales was derived from the sale of unredeemed pledges.

485. In allocating the expenses to the sale of the sale-stock as compared with the expenses of the pawnbroking business, what sort of establishment would you require to do the business of the sale-stock shown in the return which you have placed before the Committee?—If the premises were not suited to it I should have had to take a separate place for it; but most pawnbrokers have the accommodation which they require at their house or next door to it, as I have in this instance.

486. What shopmen or establishment would you require to carry on the sale business?—I do what is considered rather a large sale in this kind of property, and I have two assistants there, one a salesman and another quite a junior hand to assist him.

487. Is that sufficient for the sale business?—Quite so.

488. Is the rest of the establishment devoted to the pawnbroking business?—Entirely; and, in fact, the junior hand at the sale business does some duties connected with the pawnbroking.

489. Then do you think that the allocation of 323 l. expenses for the sale business would be sufficient to carry it on if it were a separate business?—Quite so; I think it is fully stated, with regard to the business of this house.

490. Do you know what is the recognised rate of profit in London on retail sales, in that sort of sale business, on each transaction?—I have endeavoured to ascertain what it is in the other trades, but I find that it is very variable indeed. In the business of a wholesale grocer, as to which I have some information, I found that in a small business the profit was 40 per cent. upon the capital.

491. The capital is turned more or less frequently in different businesses; what is the general profit or difference between the buying and the selling price of goods in this sort of sale business?—I have not an opportunity of knowing.

492. Do you know at all what is the general rate of profit in trades in London?—I have heard from a person who is connected with the shipping, for instance, that in the case of work done for the Government, if they are not contract prices, the Government in such instances allow 15 per cent., where the cost of manufacturing and getting up the article is clearly shown.

493. That is not retail business?—It is not. With regard to the retail trade, I have very little opportunity of knowing.

494. Will you describe the nature of Statement B.?—It will be seen that the statement is one of another year's business of the same house as was referred to in Statement A. It will not be necessary for me to go into it very minutely, but it will be seen that the net profit upon the pawnbroking capital that particular year is rather over six per cent., while in the former case it is under six per cent.; that will be seen from section 3.

495. I see that the figures in this statement vary very much from the figures in the former statement; how is that explained?—As regards the item of wages of the year, which I first showed, there was a great deal of sale done; and for the buying of goods, and so on, I had employed a hand, so that it was rather more expensive that year; but the other salaries remained just the same. The item of repairs, you see, is less; but I stated in my evidence the other day, that as regards this particular house, it was not more than an average, or not much more.

496. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is this another year of the same business?—This is my last stock-taking year in this house; the other year is selected simply because it was one of the most prosperous years that I have had.

497. Chairman.] Will you now proceed to Statement C; is that a statement of the transactions of a different house?—This is a house where they do what would be called in the trade a "running" business; it is a very laborious kind of business; perhaps on a Monday they take in double the number of pledges that I do. I am anxious to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the expenses here are estimated; for the reason that it is a house where the personal expenditure enters into the accounts; but I have taken as much care as possible to estimate the working expenses rightly. As to the wages of officials, and so on, I have taken the actual figures. The actual payment for the wages of officials is 355 l.

498. Mr. C. H. Mills.] How do you account for the keep of officials being in this case 260 l., and their wages 355 l., while in the other cases their keep cost 182 l. and 171 l. respectively, and their wages were 437 l. and 332 l. respectively?—It is the wages of 10 persons, including two servants, and it is put down at 10 s. per week, which is a sum very frequently allowed in pawnbrokers' houses.

499. Chairman.] When you speak of this being a "running" business, do you mean a business in which the pledges are brought and taken away very frequently?—Yes, a large weekly trade.

500. Mr. M. Guest.] What is the item of "Goods for house, 28 l."?—That is an estimated item. They are such things as are necessary for the working of the house: for instance, table cloths, knives and forks, and a variety of things are wanted to supply a house of business. I put that down because I have such a heading in my expense book, which I brought here and showed the other day.

501. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is this a house that does no sale business?—It does no sale business; anything made by the sales is more than swept away by the losses.

502. Mr. Whitwell.] I think that if a calculation which I have made on this table be correct, 781 l. of profit, divided by the number of pledges will yield 1 ½ d. for each pledge; have you gone into that?—According to this statement one month's interest on the average pledge of 4 s. 3 d. (the average amount of the pledge in that case is 4 s. 3 d.) would be a penny and the ticket fee would be a halfpenny; and it would show a loss of about three farthings upon those pledges which are redeemed within one month.

503. But my question was this, if 781 l. be the gross profit in the year, and the number of pledges during the year be 134,500, will not the average profit be 1 ½ d.?—I have not gone into that calculation; it must be somewhere near that.

504. Mr. T. Hughes.] Will you tell me how you calculate your cost of each pledge?—It is possible that we may be in fault in that, because we have done the work as amateurs; we have taken the gross expenses and divided them by the 134,505 pledges taken in; this gives an average cost per pledge of 2 ¼ d. We have here shown, too, what per-centage the profit yields to the capital. In addition, the per-centage is given of gross profit and expenses on the 28,608 l. money lent; the gross earnings being, in round figures, seven per cent., the expenses four, leaving as net profit not quite three; the net profit is two and seven-tenths per cent., after deducting the expenses for that. I, perhaps, do not quite understand the honourable Member's question.

505. I do not quite understand your answer; the average cost of each pledge you stated to be 2 ¼ d.; if that be the proper average cost of each pledge, you bring out a loss of three-farthings on every pledge, do you not?—We took the gross amount of the expenses, and then divided it by 134,505, showing what it would give to each pledge, and we have dealt with the profits just in the same way. So many pledges come into the house in the course of the year, costing, on an average, 2 ¼ d.

506. Then each of them must bear a certain proportion of the expenses?—Yes; it is not mathematically correct, but it is as near as we could get it to show what a pledge would cost us.

507. Chairman.] You mean that a pledge for the amount of 4 s. 3 d. for one month, is not a paying transaction?—Clearly; and I shall be able to show that by the next stage of this evidence.

508. Mr. T. Hughes.] Cannot you give us the calculation for the month's interest for a pledge which remains in for the average time during which your pledges remain?—I think that can be given more clearly by other witnesses, who have gone into the matter more carefully. I will show you the result of one Saturday night's business presently. We shall have tables, I think, which we shall be able to put in, which will give food for consideration.

509. Is your heaviest business on Saturday?—The heaviest business is on Saturday. The statement which I now produce shows 375 l. as the capital taken on Saturday, and 14 l. 6 s. 4 d. as the interest on that day.

510. But does it not appear that there is only 44 l. advanced on Saturday?—Yes; but you will find that those two columns increase in an inverse ratio. In this house there is a large trade of that kind done in pledges taken out on Saturday and brought back on Monday; there were 1,900 pledges delivered on this Saturday night, the 7th of May.

511. Chairman.] Have you a statement of the transactions of that Saturday night which will explain the working of the system?—I have some particulars connected with this Saturday night's business.

512. Mr. T. Hughes.] I do not see any charges of fractions for interest; a previous witness has told us that you calculated sometimes 2-16ths of a penny, and so on: how do you explain that?—Of course the fractions go on accumulating till they come to a farthing.

513. The pledge is always redeemed by payment of a round sum; how do you arrange that?—The interest for a three-shilling pledge for one month is ¾ d., for two months it is 1 ½ d.; the ¾ d. in the first instance being rather over the rate of 20 per cent. A three-shilling pledge, for the first month is ¾ d., for the second month it is 1 ½ d., adding a halfpenny; for the third month it is 2 d., adding on three-farthings; for the fourth month it is 2 ½ d.; for the fifth month it is 3 ¾ d., and so on; and the way in which it is arrived at is this: three farthings is the correct amount for the first month; but if you want to ascertain what is the right amount for five months and a-half, five times three is 15, and the half of 3 s. is 1 s. 6 d., that is 16 s. 6 d., on which amount you take one month's interest; that method calculates for the fractions, which can only be arrived at in that way; of course, there are no fractions with regard to the 2 s. 6 d., nor yet with regard to the 1 s. 3 d.; 2 s. 6 d. has ½ d., 3 s. 9 d. has ¾ d.; but between those sums there are fractions, and you have to arrive at what it is by multiplying the sum in the way I have suggested; for instance, in the case of seven months on 8 s., seven times eight is 56, and that is 11 ½ d., one month's interest on 56 s. The public have no idea of doing that, but pawnbrokers do it in almost every transaction, where men choose to abide by it, which I have always believed to be the case in the larger number of instances, although I am sure that it is evaded to a very large extent, now that I have been engaged in this inquiry.

514. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Do you often find that people themselves have made the calculations?—I think

I think a great many of the people do so, with regard to the even sums; but I should think as to the fractional sums, a very small per-centage indeed of the customers, even among the most intelligent do it. I met, the other day, with the case of a country pawnbroker, who was not himself able to calculate the interest. I put an intricate problem to him, and he could not work it out.

515. Mr. M. Guest.] He charged a little more probably, so as to be on the right side?—No doubt that is done.

516. Mr. T. Hughes.] I see that the tickets are not marked with the interest on both sides?—They are marked at the time of redemption.

517. But surely that seems to me to be the wrong time; ought they not to be marked at the time the article is pledged?—That also would be a proper regulation, but I should hope that endorsement at the time of delivering the pledge would never be done away with, because after all it is some little guarantee or record of what is taken. If a man made a false indorsement, which I am told is sometimes the case, then, of course, the man does two wrongs; he first of all cheats the person, and he commits a second wrong in making an improper indorsement. But I should adopt it, if the law did not compel me to do so, and it is necessary to us, because those are all so many vouchers for the money we have received during the day, and they are what is called cashed at night for the purpose of balancing our accounts.

518. Chairman.] If the Irish system were adopted, there would be no difficulty, would there, in indorsing the interest on the tickets when delivered?—Not at all, it would be a known sum; for instance, if it were 6*s.* you would indorse upon it that the pledge was at the rate of 1½*d.* per month.

519. Which you cannot do now, because it varies from month to month?—It varies from month to month on a large number of pledges.

520. Mr. Charley.] I see that your last item is for wages of officials; I suppose that they all require to have a knowledge of accounts?—It is not so much a knowledge of accounts that they require as experience in the valuation of goods; and they must be persons of integrity, because we have no system of cashiers as they have in the drapery business, the business is not of such magnitude as to require it; and those men have to be better paid, because they have the handling of money, than possibly they would be paid for the same kind of work in another shop.

521. Do you pay them in proportion to their intelligence?—Of course a man, who knows his business well, will always get a much higher salary than a man who knows it indifferently, and that has reference always to his knowledge of the value of goods.

522. Chairman.] Have you come to the conclusion, from an examination of those transactions on Saturday evenings, that they do not yield any profit when redeemed within a short period?—That is so. The paper which I have produced gives particulars of transactions at one pawnbroker's on May the 7th, one Saturday. The figures do not quite tally, I see, but I think that by drawing it out in the way we have done, we have not done it perhaps as accurately as in the pawnbroker's accounts. It is a very small discrepancy. There were 1,899 pledges delivered, of which 1,553 were delivered that had not been in more than one month. The 1,553 were delivered, not having been in pledge more than one month, leaving 346 for the other parts of the year. The principal sum was 304*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* on the 1553, and on the smaller number of 346 it was 72*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* The interest received on the 1,553 was 5*l.* 18*s.* 8½*d.*, and on the other 8*l.* 6*s.* 2½*d.*, making a total of 14*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, or 14*l.* 6*s.* 4,d. as I have it here. The object of this paper was to show, first, the average amount of money lent on the 1,553 pledges; this was 3*s.* 11*d.* each. The interest and ticket fee would be rather more than 1¼*d.*, and I have put it down at 1½*d.* Each pledge of 3*s.* 11*d.* for interest and ticket fee gave 1½*d.*; and Statement C. shows that the pledges cost this pawnbroker 2¼*d.* each; so that on those 1,553 pledges, instead of their being a profit there was an actual loss. Whether it is satisfactory to the Committee, or not, I do not know. It is not mathematically correct, because it is perhaps unfair to charge the smallest pledge with the same percentage of expenses as a larger one.

523. Mr. T. Hughes.] Are you sure that the principle upon which you have gone is a correct one?—A pawnbroker is only capable of taking a certain number of pledges in the course of the year, and it requires a certain staff to do it. If we divide the gross expenses over the whole number of pledges, then I think that is as fair a way as you can adopt to see what the pledge costs.

524. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You divide the amount by the number of pledges?—We divide the amount by the number of pledges in order to say what is the probable cost of a pledge before the Committee. As I say, it is not strictly correct, because a low-priced pledge ought, perhaps, not to be charged at the same rate of expenses as a higher priced pledge; but those pledges, when delivered within the month, result in a loss to the pawnbroker rather than a profit. I have here, on a piece of paper, a copy of every one of the tickets which I have produced; this paper is 58 feet long, and the object of it is to show how large a number of the transactions are the transactions on which but one month's interest can be taken; and is merely to show the large number of transactions of this nature which occur in one Saturday's business.

525. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Does this list include both what you take in and what you give out?—This is a list of the pledges redeemed only and delivered on one Saturday, the 7th of May, out of the house by the pawnbroker, the number being 1,899. This latter part of the paper contains all the tickets for pledges which have been in longer than one month; I thought it would convey to the Committee how large a proportion of the transactions were over and worked out within a month.

526. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you consider that an average Saturday?—On one Saturday night since this, there have been delivered over 2,000 pledges. This kind of business, it is quite evident to me, is very unprofitable; but still it is a business over which a man has not much control, because, although all those transactions which have gone in and out in a month have been unprofitabte, if they had remained in two or three months they would have been profitable.

527. Mr. C. H. Mills.] The pawnbroker must take it in I presume, because he does not know how long it is going to stay?—That is so.

Mr. J Dicker. 16 June 1870.

528. Mr. Whitwell.] I think I observe that in almost every instance here, ½ d. has been received for a ticket?—Both items are set out. In the first column there is the principal sum, in the next there is the ticket fee, in the third there is the interest, and in the fourth the total.

529. Mr. T. Hughes.] I see that in one case there is no interest at all, how is that?—I suppose the ticket fee is not charged in that instance. It is the custom in many houses for those very small amounts not to charge the ticket fee.

530. Chairman.] This being the state of affairs in regard to the smaller pledges for a short time, what arrangement do you think would be reasonable and equitable to enable the pawnbroker to make a profit on those transactions?—What I am prepared to recommend in the course of my evidence, is that the Irish rate should be adopted, but that there should be freedom of contract to alter that in any cases in which it seemed necessary to the pawnbroker, and where it is agreed to by the pawner. Then, with regard to the ticket fee, I scarcely know how that should be dealt with, whether the ticket fee should be altered from its present amount or not. That is a question upon which I have not sufficiently made up my mind; it is quite clear that even with the Irish rate a large number of the transactions would continue to be unprofitable to the pawnbroker; I believe that the Dutch system is that they have a commission at the time of pawning; but that will be gone into more fully by a witness who is more competent to speak upon it than myself. My idea is, that it should be the Irish rate of interest, and that there should be freedom of contract allowed.

531. What you object to is, that you are compelled to do business at what you consider a loss, or not to do it at all?—Just so.

532. Mr. T. Hughes.] But if you propose to have perfect liberty of contract in the trade, do you propose any further limitations as to the persons who are to be permitted to go into it, or would you leave it perfectly free for any person to go into it?—Personally I should be in favour of a higher license. Any protection which could be brought to bear in order that the business might be conducted in an honourable manner should, I think, have consideration; but as to whether it should be a higher license, or in what way it should be done, I am not sure as to what is the general opinion of the trade.

533. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Then are you in favour of freedom in one direction, but not in another?—I am merely instancing the way, if it is thought necessary to have any such guarantee; I do not know how it should be obtained in any other form; I am not particularly in favour of that.

534. Chairman.] What would you consider would be a minimum charge, which would be profitable on small transactions?—In my own house they cost me 3 d., and in this other house they cost 2 ¼ d.; but I imagine that if there was a higher rate of interest it would not be insisted upon that all those transactions should be made profitable the first month.

535. For instance, a cabman is entitled to 1 s. as a minimum charge, because it represents what may be called the loss incident to the first hiring; upon the same principle, what would be the minimum charge which you would consider yourself entitled to make to prevent your being drawn into an unprofitable business?—In my case, in order to avoid that it should be 3 d.; but the question is whether any system could be laid down that whatever is charged at the time of pledging should cover the first two or three months' interest.

536. Yours are really theoretic figures, and you have admitted that they are not an accurate representation of the facts, because something more is due to a large transaction than to a small one in the ordinary way of business. What do you consider would be a fair minimum charge, modifying your theoretic figure by the considerations of what is due to small transactions and to large transactions, to prevent your doing business at a loss?—I should be content, I think, with such a sum as would be obtained by the Irish rate.

537. What is the minimum charge under the Irish rate?—It is a halfpenny for 2 s., instead of a halfpenny for 2 s. 6 d., so that in the intermediate sums it would give a larger amount of profit; in the 1 l. pledge it would only make a difference of 5 per cent., instead of being 4 d. in the 1 l. it would be 5 d. in the 1 l.

538. The minimum charge would be a 1 d., a halfpenny for interest, and a halfpenny for the ticket, would it not?—Yes, as it is now.

539. Then what change would that be?—The employment of the money under that scale would make the capital much more profitable.

540. Now there is no charge below a 1 d., is there?—There is no charge below a 1 d. now.

541. Then the Irish rate would make the lowest charge a 1 d. too, would it not?—Yes; I am not sure whether the ticket money should not be altered; I have not sufficiently made up my mind upon that; I am afraid to argue that, because I fear that it would not be palatable to the general body of the trade.

542. Mr. T. Hughes.] By the Irish rate the moment you get over 2 s., you jump up to a 1 d., do you not?—Yes.

543. Chairman.] Do you not jump up by a 1 d., because the minimum charge is already a 1 d., and then you go to 2 d.?—There is a halfpenny paid for the ticket now; then the interest for one month for 2 s. 6 d. is a halfpenny.

544. Then the minimum charge is a 1 d.?—The minimum charge is a 1 d.

545. Supposing that you go to a transaction above 2 s. 6 d., what is the minimum charge then?—For 2 s. 6 d. it would be a 1 d., and the ticket a halfpenny, which would be 1 ½ d.

546. You want by the Irish scale to have 2 d. instead of 1 ½ d.?—On the 1 l. it makes a difference of five per cent.

547. But with regard to the small transactions, the minimum charge now is 1 d. for a transaction of 2 s. 6 d., and it is 1 ½ d. for a transaction of 3 s., is it not?—Under the present system, 2 s. 6 d. is only a halfpenny; under the new system of the Irish rate, it would be 1 d.

548. Then the minimum charge would be 1 ½ d. would it not?—No.

549. People have nothing to do with your distinctions between tickets and interest; the question is, what a man pays for a transaction; you say, do you not, for a transaction of 2 s. 6 d., the minimum charge is 1 d.?—Yes.

550. Then, if the transaction is 3 s., does he pay you 1 ½ d.?—Yes.

551. Then, by the Irish scale, you propose that he should pay you, how much, for 3 s.?—Three shillings would be 1 ½ d.; 1 d. the interest and a halfpenny the ticket.

552. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is not the Irish scale a rate of a halfpenny for every 2 s.?—Yes, for every 2 s., or part of 2 s.

553. Is it not a 1 d. for 4 s., 1½ d. for 6 s., and so on, up to 10 s.?—Yes, all pledges up to 2 s. would remain as they did before at a 1 d. A very small pledge was spoken of the other day, a 6 d. pledge; I find that in two houses we had not such a thing, and that in another house we had only 10 of them, and in those instances the halfpenny was not taken. They are not encouraged at all. In little matters of detail there is a want of uniformity, and in the other house I find that they take the halfpenny on small sums; but this 6 d. pledge really does not exist in two of my houses, and it is generally discouraged, I believe, by other houses.

554. Mr. T. Hughes.] There are only about two such cases that I can see in the whole of that long list?—That is a business in which we should expect to meet with them.

555. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You would have a fixed rate, supposing that there was no wish to make a contract?—Yes; and persons would know that if there was a special contract made with them it would have to be carried out in a prescribed form, so that a man would be aware that he was entering into a special contract. A child should not be allowed to make a contract; and the signature of the person making the contract should be insisted upon.

556. You advocate forfeiture at the end of six months, instead of as at present; what profit would an individual pawning derive from that?—I do not know that the public would have any advantage from that; but I think it must be just as convenient to pay interest half-yearly, or quarterly, the same as rent; I have known instances of persons saying "I will not pay the interest of that," whereas I think that if they were brought to account at shorter distances of time they would pay the interest; we generally, I believe, came to the agreement that by that means the number of forfeited pledges would be decreased, although some pawnbrokers are of a different opinion, and that is our aim in suggesting this. In addition to the things turning out more seasonably, we think that we should have a smaller number of forfeited pledges; I feel confident that we should do so from the fact that persons would pay the smaller amount; for instance, the interest of 10 s. now is 2 s. 1 d., whereas the interest on 10 s. for six months would be, of course, only 1 s. 1 d., and I think it would induce a great many persons to pay it.

557. You say that it would be a smaller amount; how would it be less?—It would be half the amount; it would be paid twice a year instead of once.

558. Chairman.] You think that by not letting it accumulate, people would be more ready to pay it?—I think so. Again, if a man takes a bill at 12 months into a bankers in Lombard-street, the banker in most cases will refuse to entertain it; at six months he is more likely to do so; but at three months he would take it; in this instance the hardship is that the contract in the first place is made for 12 months, at the end of which period the pawner can come, and without any payment give notice to extend it, and at the end of 15 months he can leave it altogether.

559. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] They do not pay the interest at the end of 12 months, do they?—It is very frequently done; a very large per-centage of the pledges which are found to be unredeemed at last, have gone through the process of backing, as it is called, for three months, so that the people do it unthinkingly, showing an unwillingness to part with them; and it costs nothing; our custom is, when a thing has been so noticed, to write the word kept on it, or something of that sort, to denote that it is not to be sold until a period of 15 months has expired.

560. Mr. T. Hughes,] Do you agree with the former witness that the sale of the pledges which are forfeited is a losing part of the pawnbroking business?—I have no doubt of it; I have myself, for instance, with a view to supply the sale department of one of my houses, taken the unredeemed pledges of other pawnbrokers, and I have had them at 10 or 15 per cent. discount from the money which they lent on them. I believe that many pawnbrokers would be willing to make an engagement with anyone to let their pledges go for a year or two at a certain discount off the sum lent; and I shall be able to show that that is the case with reference to pledges above 10 s.

561. Mr. M. Guest.] You have the option of taking any pledge you like, and also as to the amount of money which you can lend upon it, have you not?—Yes; except as regards the competition set up by pawnbrokers. If the money offered is not sufficient, they will go to another pawnbroker, even at some distance, and get an advanced price.

562. But why should the other pawnbroker give an advanced price if he knows that it will involve a loss?—Ninety per cent. at least of the pledges which we take go out again, and therefore the risk is worth running. There is a private value to everything, apart from its value to the pawnbroker; to replace a coat worn by a man would cost him a great deal more than the coat would fetch him at the pawnbrokers.

563. Then you fight for the interest, but not for the thing itself?—Not at all. It is altogether a mistake to imagine that the pawnbrokers look to the unredeemed pledges for profit; when the pledges are unredeemed they do the best they can to make them pay as well as possible; but in this house, in Statement C., the whole of those pledges are got rid of to some person in the trade, or are lotted up and sent to auctioneers, which always results in a loss.

564. Supposing that you were not allowed to take a sale business, do you think that the pawnbroking business would be a failure altogether?—I do not see how they could realise their pledges. A pawnbroker has a certain per-centage of pledges left, and he must make the sale of them as profitable as possible.

565. Supposing that the two businesses of salesmen and pawnbrokers were separated, do you think the pawnbroking business would be undertaken by people?—I do not think it would, because, from those two statements, it would appear that the capital employed in pawnbroking only pays a little over 6 per cent.; and the margin of profit which I get by my trading, at the end of the year, is derived almost entirely from the sale business; in one case the per-centage was as much as 28 per cent. when things were very flourishing, and there was plenty of employment, and things were selling very readily indeed.

566. Mr. Charley.] The Chairman, in one of his questions, referred to the case of a cabman; I presume that the difference between you and the the cabman is, that the cabman is obliged to take everyone who offers, whereas you can refuse, if you please?—No doubt.

16 June 1870.

567. Mr. Whitwell.] The Chairman has asked you (and the inquiry was not followed up), what would be your minimum charge for a given value; you say one penny, for how much?—Up to 2 s. as now.

568. And what would be your next stage?—That penny would be made up of a halfpenny for the ticket fee, at the time of receiving it, and a halfpenny interest.

569. Supposing that we decided upon a scale of charges, as proposed by the first witness, not graduated in minute fractions, but from point to point, what would be your view as to that?—At the present time we have a halfpenny for 2 s., and so it would remain. By the present rate we get one penny for 4 s., and so it would remain; but on the intermediate sum of 3 s., instead of being three farthings, it would be one penny; and on 2 s. 6 d. it would be one penny also. Any intermediate sum, between 2 s. and under 4 s., would be one penny; then from 4 s. to 6 s., in the same way, would be three halfpence.

570. Then would you take the Irish scale exactly?—Exactly.

571. Up to what amount?—Up to 10 l.

572. Mr. Charley.] I think you said that you were in favour of raising the license duty?—No, not particularly; but I do not know any other mode which could be adopted for ensuring that the pawnbroker should be a man of some position and respectability.

573. The license is, I believe, in town, 15 l., and in the country, 7 l. 10 s.?—Yes.

574. Would you assimilate the duties?—My proposition would be to make them all higher. In Ireland, I believe, the licenses are very high indeed.

575. Mr. M. Guest.] Would not that encourage, what are called, the "Dolly-shops"?—I think that certainly more prompt steps should be taken in dealing with those. There is no person to take any steps against them, except a common informer. The police do not interfere with them, although I daresay they have the power to do so.

576. Would a license to the buyer of old clothes have any good effect in that direction?—I do not think so.

577. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Are there many of those unlicensed pawnbrokers?—A great many, but I do not know the number. An honourable Member has moved for a return, but I do not know whether it embraces that.

578. Do you know whether by law you are entitled to recover the deficiency on the re-sale of pledges?—I have always been under the impression that it may be recovered; and sometimes, when the amount has been worth looking after, I have recovered it; but it is disputed.

579. Do you know whether it has ever been decided?—I do not know that it has.

580. Mr. Whitwell.] An ordinary dealer, having 5,000 l. of capital, whether he be a grocer or whatever other trade he may follow, calculates upon turning over his capital a great many times per annum, does he not?—Yes.

581. Does not a very small profit at each turn over amount to a large aggregate profit at the end of the year?—Yes.

582. The pawnbroker makes no such calculations as that, does he?—No.

583. Can you tell how often a pawnbroker in his pledging business turns his capital over?—The actual amount of pledged stock in this instance was 8,700 l., while the money turned over was 28,000 l.; so that that was about three times.

584. But that was in the sales and all, was it not?—Yes; but he lent 28,000 l., and his pawnbroking capital was nearly 9,000 l., so that it would be about three times turned over.

585. Then he turns over his capital three times for six per cent.; that is to say, each time he turns it over he makes two per cent. profit; is that so?—Yes.

586. What induces a man to go into the pawnbroking business when the remuneration is so trifling?—I cannot understand why he does. I was asked the question the other day by a barrister, who said he could never understand why a man was a pawnbroker; and he at last determined that it was a heritage. I am a pawnbroker because my father was one, and when he died there was a certain property there to be made the most of for those who were left behind.

587. Mr. Whitwell.] And it was better to continue it than to run the risk of loss in getting out of it, I suppose?—Yes.

588. Chairman.] May it not be shortly stated in this way: that philosophers say that when a business is unprofitable, no man takes to it; but that practical men say, that when a business is unprofitable no man gets out of it?—Quite so.

589. Mr. Whitwell.] Did not the Irish Act of 1786 only impose restrictions upon the business, when the interest was larger than the actual interest for the time being current in the realm, and if the pawnbroker only charged 6 per cent., the current interest of the realm then, was it not the case that no restrictions interfered with them?—I think not.

590. The clause says, "Provided always that nothing contained in this Act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any person or persons whomsoever who shall lend money to any person or persons, upon pawn or pledge, at the rate of 6 l. sterling per annum interest, without taking any further or greater profit for the loan or forbearance of such money lent, on any pretence whatever." If that Act had been so worded that it had stated that it should not be construed to extend to any person who should lend money at that current rate of interest, would it not have followed that when the Usury Laws were abolished, the pawnbrokers would have had the power of free contract?—I think so entirely.

591. It was only on account of the privilege given to them to charge above the Usury Laws, that Parliament interfered with them at all, was it not?—Entirely.

592. As there are now no laws for protection against usury, do you think that there ought to be a law of free contract?—I think so. I have two instances here which will show how inconveniently it works; I have here a ticket for 6 l. for a pianoforte, which was taken in by a pawnbroker; the interest, and all that he would be allowed to charge for warehouse-room and other things, would be 1 s. 6 d. a month. Before that pianoforte was redeemed 15 months had expired and the interest that he would be allowed to charge, and which he did charge, was 22 s. 6 d. I have a bill here from Peachey, of Bishopsgate-street, for warehousing a pianoforte for the same time, and it is 3 l.; and the pawnbroker would have have been liable to a penalty of 10*l.* for charging 22*s.* 7*d.*

593. Chairman.] In point of fact, the economical way of warehousing a pianoforte is to pawn it, is it not; because you get your money, and you get the pawnbroker to take care of your pianoforte?—Clearly.

594. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] The pawnbroker was not obliged to take it, I suppose; he knew what the storage would be, and therefore he did it with his eyes open, did he not?—Clearly; but the effect is, that men cannot pawn such a thing.

595. Chairman.] I suppose that your business is like other businesses, you cannot afford to send people away?—No; probably you may have had other dealings with the same persons. Here is a case of my own: I had a couch, a chimney-glass, a loo table, a fancy table, a fender, a carpet, and six glazed prints; the chimney-glass and the glazed prints being things involving considerable risk; we lent 5*l.* on those things, and the interest on that is 1*s.* 3*d.* per month; they were in pawn 6½ months, and I received 8*s.* 1½*d.*

596. Is it your opinion that the freedom of contract which you claim for yourself ought to be allowed, in order that you should be able to charge warehouse rent if you take in fragile articles, or articles taking a great deal of room or requiring strict care?—Yes, in proportion to the risk; we have very high authority for it; M'Culloch says that the rate of interest should always be proportionate to the risk that is undertaken.

597. Do you think that, like a railway company or a carrier, you should be at liberty to make a special charge for what are called special risks?—Decidedly.

598. Mr. M. Guest.] What do you suppose was the real value for sale of the things that you mentioned?—In all probability, if those things had been sold, if a broker, had been called in, or any similar step had been taken, they would not have fetched much more than 5*l.*, while they were worth considerably more to the person to whom they belonged. I wrote to the Pantechnicon to know what they would warehouse such goods for, and the answer I got was this: it is headed, "Warehousing Department, Baker-street, Bazaar, London, W., May 9, 1870. Sir,—The articles mentioned in your letter just received can be warehoused here at the rent of 2*l.* 10*s.* for six months, and 7*s.* 6*d.* per month afterwards." I lent 5*l.* and got 8*s.* 1½*d.* in six months and a-half, whereas they would have charged 50*s.*; and not have advanced any money.

599. But you were not bound to take it, were you?—No, but the hardship is to the public as well as to the pawnbroker.

600. Do you ever refuse articles?—Yes; those same things were offered to me a second time, and I refused to take them in.

601. Chairman.] You claim that you should not be prevented by law from receiving those goods, and charging for warehousing them at a reasonable rate?—Certainly; and this freedom of contract ought to be unfettered in every way, and be what the terms imply, because an "article of bulk," for instance, it is impossible to define, and it would lead to all manner of evasion. You could not say that it should be "furniture," because we should find that things were included in one of those furnished houses that are advertised that were not included in another as necessary to furnish a house; so that it would be impossible to define what was either an article of bulk or furniture; therefore the suggested freedom ought not to be bound by any such restriction. Others hold the view that it is desirable to limit it to a certain sum; but that I consider cannot be desirable, because I think a man should have the opportunity of borrowing money upon the article that he can best spare, whatever it might be; and as that may be an article of the value of only 8*s.* or 10*s.* or less, it would be very unfair, I think, to shut out cases of that sort. It is better to let the competition have its fair run and correct any evils that spring up afterwards, than to fetter it in any way. If you limit this freedom of contract to pledges above 10*s.*, a man would go and make the pledges 11*s.*, in order to bring it within the range. I have a letter here from a pawnbroker in the country, and it bears upon that point. He says, speaking with reference to the desirability of having freedom of contract, "I just now have a case in point. This evening a man wants 15*l.* on a piano; it is a pledge at 10*l.*, but a sixpenny ticket and 15 per cent. won't pay, and I therefore step beyond the boundaries of the Act, and make much more profitable and equally satisfactory terms at an 11*l.* transaction;" so that any attempt to bind it will only lead to evasion, and the proper thing is to allow this freedom of contract generally, and to the fullest extent. When the Usury Laws were in force the rate of interest was always five per cent., and nothing else was thought of than five per cent.; yet since the Usury Laws have been repealed money has been at very much less than that on many occasions.

602. Would you consider it lawful to advance 11*l.* upon goods, and to deduct 30*s.* for discount upon the advance?—A case of that kind has never suggested itself to me at all.

603. Is there anything unlawful in your advancing 11*l.* for six months, and deducting 30*s.* for discount upon the advance?—If that were the case, then we might have freedom of contract for all pledges now, because we have only to make them of such an amount to deduct the discount, and to hand over such a sum as could be advanced upon the goods, and for which they would be deemed sufficient security.

604. Chairman.] You could not do it unless the first advance was more than 10*l.*, could you?—I think the Committee will have it in evidence that one pawnbroker holds the view that he may do it for sums under 10*l.*

605. Mr. Charley.] Does not the new scale of charges in your Bill include charges for warehousing?—It includes everything.

606. You would make the warehousing of bulky articles a matter of special contract, would you not?—In many instances.

607. Are you satisfied with the existing law regulating the hours of business?—I think so. I consider it would be desirable that there should be a limit to the hours, so that they should not be beyond a certain time for the mere protection of the public; but I think that the pawnbrokers should have the opportunity of lessening the number of hours if they did it upon proper notice.

608. Do you think it is desirable to have the hours from eight o'clock in the morning to seven o'clock in the evening, all the year round?—The movement in favour of shortening the hours generally, I think, makes it desirable to fix them not longer than that.

609. They are longer now during one part of the year, are they not?—Yes, for six months in the the year. I do not think that the hours which the honourable Member suggests would be generally thought to be too long, but that those hours would give general satisfaction to the members of the trade; from eight in the morning till seven in the evening.

610. Mr. Whitwell.] Of course, no respectable shops of the kind would be open on Sunday, but are there any pawnbrokers' shops open on a Sunday morning?—Not any that I know of. I do not think any licensed pawnbrokers open on Sundays.

611. Have you never heard of pledges being redeemed on a Sunday morning from a licensed pawnbroker?—Never, unless perhaps on an application from a customer for any particular pledges that he has been unable to get the day before, I have had such applications made to me in the course of my time, but the houses of business of pawnbrokers are always closed on a Sunday.

612. In the lower classes of pawnbrokers do not such things occur sometimes?—They may sometimes occur among the very lowest of the small capitalists who invest in pawnbroking, but I think it may be said that the pawnbrokers' houses are all closed on Sunday.

613. Mr. Charley.] Would you alter the hours of closing on Saturdays?—I think many do close earlier than 11 o'clock now.

614. Mr. M. Guest.] But you are open from seven to nine on ordinary days, are you not?—It has been altered by one of the Acts of Parliament to from seven till eight.

615. Chairman.] On the question of the extra profit, would it be a convenient arrangement if you adopted the Irish plan of a ticket with the profit printed upon it, and that if you were allowed to make a special contract, you should be compelled to use a different ticket, having the extra charge written upon it, so that everyone taking the ticket would be put on his guard, and would know that he was liable to pay an extra sum?—Yes; my idea is, that every person entering into a special contract should sign his name, and that the special contract should not be allowed unless you get the signature of the person who makes it. If a man knows that he has to sign his name, and that the signing of his name is a hint that he is going to pay a higher rate than the implied rate, I think that would be a very good regulation indeed.

616. That he should sign the ticket and the amount of extra charge?—Yes; it is the custom now, in cases of deposits above 10 l., to take the signature of a person; I have no doubt that the effect of it would be that if this freedom of contract were allowed in all instances, the great bulk of the transactions would be carried out at the implied rate, whatever that implied rate was.

617. Then, all that would be necessary would be that the ticket remaining with you should be signed with the extra charge, and that the ticket which you gave to the pawner should have the extra charge and the amount written upon it?—In the Bill introduced by Mr. Plimsoll, we had a schedule form for that; but I should be disposed to have something more formal than that now suggested; if they are compelled to sign their names, I think it is sure that they understand it.

618. If they signed the ticket that was kept by you, and had a ticket delivered to them with the words "Extra charged" stamped upon it, and the extra charge written, would not that be a sufficient intimation to the holder of the ticket that he was liable to an extra charge, and would it not put him on his guard as to signing?—Possibly.

619. In addition to that, I understand that you wish to have liberty to make special contracts, embracing all questions relating to fragile and bulky goods, and warehousing, and things of that sort?—We do.

620. Mr. Plimsoll.] I suppose there is no doubt in your mind that the scale of charges at present operates not only to your disadvantage, but to that of the public also?—I am disposed to think so.

621. Supposing that the Committee were disposed to think that freedom of contract in this as in other cases would be the best thing, can you show the Committee that it would not be to the prejudice of the poorer classes, the people who pawn, or that any disadvantage to them might be obviated, for instance, by the publication of the charges in the pawnbrokers' windows?—I think there would be one implied rate for the whole trade, and that that should be made sufficiently public that everybody might know what the scale was; but to show that there would be no extortion, I can only say that I think competition would regulate that. Persons pledging things can get the full amount for which those things are security, and the best evidence of that is the books; I have here the actual books which I should have to produce to the customer if he came to know whether he had any surplus to receive.

622. Chairman.] As regards the public, if the persons pawning were persons in great necessity, would they not virtually have to subscribe to any special contract that you chose to tender to them?—My answer to that is, that I do not think they would, inasmuch as what induces one man to lend more on pledge than another would induce the pawnbrokers to compete as to the amount of interest that they would charge, and I believe that that would be sure to bring about something like a uniform charge with pawnbrokers generally; for the same kind of article and the same degree of risk I think that the charges would be found to be pretty uniform.

623. What is the practical remedy for a person at present if he, under the stringent terms of this Act, cannot get money advanced on small goods?—I can understand that a man would be driven to sell the things, or he would go to one of the unlicensed shops to raise the money, where he would pay a very much higher rate of interest than the pawnbrokers' rate.

624. As a rule, do you think that if a man takes his clothes to an old clothes shop, to sell, he gets as much money as he would get from a pawnbroker?—In a great number of instances possibly, I think he would not get as much, and he would lose the opportunity of replacing them.

625. The chief loss would be that he could not get the clothes which would fit him and suit him without paying a very much larger sum than he obtained upon them, and to that extent, therefore, he would be injured?—Yes, and there is another thing; they would be driven to borrow from other persons, such as people in their own position in life. I was always ready to throw open my place of business to anybody inquiring about it who had any practical object in view. Some years ago I was invited by the late Mr. Charles Dickens to throw open my place, and he came with Mr. Wills, one evening; an article appeared peared on the subject, in "Household Words," on 6th December 1851, and he spoke of one or two of my customers; one of them that he christened Mrs. Flathers. It so happened that, some short time after that, the woman was telling us what she paid some neighbour for the loan of a very small sum, and another person was telling us something connected with a loan society, how much they were oppressed by fines. After the article appeared I wrote to Mr. Dickens, and thanked him for the article; and I told him of those two instances. This is the letter which he wrote back, which may, perhaps, interest the Committee. It is addressed to Mr. John Dicker, and is dated, "Tavistock House, Tavistock-square, 20th December 1851. Sir, I assure you that I have received your letter with much pleasure, and that it is a great satisfaction to me to have helped to render justice to a deserving body of men." The next paragraph is slightly personal, but, perhaps, I may read it: "You owe me no thanks; on the contrary, I feel indebted to you for your valuable assistance, and for the great intelligence and moderation with which it was rendered. The case you mention occurred to me as a supposititious one, when I was looking at your customers; I have no doubt whatever that Mrs. Flathers would be infinitely worse off with an obliging neighbour than with any pawnbroker whomsoever. I am, sir, faithfully yours, Charles Dickens." They would be driven, of course, to all manner of means to raise the money; and I am sure that those to which they would be driven would be much more expensive means than those which would be afforded by a pawnbroker, even with freedom of contract.

626. Have you had your attention directed to the question whether there is anything unlawful in anybody who does not call himself a pawnbroker, lending money in any way he likes under the Usury Laws?—The law gives him no power of realising in any way, save such as he would obtain by entering into some special contract.

627. Supposing that a person, I will not say keeps an open shop, but lends money and takes goods in security at any rate he likes, is there anything in the Act which is absolutely prohibitory of it?—The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27 says, "Whereas attempts are made to evade the provisions of the said Acts by persons who receive goods and chattels into their possession, and advance money thereon under the pretence that the transaction is a sale and purchase of such goods and chattels, and not a receiving or taking of the same by way of pawn or pledge, and it is expedient to amend the said Acts." Then it goes on to affix the penalty. It defines who pawnbrokers are, and who may lend money.

628. Mr. Charley.] Those people who are not pawnbrokers incur a penalty for not taking out a license, do they not?—Yes; It is in the second clause that the penalty is fixed at 50 l. for trading without the proper license.

629. Chairman.] It is necessary to bring a person within the Act that he must keep "a house, shop, or other place," for the purpose of carrying on this business as an open place for current business; but there is nothing to prevent any individual from lending money under 10 l. on goods and getting any return he likes, if he does not keep an open shop?—That is what I imagine.

630. Under this Act, if there is no contract or engagement on his part to deliver the goods back, he appears not to be liable to a penalty, but if there is a sale, he can give money on the goods if the party chooses to trust him to give them back again?—I suppose he can do so now.

Mr. J. Dicker. 16 June 1870.

631. If there is no expressed or implied agreement to return the goods on receipt of the money, then, of course, the goods can be sold in open shop; that is to say, anyone who keeps an old clothes-shop can buy clothes, if the party chooses to rely upon his goodwill to sell them back again at the end of the week, or at any other time?—Yes, that is the case in the dolly-shops.

632. Is that done to a large extent?—I believe it is.

633. Therefore, the more a man evades the Act, the larger would be his business?—Clearly.

634. Mr. Charley.] Have there been many convictions under this Act?—There have been recently some instances where the full penalty has been enforced; but it is a thing which has never been dealt with properly, There has been no organised system of putting it down in any way.

635. Mr. C. H. Mills.] With regard to those overpluses, I think Mr. Hardaker recommended that any claim for an overplus should be barred at the end of three years, because he spoke of the inconvenience of keeping the goods open?—I do not see any importance at all in that.

636. You would be able to close your books all the same?—Yes; the advantage of it to the pawnbroker at present is, that if the overplus is not claimed until nearly six years, he has had the use of the overplus money during that time.

637. Mr. Hardaker recommended, as far as I could gather, that at the end of three years there should be no power to claim?—Now it is limited to three years from the period of sale, I think, by the Act. Mr. Hardaker's suggestion was, I believe, that it should be a shorter period than that.

638. Mr. Whitwell.] If you were put under the law of free contract, the power to recover should be extended to six years, should it not?—Yes.

639. Mr. T. Hughes.] These two columns, in the paper which you have handed in, I understand to represent the sums for which the articles were pledged, and the sums for which they were sold by Messrs. Debenham?—The first column contains the amount actually advanced, and that, of course, has to be charged with the amount of interest due at the time of sale; and the other is the amount for which they sold, but from which the auctioneer's charges of 5 per cent. have to be deducted. My object in putting those books in is to show that the competition is such that the pawnbrokers lend the full amount of money on goods; and my argument is, that by open competition the rate of interest would also be kept within proper limits

640. Chairman.] Do the public derive much advantage from your records with regard to the recovery of stolen property?—I think that every precaution is taken by pawnbrokers as a rule, and that the idea that they would willingly lend themselves to taking stolen goods, or that they negligently perform their business in taking those things, is a mere popular prejudice against the trade. I have some statements here as regards my own transactions, which will show that the number of pledges given up in that way is very very small indeed. These were papers which were prepared some time ago, when the pawnbroking interest was proposed to be dealt with in another Bill.

641. Why do you believe that that number is so small; do you believe that it bears any proportion to the number of stolen things that are actually taken to pledge?—I think it does. If there was any chance of a large number of stolen goods being in the hands of pawnbrokers that were not found out by the police, their attention would be directed to Messrs. Debenham and Storr's, or some of those places where the goods are sold, and we should have cases continually occurring, whereas they are of very rare occurrence indeed where such things are claimed, when being offered by auction as forfeited goods.

642. Do the police claim any right to examine your books or pledges to see if you have received any goods that are missing?—Not at all; and in this country it certainly cannot be necessary, knowing the integrity with which business is carried on. A pawnbroker would never lend himself willingly to receive stolen goods, because he has to keep them by him 12 months, and to give a ticket. He has the opportunity to buy them if he thought fit, but instances of that kind are not known among pawnbrokers.

643. Mr. Charley.] They do, I suppose, as a matter of fact, sometimes receive goods which are stolen?—From this return which I have in my hand, it appears that out of a total number of 1,334,011 pledges taken in seven years at three pawnbrokers' shops of my own, the probable sum lent on those pledges being upwards of 420,000*l.*, at the average of 6*s.* 4*d.*, as shown in my statement put in, only 53 pledges, representing about 38*l.* 18*s.*, were given up as stolen.

644. Chairman.] Is it your impression that people who steal things do not, as a general rule, take them to pawnbrokers?—They certainly do not, and I have heard that opinion supported very generally by the police too.

645. You think that they would rather sell silver things, for instance, to refiners, and clothes at the clothes-shops, than pawn them?—The large robberies are effected by professional thieves, who take their things to their own regular markets. The most frequent cases I have had are, where persons have stolen things from furnished lodgings, where there have been servants; but in a large number of instances I have been the means of returning property to the owners by stopping it when offered. In my own experience I have had two cases of sacrilege; in one case, where they broke out of a church; and in another, where they stole things from a vestry. In this respect, I think, there is most thorough integrity shown by the trade generally.

646. Are many things stopped at the pawnbrokers' shops, in consequence of the police notices?—Not in consequence of the police notices; they, of course, lead to the detection of some, but the pawnbrokers and pawnbrokers' assistants get that sort of knowledge, which induces them to attach some suspicion on some occasions to the answers given by people. It is not done by reference, because the police lists are so voluminous that reference, in all cases, would be impossible. Hundreds of articles are on the lists on some days; and, therefore, they have to trust to the willingness and ability of the pawnbrokers to detect those people whenever they come in their way.

647. Are many attempts at pledging stopped, as a rule, which are not effected with regard to stolen goods, in consequence of the suspicions of the pawnbroker or his assistants?—There are a great many instances of that kind; but there are some tables, which are possessed by the Liverpool trade, which will show, I believe, that out of those cases where the pawnbrokers have to attend at police courts, a very large per-centage are cases which arise from the stoppage of the goods by the pawnbroker; and that while he appears as a witness, it is by his own act that he has appeared there.

648. Are there many cases in which it has been established against a pawnbroker that he has knowingly taken goods as stolen?—I do not think there has ever been one. I am very anxious, indeed, to express my opinion upon this point, because anything like police interference with the trade would have the effect, I know, of driving a large number of wealthy and influential men out of the trade. I have heard many of them say that they would not follow the trade if they knew that it was the law that a policeman could come into the house to search the books; and the effect of it, no doubt, would be a very bad one.

649. Do you think that the fact that the pawnbroker has to give up stolen goods and lose the money operates to make him very cautious in carrying on his business?—It has that effect; but, in addition to that, the nuisance that we complain of so much in our business is, that we have our assistants taken away on these occasions; I had one of mine the week before last, I think, away the whole week; so that it upsets the whole machinery that you have to carry on your business.

650. Mr. Charley.] There is ample power given by the law to the police to enter your premises, is there not?—Yes, a search warrant may be obtained.

651. Mr. Whitwell.] With regard to the cards, would there be any objection to issuing those cards out of a book, retaining the counterfoil in the book, instead of a loose card, and to the card being made of such paper as cartridges are made of, so as to be really as strong or stronger than a card?—That plan is adopted to this extent that the tickets are all numbered, and the pledges are booked consecutively according to those numbers; but those tickets might be made larger, I think, with advantage, because the small size of them may possibly interfere to some extent with the way in which the ticket is written.

652. Would there be any objection to having the ticket taken out of a book, and to the pawnbroker keeping the counterfoil in a book, instead of a loose ticket?—I cannot see any disadvantage whatever in it; I think it would, on the contrary, be advantageous.

653. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Many of the articles in this sale book, I see, are sold for very much less than they were pledged for; I suppose one column represents the money advanced upon them, and the other column represents the amount for which they are sold?—Yes.

654. I see here a telescope, on which you lent 15*s.*, and which you sold for 2*l.* 2*s.*; are there many such cases as that?—In a case like that, if application was made by the person for overplus we should at once pay it.

655. And if no application was made, you would not pay it?—No.

656. Ther

Mr. J. Dicker.
16 June 1870.

656. There is a case of some picture, on which 15*s.* was lent, which was sold for 1*l.* 9*s.*; in those cases would any notice be given to the party that you had sold the goods for much more than was advanced upon them?—No; but the general result of those sales is, that the pawnbroker loses from them; those sales are not a source of profit to him; of course instances will occur where there is an overplus; but where one such instance does occur, I should say there are hundreds to the contrary.

657. There is one here; 18 pairs of boots pledged for 3*l.* 12*s.*, and sold for 6*l.* 15*s.*, would any notice be given in a case like that?—No; no notice would be given; but in a very large number of cases the persons would apply for the overplus, and only the other day, before we got home from a sale, a person was waiting to receive an overplus; he was present in the room and so he was aware of it; but in a very large number of those cases those persons are not aware of it.

658. You are not required by the law to give any notice, are you?—No.

659. Chairman.] You set off the gain of those that sell for more, against the loss on those that sell for less, I suppose?—That is so.

660. As you cannot get the money from those whose goods sell for less, you do not seek to return the overplus to those whose goods sell for more?—No.

661. Mr. Charley.] The 20th section of the Act says, "In case any such goods or chattels shall be sold for more than the principal money and profit aforesaid, due thereon at the time of such sale, the overplus shall, by every such pawnbroker, be paid on demand"?—Yes; and the books would be immediately placed before them, and they would have the particulars as to the day when the sale took place, and it would be shown to them. They have only to pay a penny for inspecting the books.

662. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] This table before me shows 1,553 redeemed pledges in the month of May 1870, is that correct?—Yes; they were reedemed on one night on the 7th of May. The paper that you have in your hand gives the particulars of one Saturday night's business of the house referred to in the Statement C. which I laid before the Committee the other day.

Mr. George Attenborough, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Attenborough.

663. You are largely engaged in pawnbroking, are you not?—Yes.

664. Have you been so for many years?—About 40 years.

665. Are you the Honorary Secretary of the Metropolitan Pawnbrokers' Protection Society?—Yes.

666. For what purpose is that society established?—If you will allow me I will read the 2nd rule, which will give the objects of the society, and I shall be happy to put in the report which will explain it more fully. It is established "to give mutual advice and warning against the numerous frauds which are continually taking place, and to afford legal assistance to its members in all cases of robbery by servants in connection with their business as pawnbrokers; also against informations or complaints, when it shall be the opinion of the Committee that the members have not offended against the law; and likewise for taking into consideration any subject affecting the general interest of the trade."

667. Has your position brought you in contact with the trade generally in London?—Very much, indeed; perhaps more so than any other person could possibly have been.

668. Has that also led you to consider the operation of the Acts which regulate your business, and the alterations which they wish generally to have introduced into them?—Yes.

669. Have you heard Mr. Dicker's evidence given?—I have heard the greater portion of it.

670. Do you think that the present mode of computing your profit, upon the smaller transactions especially, is unsatisfactory?—I think decidedly so.

671. In what way would you propose to remedy it, or in what way does the trade think that it ought to be remedied?—Speaking for myself, and for the large body of the trade, I should say that we require a monthly rate instead of a fractional one.

672. Would you be satisfied to have as a statutory rate the Irish rate?—As a rate of interest I should; I am not quite clear about the ticket fee; I am not quite sure whether the Irish rate gives a commission or a ticket fee at the time of pledging.

673. With respect to the interest, you would be satisfied with the Irish rate?—Yes.

674. Then you would wish also to have the ticket fee?—I would suggest a penny ticket fee upon all pledges, no matter what the amount. The trouble of taking in a 10*l.* pledge is not greater than for one of 10*s.* or for one of 10*d.*

675. The responsibility is greater, is it not?—I do not know that it is.

676. The responsibility as regards losing the pledge is greater, is it not?—I do not believe that the ticket fee is intended to cover the responsibility; but to cover the trouble and the manual labour of taking in the pledge, and I do not think that a penny is too much; I would, however, make it one uniform rate for every pledge for whatever amount, so as to simplify matters.

677. In the event of having that statutory rate, do you think that it would be necessary that there should be any power of exempting yourselves from it in special cases by freedom of contract?—Certainly; so far as profit or charge is concerned.

678. Would that be for the purpose of meeting all the special risks?—Yes, and for other reasons; I believe that it would be better altogether.

679. Would you extend the freedom of contract to the whole of the business if a party chose to make it under conditions, so that he should well understand that he is not under the statutory rate?—Certainly.

680. Or would it be sufficient if it were limited to certain special circumstances?—I would not place the slightest limit upon the profit of that special contract; I believe that it would be better for both parties, and that the public would then be able to pledge with licensed pawnbrokers in safety that which they have now to get rid of by a forced sale or by deposit with leaving-shops.

681. Do you think that they would get better terms from the regular pawnbrokers than they would would under this illicit system?—I am sure they would.

16 June 1870.

682. Is it your opinion that there is sufficient competition among the pawnbrokers to enable a man to get good terms if freedom of contract were allowed?—Quite sufficient.

683. How many pawnbrokers are there in London?—I believe it is about 425; the House has a return of the number, it is between 420 and 430; Mr. Morley moved for a return recently.

684. Is it your opinion that the business which is carried on, of pledging under 10 l., is profitable as compared with other trades?—Certainly not.

685. Then do you think that the statutory limits prevent your carrying on the business at a profit proportionate to that of other trades in London?—Decidedly; I believe it to be the most unprofitable business in London.

686. Then why do people carry it on?—We are born to it, or are brought up to it, and cannot get out of it.

687. Is it supplemented by other businesses?—We bring in other businesses to supplement it; that is to say, the sale helps the pawnbroking.

688. Is almost every pawnbroker a dealer in goods of some kind?—Yes, everyone is a dealer in goods of some kind, some in clothing, and others in works of art, jewellery, and plate.

689. Is every pawnbroker also a dealer to a greater or less degree in transactions above 10 l?—Where he can get the opportunity, but in some neighbourhoods they have but little opportunity for it; in the West End that is the best part of their business, unquestionably.

690. There they have perfect freedom of contract, have they not?—There they have freedom of contract over 10 l., both for time and price.

691. Are the persons who transact business upon that system, persons of a better station than those who receive small pledges?—They live in a better situation of the town.

692. But are they in a better situation of life, and have they greater capacity for making a good bargain?—One hardly likes drawing such a contrast as that; but I think it may fairly be assumed that persons over 21 years of age, and able to sign their names, have sufficient capacity for such a bargain.

693. Is it your opinion that an improvident person of fortune is just as inconsiderate as an improvident workman in obtaining a loan?—I never find that they are improvident in making a loan; I believe that the pawnbrokers' customers are as sharp as any persons who go to any house of business.

694. Do you think that their eagerness to get money on goods does not make them more improvident as regards the terms of the bargain?—No; they take care of themselves, I am quite sure.

695. Do many persons go away from a pawnbroker's shop in consequence of their thinking that they can get a better bargain elsewhere?—A great many; we are obliged to lend quite up to the hilt, and even above it.

696. Do you lend rather with respect to the value of the goods to the person who deposits them, than to their absolute value?—I speculate upon the chances of their being redeemed, because 95 per cent. of my pledges are redeemed.

697. You speculate rather upon the value of the goods to the depositor, than to the value of the goods in the market?—Yes.

698. Are you protected by that from any loss on the result?—On the 95 per cent. I am; but I lose on the 5 per cent.

699. It might be assumed, probably, that the five per cent. on which you lose are pledges on which the person pledging has been more clever than the person receiving, and the one has been too much for the other?—They do get too much for them, and I know it to my cost.

700. Is there much artifice practised in presenting goods to pawnbrokers to get money upon them?—There are regular manufactories in London of goods made up for "duffing" purposes; that is, for pledging beyond their value; and I think I speak quite in reason when I say that there must be over 10,000 persons always engaged in deceiving pawnbrokers by making and pledging goods for more than they are worth. These goods are sent from London all over England.

701. Is there any law to punish them for those attempts, or is it only a case of caveat emptor?—We do punish them under our society when we can get a case; but it is exceedingly difficult to get a case. At the present time we have two or three men lying in prison for it.

702. At the same time it presents the aspect of an ordinary person purchasing goods, and the vendor looking out for himself, does it not?—Yes, he must look out for himself.

703. Unless you can fix him with a liability for obtaining money under false pretences?—That is the case. They trade habitually upon the pawnbrokers' competition with each other in lending too much.

704. Is it the opinion, generally, of the trade, that there is so much variety in the nature of goods offered for pledge that it would be desirable to have freedom of contract to enable the pawnbroker to deal with all those special cases?—It would be better, certainly.

705. Do you think that that would contribute to the benefit of both the pledger and the pawnbroker?—Yes, it would enable them to pledge bulky articles which they now cannot pledge, because they do not pay a pawnbroker.

706. You are obliged to refuse an article, are you not, if the warehousing would be comparatively costly?—Yes; take, for instance, a chest of drawers, they are rarely worth more than 1 l. to lend upon, and they would pay no pawnbroker at the rate of 4 d. a month, which is all he can now charge.

707. Therefore you are deprived of the opportunity of lending money upon a great variety of goods which otherwise would be pledged?—Yes.

708. What do you think would be necessary to be done, in case there were freedom of contract, to protect the person pledging from being imposed upon by any want of knowledge upon his part of the nature of the transaction?—You may safely leave them to themselves; they will take care of themselves.

709. Would it not be necessary, if there was any statutory rate at all, to take care that a man pledging knew that he was not coming under the statutory rate?—I should certainly advise that no contracts were made with persons under 21 years of age, and that they should sign their names to the contract, and, therefore, the law might fairly assume that they knew what they were doing.

710. In all cases of difference from the statutory rate the rates should be written down, and the person pledging should sign the paper?—Certainly Certainly; and he should not be under 21 years of age, or apparently so.

711. Do you concur in the opinion that the amount of stolen goods disposed of by pledging is very small?—Very small indeed; in the business that I have the year's accounts now before me, I have not had as many as three pledges received in the year and given up to the police as stolen goods.

712. Are there many efforts to pledge stolen goods, which are refused by the pawnbrokers?—Very few.

713. Are there many people sent away because the pawnbroker thinks the transaction is doubtful?—There are some, unquestionably; but I think there are very few indeed. No professional thief and no burglar ever pledges his goods; he knows a better market for them; that is to say, a safer one for himself.

714. Is it your opinion that the income of pledged goods under 5*s.* value is less than the expense of taking them into pledge, if they are redeemed in a short time?—I lose by every pledge that goes out of my house, which is pledged for 5*s.* and under, which does not remain with me more than a month. My working expenses are three halfpence and half a farthing upon every pledge which I take in, and therefore, if I do not get over that, I lose by it.

715. Then why do the pawnbrokers do this kind of business; why do they not generally put an end to it?—They would have to close their houses if they did; and if they did not take in pledges for a month, they would never have them for two months, and at the second month they pay.

716. You mean that when they first receive those pledges, they are always in doubt as to how long they will remain, and therefore they are obliged to take the risk?—Certainly. If I refused a pledge because it might go out in a month, I should never have that which might be with me for two, three, four, or more months. I have here a table of one week's business, showing the respective months during which 1,494 pledges remained in my possession, and which will, I think, show it to the Committee directly.

717. The word "profit" in this table does not mean net profit, but it means gross profit, I presume?—It means gross profit.

718. As this shows a gross profit of 1¼*d.* on the one month pledges, if you deduct your charges from that, it would, in your opinion, yield no net profit?—I should lose a halfpenny by every one of those 1,084 pledges.

719. Is the motive for doing that chiefly the expectation of the pledges remaining more than a month, and the necessity of keeping up your business, and pleasing all comers?—Yes; you will observe that after one month they pay, and then they have been in two months I get about one farthing by each pledge.

720. Is there any opinion entertained by the trade, generally, as to the term of grace after the first month, which is now seven days?—It is seven days, and then we charge another half month; it would be far better if the half months were done away with, and the rate of interest endorsed, at the time of pledging, upon every duplicate which the customers receive.

721. Do you consider that the grace should be limited to the one week after the month?—I should not say that; I would rather give them 10 days, and then begin again and take another month; instead of the half month I would give 10 days, and take a whole one.

722. What is the object of fixing a time, and saying that there should be another time added; why should it not be 40 days in the first instance?—That is what I mean.

723. They do not pay any extra interest for the seven days, do they?—No; it is 38 days, under the present Act.

724. What is the merit of adding seven days of grace to the fixed time?—There is no merit in it; I think it a great demerit; but our forefathers, I suppose, when they drew the Act thought it a meritorious thing; the Act was passed in the year 1800.

725. Then what is your opinion, or the opinion of the trade generally, with reference to the maximum period which is allowed for the redemption before the sale of the pledges?—That it is much too long; I have by me (I was looking at it this morning) 17 months' goods in my house, at the present time unsold, because from December last I have been unable to sell any of the winter goods, and I cannot touch them until about September.

726. Then what is your view with reference to fixing a period for selling the goods?—That it should be a uniform period of six months.

727. Would you allow any power then to give notice not to sell, or would you compel the party, in fact, to renew his pledge?—I think that would be quite useless; they would renew them.

728. Would you give them a right to renew, or would you make it compulsory upon them to redeem, or to submit to a sale?—I should have no objection to a right to renew for six months, but not more than that, because a pawnbroker might intend to close his business; and if you continued that right, for a longer period, he could not shut up.

729. You would have no objection, I presume, provided he paid the interest on for the further six months?—Certainly, there can be no objection to that on the part of any pawnbroker; it would be beneficial to both parties.

730. Would you abolish the three months' notice altogether?—Yes; it is an unnecessary machinery, especially so with a six months' forfeiture.

731. As far as I understand you, the pledger would have an absolute right to continue the pledge, up to 12 months, if he paid the interest?—I do not see much good in it, but I should not at all object to it, and I do not think any of the trade would.

732. If he did not come and renew, at the end of six months, do you mean that you should have an absolute right to sell?—Yes; in the case of pledges under 10*s.*, as we have now.

733. Would you extend the right to sell, at the end of six months, to all pledges?—Yes; but I have not the slightest wish to interfere with the pawner's right to overplus, and to have goods over 10*s.* sold by auction.

734. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] At present are you not obliged to sell everything by auction?—Over 10*s.*, but under 10*s.* we have an absolute right in them, and we sell them as we please.

735. Chairman.] Is there any other change in the law which the trade generally wish to have made, except those which you have stated?—Many of the clauses require great simplification; we cannot understand them; and the fractional interest is exceedingly objectionable.

Mr. G. Attenborough.

736. What you wish is that the law should be consolidated, and re-enacted in a more simple form?—Yes; speaking generally, my own desire would be for freedom of contract in all cases; the Irish rate for an implied rate, and a six months' forfeiture; and there are other things which require simplifying, and making so that the public may understand them as well as the pawnbrokers; they neither of them understand them now.

737. Mr. Serjeant Simon.] Is it not a common thing for children and young persons under 21 years of age, to bring articles to pledge?—We do not take them from persons under 16 years of age.

738. And that is done to a very considerable extent, is it not?—Not in London to a considerable extent; but I have heard that in some of the mining and manufacturing districts it is almost necessary, and that it is done to a considerable extent, as the legal age there is 12 years.

739. How can you make that consistent with your recommendation that no pledge be taken from a person under 21 years of age?—I recommended that there should be no free contract with a person under 21 years of age; because in the one case it is a question of bargain as between the pawnbroker and his customer, and in the other case the statute law rules the profit, and therefore there could be no advantage taken.

740. But I understand you to recommend free trade altogether in the matter?—That is in all cases and all pledges, if the pawnbroker and customer agree upon it; but I think that there should be an implied rate of interest, in case no contract is entered into.

741. But supposing that a pawnbroker refused to accept a pledge upon the statutory rate, and would only take it upon the terms of free contract, would not the pledger be totally helpless to resist it?—He could go to the next pawnbroker, and perhaps he would treat him better. It is perfectly free for them to go where they please.

742. But as you are leagued together in association for your mutual protection, would you not come to an understanding that under certain circumstances you would refuse to accept a statutory rate?—It is quite impossible to do it, the nature of a business like ours could never hold people to such a contract for a single week. If they entered into such a contract to-day, they would break it to-morrow.

743. What is the number of the members of the association of which you are secretary?—It is 224.

744. Are those 224 confined in any particular part of London, or are they spread over London?—They are all over London, and in fact all over the London postal district, at Croydon and elsewhere.

745. Would they not be sufficiently powerful to exercise the influence of excluding poor people from the benefit of pledging?—Certainly not.

746. Do you think that if the 425 pawnbrokers agreed together never in any case, or in a certain class of cases, to accept a pledge, except upon the terms of free contract, they would break that understanding?—It would be impossible to get them to agree together; you could not get 425 men to agree upon any system of business.

747. But if it would be conducive to the interests of the trade, and produce an increase of their profits to have free contract, do you not think that that would be a sufficient inducement to them to agree?—Certainly not, competition would always beat them.

748. Competition between whom?—Between pawnbrokers generally. Besides, such a contract as that would be outside the rules of our society, and it would not be entertained for a moment.

749. But it would not be difficult, if you had a state of the law favouring your views, to have an arrangement of terms, would it?—If they did so they would very speedily have to find a new secretary, for I would be no party to such a compact, nor do I believe that one in 50 of them would.

750. With reference to the overpluses, does any considerable proportion of the pawnbroker's business arise from unclaimed overpluses?—Speaking personally, I sustain a severe loss on my sales.

751. Do you know of instances of cases in which the unredeemed overpluses form a portion of the profits of the business?—On the balance of the sales generally I should say that most pawnbrokers have to sustain a loss rather than a profit. Of course, there may be individual pledges, as I have heard here to-day, which may afford a profit; but perhaps one at a profit will have to meet something like 10 at a loss, and the balancing will come wrong.

752. Are there many unclaimed overpluses?—Speaking personally, I have very few. The pledgers know when an article is cheap, and they come for the overplus, and it is not an uncommon thing for persons to see the sale of their own pledges at the auction sale, and thus know what they fetch. They are publicly sold and publicly advertised, and catalogues are issued free of cost with the number of each pledge attached to it, so that any person may know his own pledges. I have here a bundle of my catalogues which will show you the plan upon which they are arranged.

753. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Were they advertised?—In the daily papers, "The Times," "The Daily News," and so forth. The auctioneers advertise them.

754. Mr. T. Hughes.] Those are not your books, which are put in, are they?—Those were Mr. Dicker's.

755. You generally make gains on your sales do you not?—I am sorry to say that most of the things sell for much less than I lend upon them. This is my overplus book (producing a book); it contains simply the amount lent, with no interest and no expenses.

756. Mr. Charley.] You used the expression "leaving-shops;" are leaving-shops the same as "dolly-shops"?—Yes, they are all the same.

757. Mr. T. Hughes.] Have you any knowledge upon which you can rely with regard to the illegal trade in London?—I can give you a very good idea of what the system of business is.

758. I suppose you contemplate that if we can do anything towards stopping that illegal trade we should do it?—Freedom of contract will do more than anything else to stop it, in my opinion.

759. Supposing that we did not see our way to recommend that freedom of contract, can you give us any suggestion as to how it could be stopped?—I should really look upon it as almost hopeless.

hopeless. Their system of business is that they profess to buy the article brought to them, and they keep it a month, or in some cases only a week. The person can buy it back again at a profit varying from 2 d. to 4 d. in the 1 s.; so that what I should charge 1 d. for, they charge from 2 d. to 4 d. for; and what I should keep 12 months, they sell within a month.

760. Chairman.] Then why do people go to such shops when yours are open?—Because they are principally a class of goods which we cannot take at the present prices; and again, a great deal of their business is done after hours and on Sundays.

761. Mr. Charley.] They are, practically, unlicensed pawnshops, are they not?—We hardly like to call them so, but it is the fact.

762. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you know the extent of those shops; are they as numerous as pawnbrokers' shops?—They abound in low neighbourhoods, and are carried on under various guises, such as rag shops, chandlers' shops, old metal shops, and such like.

763. Are they very numerous?—Very.

764. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you take any means to let persons know when there is an overplus?—No; they know how to look out for themselves as a rule, and I think the law assumes that they will look after it themselves if it is worth having; but they know that it is not worth coming for. I do not think I have an overplus on one pledge in 50.

765. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What kind of goods are those which the "duffers," as you call them, generally sell?—Every kind of article, but principally such things as plated jewellery and gold chains, and especially jargoons for diamonds, and such like; also every description of goods bought at auctions and repledged again at a higher price.

766. And that will account, probably, for the excessive amounts which are lost on those kind of goods?—That will partly account for it.

767. I find here that there is a loss of 356 l. on 12 articles?—Yes; you must remember that a pawnbroker standing behind his counter has to advance money upon every description of article which is made, and therefore he must know the value of everything between a flat iron and a diamond; and the consequence is, that he only gets a smattering of judgment upon everything, so that he very frequently gets done, and loses his money.

768. Mr. Whitwell.] To what business does your evidence as to the 95 per cent. of goods redeemed apply?—In East-street, Walworth.

769. Are you only speaking of that business?—I am only speaking of that. I quote that because it is an essentially low business, and I thought the Committee would like to have the evidence on a low business; it is the lowest business which I have.

770. Supposing that you had not restricted it to that house, what would you state with reference to the redemptions in the whole of your businesses?—They are over 90 per cent., and I have no doubt that it would come to over 95 per cent., though I have not tried; in amount they generally range about the same.

771. I believe you are not bound to sell by auction those articles which are pledged at a less amount than 10 s.?—No.

772. How do you sell them; do you generally put them into your sale shop?—I keep a separate establishment altogether for the sale of apparel, quite away from my pawnbroking business, and I sell them there.

773. On those articles do you make a profit?—On some of them I do; but there is just this difference, that at auctions I sell principally to dealers, and in my shop I sell to wearers, and therefore I get somewhat more profit.

774. Then, although 10 s. seems a small amount, a large portion of the goods pledged with you are under 10 s.?—A large number of them would be under 10 s.

775. And what proportion in value?—I do not think I could tell you, but I could give you the number; it is a low business, and I should think more than three-fourths of them would be 10 s. or under; that is what we term not "auction pledges."

776. On those articles which come into your possession at 10 s. and under, do you generally realise a profit when they are not redeemed?—No, I do not.

777. Your shopmen must be bad estimaters of the value of the articles, must they not?—Competition beats us in that; and we speculate upon the 95 per cent. of them being redeemed.

778. Now we come to the sales of the more valuable articles; who buy the articles at those auctions?—Regular dealers.

779. Not the public?—Yes, dealers and the public. You will find the room crowded at Debenham and Storr's, or Johnson and Dymond's, and a great many of them are bought by those "duffers" to pledge again.

780. At those public auctions where dealers are purchasers, they seldom allow the public a fair chance of buying, do they?—It is perfectly open and free as can be.

781. Does not the pawnbroker himself buy when he sees an article going at a low price?—He must do so in self-defence.

782. So that some of the articles sold by you at a loss on your catalogue may be resold by by you in your sale shop at a profit, may they not?—Yes, possibly; but then there are the expenses of doing it; there would finally be a very homœopathic dose of profit, I assure you.

783. With reference to giving notice to persons where their articles have been sold at a largely increased value, if you ask for freedom of contract, you certainly ought to give a fair compensation to the pledger. I find an article here pledged at 7 l. and sold for 17 l. There is no law, is there, to compel you to intimate to the pledger that you got 10 l. out of that?—Perhaps I could take that book and find the same person pledging an article for 17 l. where the thing was sold for 7 l. We have now an action pending in our society in which a person tendered five duplicates for overplus. Three of them sustained a severe loss, and two of them realised a profit; he demanded the profit on those which paid a profit, and refused to make a set-off of the loss. He summoned the pawnbroker, and the magistrate has given it against us. Our society have taken out a case, and it is now waiting for trial before the judges as to whether we have the power to set off.

784. But they were all separate transactions, were they not?—Yes, but they were all with one man.

785. What clause in the Act induced you to think think that you had the power to make a set-off?—Nothing in our Pawnbrokers Act would give it us, of course; I am subject to the ruling of the right honourable Chairman, who is learned in the law, but I think the common law gives it to us. We are going to try it, at any rate.

786. Still it is possible that the man may never have pledged any other article with you but this 7 l. diamond ring, is it not?—It is possible; but if he has the power for coming for an overplus, why does he not exercise that, and as he has three years in which to claim the overplus, he will doubtless do so.

787. Chairman.] I suppose the difficulty of the case is that the statute makes it imperative upon the magistrate to order the overplus to be paid over; but that it does not give the magistrate the same summary power to order the deficiency to be returned?—I must not go into the legal question; I simply give you the facts.

788. The present law is against you, is it not?—It is pending trial. We think that it will turn up in our favour, but we may be wrong.

789. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] I suppose there is no law to prevent your applying to a person to make up a loss, is there?—We know that we can do it, but unfortunately it is never worth doing. We know that we should have our expenses to pay, and get no money.

790. Chairman.] Then would you claim, if the decision is against you, to have the Act amended in that respect?—We should ask for it; I am afraid we could not claim it; but if it is once ruled under the common law that we have a right of set-off, we do not ask for anything else. That matter is still pending.

791. If there were freedom of contract, he would have six years, would he not?—As far as I am personally concerned, I would not mind giving them 60 years, because they have seldom anything to receive.

792. Do you think that it would be an advantage that there should be some law giving an equally summary remedy to recover the deficit in cases of fraudulent pledges?—It might be desirable for pawnbrokers that that should be defined more clearly; but I think that it would be of very little use to them; they never could find their customer, and if they did he would be worth nothing.

793. Is not the magistrate the person who has jurisdiction in all those matters, except in the particular matter of your calling upon the person to make good the deficit?—That is done by the county courts; it used to be done entirely by the magistrates, but since the establishment of the county courts a great deal has been taken out of the magistrates' hands; for instance if I damage goods, the pawnbrokers' law gives the remedy, but the owners prefer going to the county court.

794. Under the Act the whole jurisdiction over pawnbrokers is vested in the magistrates, is it not?—Yes; but they do not exercise it now.

795. Do they decline to exercise it?—The people go to the county court instead of summoning us for any damage which may occur to the pledge, and I do not blame them for it.

796. Why do they go to the county court instead of going, under the Act, to the magistrate?—They think it more simple, but they do sometimes go to the magistrate; for instance, I had a case brought to me this morning, in which an article has been redeemed by affidavit, or declaration regularly signed by the magistrate; it was a scarf pledged for 4*s.*; the parties say that the person who redeemed it by affidavit was not entitled to it, and, therefore, they have summoned the pawnbroker, and he is ordered by the magistrate to pay 16*s.*, although he has his affidavit perfectly clear; the magistrate has given two days to consider it, and I have called a special meeting of the committee to-morrow morning to take the case into consideration, to see whether this affidavit will really stand the test, or not.

797. But is the ground of the magistrate's decision negligence in taking in the pledge?—No; he takes it generally that it does not free the pawnbroker from liability.

798. Mr. T. Hughes.] Then what is the use of it?—It does not appear to be of much use.

799. Chairman.] I suppose the declaration is not made by the owner?—That is it. Sometimes two persons will come to pledge together, and one therefore gets the full knowledge of the other's pledge, and they have but to come and ask for an affidavit, and we are compelled to give it; we have no power of refusal; then they take it before a magistrate, and he signs it, and they come and redeem it, and we are liable. That case is pending now; 16*s.* has to be paid for a 4*s.* pledge.

800. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Why has 16*s.* to be paid?—That was the value which the person put upon it; those things are something like railway accidents, they always put a fancy price on when there is anything lost.

801. Chairman.] Would you claim that the magistrate, if he interfered at all, should undertake to determine whether the person making the declaration was the real owner, so as to exempt the pawnbroker?—The pawnbroker certainly ought to be exempted, but it is a very difficult question to say how he is to be exempted; I think some mode could be devised to do it.

802. It is held, is it not, that he must give the goods up under the declaration unless he can produce the real owner, to show that the declaration was wrongly obtained?—The pawnbroker must give up the goods, and he must supply the declaration.

803. Would he be bound to give up the goods under the declaration if he showed that the declaration was not made by the real owner?—But he never can do that; if the person says (as in this case), "That is my scarf," I could not say that it is not his.

804. Is there anything further that you wish to add?—I hold in my hand a nine-years' return of another business, the books of which I have verified. It is exceedingly simple, and it will show the unprofitable character of the business.

805. Mr. T. Hughes.] You appear not to have learned it by experience, because you seem to be constantly purchasing new businesses?—The business to which the honourable Member refers was a small business which I could take, and which did not require much attention. I would ask whether the honourable Member would think it a fair return when I say that out of 4,000 l. I can scarcely net for myself 200 l., after taking five per cent. for my money.

806. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you ever taken out from a list of the bankrupts for 12 months, the number of pawnbrokers who have become bankrupts?—There are now in London about 420 pawnbrokers, which, if you look at the large number number of the inhabitants of London, is not a great number, being perhaps less in proportion than any other trade in London. During the last 20 years I can put my finger upon more pawnbrokers who have died insolvent, or been bankrupt, than of any other trade in London in proportion, taking the number at 420. I am of course arguing upon the doctrine of proportions.

807. Chairman.] What happens with regard to their stock when they become bankrupt?—The pledgers' interest is especially reserved by the Act of 1800; the business is almost always bought by another pawnbroker, and the pledgers' rights are entirely reserved.

808. Then their insolvency only applies to any other transactions?—To those they owe money to. A great many of us have to do business (and I do myself partly) on borrowed money.

809. Mr. T. Hughes.] In the year 1865, these expenses per pledge were 2¼ d.; in 1861, they were 3¾ d.; what is the reason that the expenses per pledge vary so very considerably?—If you look at the number of the pledges that were taken in 1864, it was 66,000; and in 1865, it was 90,000; and I have no doubt that that was done by the same number of hands, simply by getting more work out of the same number of hands; consequently the pawnbroker would not increase his expenses there very largely.

810. But it is just the contrary as regards the two years at which I am looking. In 1861, when the expenses per pledge were 3¾ d., the number of pledges taken being 56,000; and in 1864, they are 71,000; can you explain that?—That is the year in which he commenced business, and his expenses would be naturally rather heavier.

811. Then he runs up to 3¼ d. again in 1869, does he not?—Perhaps the expense of living then was rather heavier, or something of that sort. I can speak as to the truth of that statement, because I have verified it from the man's books, which are exceedingly well kept, but I cannot go into the particulars.

812. Chairman.] Have you anything more to add to your evidence?—With regard to that case as to which I told the Committee that it was now pending for overplus, the pledger took out summonses for penalties which would amount to something like 30*l.*, as well as the amount of the overplus to be paid, 10*l.* on each case. I was asked a question, some time since, by a member of this Committee, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, in reference to the insurance of pledges. I do not know whether the Committee would like to have my opinion upon that. I have looked at the question with a very great deal of care, and it seems to me to be an exceedingly difficult one to deal with.

813. In what way?—It has been said that the pledger's risks ought to be insured in pawnbrokers' stocks; that is, if a person pledges an article, it ought to be insured for him against fire; but I do not myself know why a pawnbroker should be placed in a different position from any other bailee of goods. I think he ought not to be; and if he is placed in a different position, he ought to be placed in a better, because in his case the owner of the goods has received a large portion of the value, and in many cases more than the value, whereas the wharfinger, or auctioneer, or any other bailee, gives no portion of the value; and in the case of a fire, it is an actual loss.

814. It would be a mere question of the pawnbroker actually charging more, and insuring in gross, would it not?—That would be so; he must charge higher for it, and there must be the amount of risk declared at the time of pledging, which I think no insurance company would take.

815. He would be only able to insure the value of the goods so far as they were lent upon, I presume?—Then he insures only his own interest in them.

816. He does that already, does he not?—He insures his own interest now; but it has been said that the owner's risk ought to be insured.

817. To enable him to do that it would be necessary to declare the value of the goods at the time he pledged them, would it not?—Yes; but there are features so difficult about it that I doubt whether any insurance company would take the policy.

818. Mr. Whitwell.] But the Court has held that you are not liable, has it not?—Yes; but a Member of Parliament said to me, a short time ago, at a meeting held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, that the pawnbrokers' risks ought to be insured. Supposing that an evil-disposed person were to pledge a number of articles at a pawnbroker's, and insure them all, at his own value, and cause a fire to take place at his premises, he would reap a very large profit.

819. Mr. C. Mills.] But he would make himself liable to trial for felony, would he not?—Yes, but a fire would be very easily caused. I do not myself think that any insurance company would take the insurance. I have looked at the question, and have drawn up a system, but the question presents great difficulties.

820. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you insure your own risk?—I insure my own risk, to the amount which I lend upon my pledges, and an estimated sum for interest due.

821. Chairman.] You have no means of measuring the surplus value, and insuring that, and you think that it would be liable to great abuse?—I do; further, if they had to pay at the time of pledging I do not believe one in 100 would pay the insurance upon it.

822. That would be a necessary condition, would it not?—It would be a necessary condition; no pawnbroker could insure his customers' risks unless they were declared. Then a good deal has been said about the fractional rate of interest.

823. Mr. T. Hughes.] But it is always overcharged, is it not?—Lord Denman held that where it was a fraction of a farthing, the pawnbroker was entitled to charge the whole farthing. In my dealings I have ever bound myself (and I think every respectable pawnbroker would do so) to the fractional rate of interest.

824. Chairman.] Do you mean that you charge the fractional rate, up to the last farthing, and if the fraction goes into another farthing you charge the whole farthing?—I do myself, but I do not think that any pawnbroker thoroughly understands the calculation of the rates of interest, and I do not believe any member of the Committee could calculate them, nor could I calculate them myself.

825. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Can you tell me the reason why the 93,000 pledges taken in, in 1869, should cost 474*l.* more than 96,000 pledges taken in, in 1865, there being, in 1865, a profit of 374*l.*, and a profit of only 175*l.* in 1869?—

1869?—I do not think I dare go into the particulars, as it is not an account of my own business, but I know that it is truthful.

826. Mr. T. Hughes.] As it stands it only makes you wonder?—I can see the weak point. It really does look peculiar, but I cannot explain it; my own opinion is, that the pawnbroker lost more heavily upon his goods that year, and put the loss down to his expenses, as I think he would be justified in doing.

827. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it your opinion that pledges should not be taken by any party (I do not refer to London merely, but to other towns in the country) when the age of the pledger is less than 16?—Personally, I should say that they never ought to be pledged when the pledger is under 16.

828. Chairman.] Is the time of keeping the houses open satisfactory at present, or is there a desire to have the hours altered?—There is a desire, amongst the generality of us, very much to diminish the hours, because the short hours system, as it is now called, is popular. I should be disposed to make it from eight to seven all the year round, although I think the principle of closing any house of business by statute is bad; but still I do not object to it.

829. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] I suppose that the large amount of your business occurs in the evening?—No; more in the mornings. On Saturday evening there is a great deal done. I think from eight to seven o'clock would be very good hours, except on Saturdays, when it is quite necessary to extend the time of closing to 11.

Mr. JOHN ASHBRIDGE TELFER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. A. Telfer.

830. Chairman.] ARE you a Pawnbroker?—I am.

831. Do you carry on an extensive business?—I carry on a business which we should describe, I think, as a medium kind of business, in St. George-street, East, and in Whitechapel also.

832. Have you a statement of the business, showing the profit and loss upon one of your businesses?—I have (producing a statement). I show an entire capital of 9,208 l. invested in a business in which 8,201 l. is required in the pawnbroking business, and 1,007 l. is required for a stock of the kind which you have heard described before, composed of forfeited pledges and of purchased goods. A great many goods are purchased for the purpose of suiting customers for whom the pawnbrokers' goods are not suitable,

833. What is the gross income from this business?—The gross income from this business was 1,613 l. 15 s. 9 d.

834. What were the expenses?—The expenses amounted to 852 l. 14 s. 9 d. There was 684 l. spent in carrying the business on, leaving for losses on the sales of unredeemed pledges, 167 l. 10 s. 4 d.; the loss on the stolen goods delivered up in the course of the year was 14 s. Then I have charged the business with five per cent. interest on the capital employed, showing a net profit after that of 3·27 per cent. on the capital, or 300 l., so that this 300 l. will show the Committee the difference between carrying on the business and investing the money at five per cent., which I think I could easily do.

835. Dividing that profit between the pawnbroking and the retail sale business, what do you consider has been the profit on the one, and on the other?—I have taken the proportion between the amounts of capital occupied in the one and the other, and I have taken eight-ninths for the pawnbroking, and one-ninth for the sale department.

836. Upon what principle do you consider that one-ninth only would be sufficient to conduct all your sale business?—I believe that if I did no sale business, the business could not be conducted with 20 l. a year less expenses, inasmuch as the sale is principally carried on in the leisure time which the men would otherwise have, our business being one in which a great deal more is transacted on Monday and Saturday than in the other part of the week.

837. What is the establishment necessary for carrying on such a sale business as that mentioned in the balance-sheet?—The shop is upwards of 30 feet long, and in it we have a jewellery part and an outfitting warehouse. The same men do it all. All the purchases which are made are made over the counter from wholesale dealers.

838. Then the retailing must require a shopman, or somebody, I presume?—They are all in the same shop; and consequently, when a customer comes into the sale department, one of the men leaves the other counter and attends to him.

839. But supposing that you had no pawnbroking business, how many shopmen would you require to conduct this sale business?—One shopman and a lad.

840. Then the necessary expenses would be a shop, and a salesman for the sale business?—They would.

841. That would come to more than 94 l. 14 s. 9 d., would it not?—It would; I acknowledge that.

842. Probably it would come to 194 l., would it not?—The fact is that the two businesses are carried on together at a smaller expense than the two businesses could be carried on at separately; were they separated the pawnbroking would swallow up nearly all, or within 20 l., I should think, of all that I have put down, and I daresay the sale would cost 200 l. a year.

843. On your assumption the expenses for the sale business are 94 l. 14 s. 9 d.; and there is a net profit, after paying the interest of capital on the sale business, of 126 l.?—Yes.

844. That would be at the rate of 12·61 per cent. upon the capital, would it not?—Yes.

845. And the pawnbroking business, on the assumption that the expenses are 758 l., yields a net profit of 173 l., or 2·1 per cent., does it not?—Yes.

846. And if it were re-adjusted, still there would be a great difference between the profit on the two businesses, would there not?—There would be always a great difference between the profit of the one and of the other.

847. Do you consider that the net profit of 2·1 per cent. is not an ordinary trade profit?—I believe that the whole of the profit on a pawnbroker's business is much below what an ordinary retail tradesman conducting business with transactions averaging as mine do 6 s. 3 d. a piece, ought to earn by the investment of his capital.

848. A tradesman

848. A tradesman having a business requiring a capital of 8,200 l., you think would make more out of it in the ordinary way than 173 l.?—I think so, with the ordinary success which a tradesman might expect in the ordinary course of business.

849. Have you heard the evidence which has been given by the two preceding witnesses?—I have.

850. Do you concur generally in the view they have taken of the state of the law applicable to your trade?—I do, except in one point, I think I might suggest another consideration with regard to the method which might be recommended of increasing the profit on the pawnbroking transactions, which would address itself to the defect which has been pointed out in the manner of assessing it at present; I have taken out a week's business, and I delivered in one week 1,342 pledges. On an average, the costs of those pledges was 2½ d. a piece, and 795 out of the 1,342 failed to pay the 2½ d. But if, as has been put before the Committee by another witness, it is hardly fair to charge every pledge, whether high or low, with the same sum for expenses, I will take it in another way; it costs 3½ per cent. to lend the money, that is to say, I lend 21,000 l. in the course of the year, and every 100 l. of that costs me 3 l. 10 s. to lend it; then I think that a pledge that does not pay at the rate of 3½ per cent. produces a loss to me, whether that pledge be a high one or whether it be a low one. If I take in a pledge for 4 l. and only receive the legal charge of 1 s. 2 d., and that remains in only one hour, I think that that does not pay for the trouble and expense of keeping the shop open to take it in.

851. Mr. T. Hughes.] Surely that would apply to all businesses if you took a single transaction, would it not?—I think not.

852. Chairman.] You do not mean, I presume, that the single transaction is to pay, but the rate of the single transaction?—I might make it clear perhaps by saying that if the whole business consisted of such transactions I should be a very large loser at the end of the year.

853. You mean, therefore, that the rate of charge for such transactions, however numerous they might be, would not make them profitable?—I am certain it would not; and that is the principle, in the second clause in our Act, which in my opinion it would be just to act upon. The minimum time, as stated in the second clause of the Act, for which interest should be charged, is one month, and I have no doubt that the idea of the Legislature in settling that minimum time of one month was the supposition that that would pay us for the working expenses of the transactions. Now on one month the interest is only 1⅔rds per cent.; there is the ticket fee which may amount to another half per cent., making about, we will say, 2¼ per cent.; therefore I consider that if a pledge costs me 3½ per cent. working expenses to take it in, every pledge ought to pay me, at least, its working expenses, 3½ per cent., or about two months' interest. If I made a minimum of two months in my charge of interest on pledges, no pledge then would create a great loss, but they would nearly all meet the working expenses; at the same time, of course, the poor who have to leave their pledges a long time would pay no more, because if they allowed the pledge to remain two months, there would only be the two months' charge, and if they allowed it to remain longer it would only be in proportion to the length of time that they allowed it to remain, while I should make the improvident, that is to say, the people who pledge and take their things out in a short time again, pay a fair proportion of the expense to which they put me.

854. Would not that compulsory charge of two months, on a pledge for 8 l., for example, be very hard upon a person who merely wanted to pledge for one month?—I think not; if I charge two months' interest, which would be 4 s., it is really an extremely small recompense for the handling of anything worth 8 l.; an appraiser would probably charge 8 s. for valuing it, which we have to do at the beginning.

855. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You do not deny that upon six months or a year it is profitable?—If we could take in the long pledges, without the short ones, it would, in my opinion, be perfectly profitable and satisfactory; but the mischief is that we have to take in about three one month's pledges in order to get the fourth which is to remain in longer.

856. If that 4 l. pledge at 1 s. 2 d. stays in for a year, that pays you at about the rate of 18 per cent., does it not?—No; it only pays 15 per cent., exclusive of the ticket money, but if it remains for a year, I am perfectly content with it.

857. Therefore, supposing that the rate was raised on the first month, that would take away all your objection, would it not?—Yes, it would; excepting that there would be an additional charge when it had been in 12 months. If I charged an additional sum for the ticket, then the person having a pledge in for three months would pay more than he does now; whereas, if we simply charged two months as the minimum charge, it would be no extra charge whatever on the old pledges, while it would make the new ones pay something like their working expenses.

858. Chairman.] Then you would rather have a larger sum, and give everybody under the statutory rate the right of pledging for two months for the minimum sum?—Yes; that is what I, personally, should like; but in the debates which have occurred upon this subject in the trade, we have come to the conclusion that it would be an easier plan to the public, and that they would feel a less shock, if we made a larger rate of interest in the whole, and left those monthly pledges still to pay but a small proportion of what they cost; that is to say, if we adopted the Irish rate, people would not be shocked with it, whereas if we charged a large initial charge for every pledge, it would appear as if we were doubling our profits. Some taxes are levied, I believe, or continue to be levied, at any rate, not because they are good in themselves, but because people are used to pay them, and prepared to pay them, and, consequently, they pay them without grumbling. In our own case, the adopting of the Irish rate would satisfy the pawnbrokers, and it would not cause the shock to the public which a large initial charge would be likely to do.

859. Is not your proposal, insisting upon everybody having a two months' engagement, rather different from that which has been urged upon the Committee, namely, freedom of contract?—I should argue for the completion of the abolition of the Usury Laws, so as to allow a pawnbroker to make a free contract in whatever way he pleased, pleased, so long as it was thoroughly understood by the person with whom he made it.

860. Ought not the statutory rate approach as nearly as possible in elasticity to freedom of contract?—The statutory contract, if made in the present manner, obliges me to allow the pawner to terminate the contract before it has had time to pay itself. Any minimum rate which would pay us for small transactions that were short, would of necessity become oppressive in the subsequent months, which do not produce a repetition of the labour.

861. Why so?—I will illustrate it. Suppose we said that a penny per month should be the charge for 2 s.

862. Is not the true solution of the question that everybody should pay for what he wants as nearly as possible, and that he should therefore pay a minimum rate upon the short transaction which would not make it a loss to you, while he should not be carried into a long transaction?—That is precisely my idea; I think that the person pledging an article for 2 s. should pay a halfpenny for the ticket and a penny for the interest, but that that should be able to run for two months. Then, if the third month was entered upon, there would be only another halfpenny; but still this is only my own personal idea as to following the theoretical justice of the case. I should be perfectly content that the Irish rate should be adopted, and I think the public would be satisfied too.

863. There being two things, the one the taking of the pledge at a certain cost, and the other the continuing it at a particular rate of interest, ought they not to be kept separate, and a minimum charge made for the first transaction which is to pay you, and then if the pawner continues the pledge, should he not be able to continue it at a reasonable rate of interest?—I see no objection to it if a larger charge than we have at present for ticket money were adopted.

864. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Since you make rather a loss than a profit on the small pledges, would it not be a good thing to make a rule that you should not receive those pledges except for a certain time?—We have no means of binding the pledger to allow the pledge to remain in for a certain time; he lets it remain in as long as he pleases, and it would be very inconvenient to the pledger if it were otherwise.

865. Chairman.] I understand you to concur generally in the views which have been already expressed to the Committee; have you anything further to state to the Committee?—I prepared a roll, similar to Mr. Dicker's roll, but giving the several days of the week, showing to some extent the difference between Saturday and all the rest of the days of the week; and there is a statement which embodies that; it might be useful, perhaps, if I left this in the hands of the clerk.

866. We understand generally that there is a great difference between the number of transactions on a Saturday and those on the other days in the week?—Yes, and that is the secret of my being able to conduct the sale business at so small an expense in my shop, because the men who are necessary to conduct Saturday's and Monday's business have much leisure time in the other parts of the week.

867. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Is it the case that people carry things to pledge on Monday, and take them out on Saturday?—Yes; a great many poor people have no accommodation for keeping things in safety at home.

868. Mr. C. H. Mills.] That is a profitable business, surely?—No, that is not profitable; every pledge costs me 3½ per cent. to take in for working expenses for men and wages. If a man pawns a watch, or a coat, for 1 l., he can redeem it for the payment of sixpence, which is about 2¼ per cent., and if my business consisted entirely of transactions of that kind I should not realise above three-quarters of my expenses.

869. If a man pledges for 2 s. on the Monday, and takes the article out on the Saturday, what, in the course of the year, do you make by that?—It may be run to a very large per-centage if taken in that manner.

870. You make 4 s. 4 d., do you not?—I do; but it costs me 2½ d. every time I serve him, and consequently you must multiply that 2½ d. by 52, giving 10 s. 10 d. as the working expenses.

871. Mr. T. Hughes.] How do you get at that cost?—I arrive at the cost of 2½ d. on each of my pledges by dividing the working expenses shown by the number of pledges taken in in the course of the year; if I have taken in (as I have) nearly 70,000 pledges in the course of the year, and that has cost 850 l., the 850 l. divided by 70,000 will give, as nearly as possible, 2½ d. per transaction. Therefore, I say, that it costs me 2½ d. to serve a person.

872. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Then, every week he brings it back, it is so much the greater loss to you because it is so much greater expenditure of labour?—If it were merely the interest of money, it would be a different thing, but I do not charge the man the interest of the money. These working expenses do not embrace that at all; if I charged for the use of the money, 4 s. 4 d. would be a very large multiplication of that; but what I state as working expense is merely labour, and it is a matter of indifference to me as regards that whether the man has any money at all. If the man had no money at all, those transactions would each cost me about 2½ d. They cost me 5 per cent. on the money lent, if I reckon the interest of the money as well as the working expenses.

873. He, then, is the worst customer whom you can have, is he not?—He is the worst customer whom I can have, except the man who leaves his goods altogether at a high price; but that is a matter which is so much under our own control that the Legislature can never remedy it; the six months' forfeiture may alleviate it.

874. How many officials are you obliged to keep to conduct your business?—Two respectable men of great experience, one young man, two boys; that is, a senior and a junior lad, and a housekeeper.

875. You put down your rates and taxes at 42 l., and the rent at 80 l.; that seems to me to be very excessive; I do not take this as a balance-sheet, because you appear to have estimated a number of things?—None of this is estimated except repairs, sundries, and rent; the rent is obliged to be an estimate, because it is a freehold.

876. I see "Sundries," (say) "20 l.," "Rent," (say) "80 l.;" I take those to be estimates, and if this be a balance-sheet, those ought not to be estimates, and you should not put this in as a balance-sheet. If those are estimated sums, I should like to know how many of the other sums put down there are estimates?—Nothing but those to which the word "say" is put; if I had prepared a full statement of those items, I daresay I do not exaggerate when I say that there are 500 items in the "Sundries."

877. Chairman.] Have you anything more to say?—I have brought two auction sales books if the Committee would like to see them, but the result is very much the same as that shown by previous witnesses.

Mr. J. A. Telfer. 16 June 1870.

Mr. William Nathan, called in; and Examined.

878. Chairman.] Have you heard the evidence given by the witnesses to-day?—Yes.

879. Do you generally concur in what they have stated with reference to the operation of the Act regulating your trade?—I do.

880. Is your business a considerable one?—Yes.

881. Is it in pledges of large or small value?—It is what is called a "running" business, it is amongst the working classes.

882. Then you have a great many pledges of small value, I presume?—Yes.

883. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Where do you carry on your business?—In Limehouse; I have two houses of business.

884. Chairman.] Have you a statement of the out-turn of your business for the year?—I have.

885. What is the rate of profit over and above the expenses on the pawnbroking business?—The net earnings in my case are much more favourable than in the cases of many of the trade. I am not answerable for the calculation which has been made by somebody else connected with the Committee, but, according to the figures which I have furnished, it is 9 per cent.

886. Is that allowing any interest upon the capital?—No.

887. Then, if you allow five per cent. interest, the profit over and above that will be four per cent., will it not?—Yes.

888. Do you do any sale business?—Yes.

889. What is the profit upon the sale business?—It is about 400*l.* a year.

890. What is the per-centage of profit upon the capital employed in the sale business?—The per-centage in that case would be about 23 per cent.

891. Is that also not deducting any interest upon the capital?—That is not deducting any interest upon the capital.

892. Then, it would seem from that, that the pawnbroking business is below the average of retail businesses in other respects?—Yes, in the small transactions; and, in fact, in the general run of the business, I believe that there are no businesses, having the same amount of capital, that pay so small a rate of return as our business does. Most businesses get their goods upon credit, and most of them do not pay for their goods until they are sold; but in our case, we are always obliged to find the capital before we can do any business at all.

893. Therefore, unless people had the assistance of capital, they would not be able to carry on the business, I presume?—No.

894. Is it your opinion that the law at present presses heavily on the pawnbroker in the small transactions, by requiring him to do them at a low rate?—For small transactions at short periods, I think it does.

895. Are you of opinion that the changes which have been proposed in the law might meet the difficulties of your position?—I should be quite satisfied with the Irish scale; and if it is good in Ireland, where the poorer classes are supposed to be poorer than they are in England, I think it would be fair in England.

896. Do you concur in the other alterations in the law, enabling you to diminish the period of forfeiture to six months?—I think it would be a very great improvement.

897. Do you think it desirable that you should have a statutory rate only, or that you should have a statutory rate with a power to make special contracts?—I think that we should have a statutory rate, with the power to make special contracts, and that in every case where there was no special contract the statutory rate should apply. It would not be possible for us to make special contracts in the ordinary run of our business, because it would take too long a time; and if the trade were thrown open by what was called free trade (to which I am not entirely favourable, though some of the gentlemen are), it would take too long a time to have special contracts for every pledge, especially where a large business is done.

898. Then, would you have every transaction assumed to be under the statutory rate, unless a person made a special contract to the contrary?—I would.

899. Mr. T. Hughes.] What limit would you wish to place for free contract?—I think 40*s.* would be sufficient. Most people who have goods to the value of 40*s.* to pledge, are quite able to understand a printed contract; and it would be printed.

900. Any advance under 40*s.* you would have limited, as at present, by a fixed scale?—Yes.

902. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would you give no freedom of contract under 40*s.*?—I would do so; but it would be a thing which would be very seldom entered into.

903. Chairman.] Supposing that parties brought china or glass, or bulky articles under the value of 40*s.*, you would wish to have some right of charging extra for the risk or warehousing?—Yes.

904. Do you think there would be much business of that sort if you had that power?—I do not think there would be a great deal done under 40*s.*

905. Is much business refused now, because you cannot take the goods in under the present system on account of their fragility or bulk?—There is a considerable proportion.

906. And you would be able to take them in if you could charge extra for them?—No doubt.

907. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Why would you limit pledges on contract to those above 40*s.*?—Because I think that persons who possess property of a greater value than 40*s.*, are intelligent enough to make a contract.

908. Then, of course, it would exclude all articles not worth 40 s. from special contracts, because you put it on the intelligence of the pledger rather than on the article itself?—It is a matter of indifference to me personally. I would not care whether the special contract was allowed to be under 40 s. as well as above.

909. I want to know your reason for fixing the arbitrary limit of 40 s.?—A special contract requires some intelligence in the party making it; and as there is no means of testing the intelligence of the pawner, except by the value of the goods which he brings, that is the only way in which you can arrive at it.

910. Could you not test it by the age of the party; could you not fix the age at 21 years?—I do not think any special contract should be made with anybody under 21 years of age.

911. If the party was not under 21 years of age, you would, perhaps, not object to his pledging an article under 40 s. under a special contract?—I would not.

912. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you any opinion as to limiting the time for opening and closing pawnbrokers' shops?—I think that the time mentioned, from eight in the morning to seven in the evening, is a very fair time; but looking at it from the point of view of a political economist, there is no reason why shops should not be kept open longer for pawning, if people approved of it, any more than there is for buying and selling.

913. With your long experience, and seeing that there is an opportunity for disposing of goods at the low class of pawnbrokers' shops, do you not think that there should be a time appointed which would tend to facilitate the investigations of the police?—Yes; I should be quite satisfied with from eight o'clock in the morning to seven o'clock at night, except on Saturdays, of course.

914. And to what hour on Saturdays do you think the pawnbrokers' shops should be kept open?—To 11 o'clock. In low neighbourhoods, it is quite necessary to keep open as long as that.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN FREDERICK MAY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. F. May, 20 June 1870.

915. Chairman.] Do you hold any particular position in relation to the trade of Pawnbrokers?—I am one of the committee of the Manchester and Salford Pawnbrokers' Association.

916. Have you more than one establishment in Salford?—Only one.

917. How long have you been carrying on business as a pawnbroker?—Twenty years.

918. Have you had much opportunity as a member of the committee of your association of seeing the working of the present system?—I have.

919. Do you find that the Act works satisfactorily in your business in Salford, or are there any difficulties?—It does not work satisfactorily. There are some parts of it, I think, which are open to objection, and which might be improved.

920. Will you be kind enough to go through the different objections which you find; first, with reference to the rate of profit or interest allowed to a pawnbroker under the Act?—I think that is objectionable.

921. In what respect do you find it objectionable?—The system laid down by the Act of Parliament is a good one in theory and is intelligible to men of education; but we have, unfortunately, in pawnbroking to deal with a large number of people who are not educated, and who do not understand it, and it is impossible, or at least I have found it so, to explain to those people the principle upon which the Act is based. The inference is that we find difficulties in dealing with people under the rate prescribed by the Pawnbrokers' Act.

922. Then what you desire is to have some simpler scale of rate, which everybody could understand?—I think it is desirable.

923. Have you considered any new rate, instead of that which is now charged?—I have not. I have no special system or rate to offer, I would rather that the Pawnbrokers' Act, as existing at present, was simplified. For instance, we are pestered with parts of months, and fractions of moneys, which people really cannot understand. If I say to a customer, "The charge for a 3*s.* pledge for five months is 3*d.*"; he will say, "What! five months for 3*d.*? How much is that a month?" "I cannot explain how much it is a month, it is 3*d.* for five months, you must take it for granted that it is 3*d.*" "Oh, but I want to know how much that is a month?" "Well, I cannot tell you." "Well then, if you cannot tell me, you must be charging me wrong; I can understand if you tell me that it is a halfpenny a month for five months, that would amount to 2½*d.*," they would say, and have said, "If it is a penny a month, I can understand that five months would be 5*d.* then," but five months for 3*d.* is altogether beyond their comprehension, and they go away dissatisfied, whatever you may say, because it is something they cannot understand, and do not grasp. With regard to other sums similar illustrations might be given.

924. As regards sums, intermediate between the particular sums stated in the Act, there is a difficulty in making the computation; is that so?—It is; for my own part I do not complain of the system as laid down by the Pawnbrokers' Act, of taking a halfpenny for every half-crown. I believe that that would be an intelligible system, because everybody could understand a halfpenny for the loan of every half-crown, and when you pass half-a-crown, it became a halfpenny for the next half-crown, till you got to 4*d.* for the loan of a £. That would be intelligible; but when you come to those complicated sums, those fractions of months and moneys, nobody can understand it properly. I remember very well about three weeks ago, when an informer summoned one of our trade in Manchester for an infringement of the Act, and this infringement consisted in charging 1½*d.* for, I think, a month and a-half interest for 4*s.* It was heard before our stipendiary magistrate, and the question arose between the magistrate and the magistrate's clerk what it should be. This really involves a very serious question, because 4*s.* should be about seven-eighths of a penny. That would seem a little difficulty to reckon, but half of the seven-eighths came to be reckoned; the magistrate and the magistrate's clerk could not very well decide what the man should have paid; so, after consulting together for some three or four minutes, the magistrate decided that, since they could not understand it, though they were able carefully to go through it; and as this man had a business to attend to, this being on a Saturday, he felt they ought to dismiss the case, case, the Pawnbrokers' Act in this particular being so complicated that really he could not pretend to deal with it. This was his conclusion. I could give a case in point which occurred about two months ago in our Manchester Borough Court.

925. Does any difficulty arise with reference to your having this fixed rate to cover all charges as well as interest?—Having the fixed rate to cover all charges assumes that all things are of the same kind. Now, all things are not of the same kind; one person may bring a wedding-ring, another may bring a watch, another may bring a box full of clothes, and another might bring something of a very inconvenient kind, for instance, he might pledge a ladder, or something of that kind. Now, it would not be fair, I think, to charge the same amount for each of those articles, because they would not all require the same amount of room, nor would they exactly require the same attention. In the case of a wedding-ring, for instance, or a watch, we can just simply take that and put it on a ring or a wire in a compartment of our safe, and that would remain there until it was redeemed or forfeited; but if I took in such a thing as a featherbed, I should have to pay a porter, or I should have to keep a porter constantly in attendance for carrying that to the place where I should wish to deposit it until it was redeemed. Supposing that I took a featherbed for 10 s., the amount allowed to me per month for that would be twopence, and if it were simply carried up stairs and down again, nobody would do it for me for less than a shilling; so that the result is simply this, that if a person comes to offer a featherbed or looking-glass, or anything of that kind, I say, "No, if I take this in pledge I can only do it at a loss, and I would much rather be without it;" so that it does not altogether answer. I believe the end of the Pawnbrokers' Act is not answered when it restrains Pawnbrokers from taking anything more than a hard-and-fast line of interest for goods of every description.

926. Does it prevent people from pledging articles which they might not really want at the moment, and which it might be more convenient for them to part with, and does it make them pledge articles which they do want?—They are left to this alternative; they must either sell the things entirely, probably at a loss, for when people want to sell, as honourable gentlemen know, they are obliged to sell according to the special circumstances of themselves, and the buyer; or they must take it to an illegal pawnbroker, who makes a bargain for a thing, but he does it, as we say, under the rose, and he professes to buy it. For instance, supposing that I refuse to take in a featherbed; had I the option to take that featherbed, I might, perhaps have lent him 15 s. or 1 l. on it; but he takes it to somebody who professes to buy it for, say, 10 s., and to let him redeem it within a fortnight, the pawner paying him 12 s. 6 d. or 13 s. 6 d. for it; he must either sell it entirely, or he must go to the person and make this ficticious sale; if he leave it there for more than a fortnight, the person has it in his own hands, and he simply loses it; in fact, it gives the use of practices which no doubt fall very heavily upon the class of persons who have only such things to pledge, and I believe it works injuriously.

927. Are you of opinion that a pawnbroker, carrying on a regular business, could do those transactions more cheaply than a person who does them irregularly and casually?—I do not see why I should not have the opportunity of taking in featherbeads, and looking-glasses, and pictures, and articles generally of a bulky or a perishable nature. A man might bring me a bag of mussels in the morning, and say, "I am hard up this morning, and I have nothing else to pledge but this bag of mussels." But I cannot take the bag of mussels in pledge, because if I do I must keep them 12 months, and I dare not keep a bag of mussels 12 months; but if I could have a memorandum which should say that I might lend him 3 s. on this bag of mussels, provided that he redeemed them by the same night, or that if he did not redeem them that night I should have the power of selling them, then I might take the bag of mussels, and he could take the money that he pledged his mussels for, and buy water cresses, or oysters, or oranges. But if this cannot be done, the man must, in this case, simply leave his mussels at home, and go to the beer-house and get a pint of beer, and go to sleep and wait till the time came for selling them, whereas probably by borrowing some money on them he might do some good.

928. Practically you are prohibited from lending money on any perishable commodity, and sometimes it may be left on your hands to perish, without your having any right to sell it?—Yes; articles of a perishable, brittle, or bulky nature, are, by the present Act, excluded.

929. To enable you to deal with such cases you would require some power to make a special contract, I presume?—I believe so.

930. And to make a special charge?—And to make a special charge, according to the circumstances of the case. If I go to a railway station I can leave my carpet-bag at the cloakroom there, and say, "I want to leave this till to-morrow." If it is a very small parcel, it is a penny, and a halfpenny, perhaps, for every day afterwards. But if a man brings such an article to me, I lend him, perhaps, 2 s. 6 d. on it, and it is a halfpenny every month, or rather every five weeks, with the seven days of grace. That is the difficulty we are in. If it is a large parcel, the man at the station says, "It is too big for a halfpenny; you must pay me 1 d. or 2 d."

931. You have, by law, no power to shorten the time, or to make a bargain to shorten the time?—Not under any circumstances.

932. Therefore, do you wish to have the power, in your special contract, of altering the time, so as to make it suitable to the nature of the commodity?—I think it would be the means of benefitting the public to a very large extent with reference to the articles which I have named.

933. With regard to the general time of deposit, apart from the question of special contract, do you think that that is, by law, too long?—I think it is. The customs of our nation with regard to fashions of dress have so altered since the year 1800, that I think some change would be desirable and beneficial in this direction. We find that garments now in 12 months' time are completely changed in fashion. We find that, as regards dresses (or "gowns," as we call them), or mantles, or coats, or waistcoats, or things of outside wear, that the change is altogether complete, both in material and in shape, so that they are quite unsaleable, and people will not redeem them, but leave them in our hands. Again, we find a great difficulty with regard to what I would call ll the depreciation, or we will say the fluc-ations in any staple commodity. We may ke the cotton trade or the woollen trade, or ything, it does not matter what, but the cotton ade would be a very fair illustration. During e cotton famine, we found that goods went up ry rapidly in price; and we found also that ople who had pledged things for some time eviously, came and asked us for an extra ad-nce on those goods, and justly, because the ticles had risen in value, and were selling for larger amount. People frequently came to me d said, "I want this article brought down, and want you to lend me more on it." If I had id, "No," they would simply have borrowed the oney, or pledged something else and redeemed , and would have gone somewhere else to re-edge it for a larger amount; but this increase value did not cause any benefit to us when ose things were redeemed, because at the time redemption, people either sold their interest in e things by selling the ticket, or they redeemed em and sold them; so that we were not gainers any material extent by the enhanced price of e cotton goods during the cotton famine. But r the last four years during which the tide rned, when we were working against a falling arket, when cotton goods dropped, say, 50 per nt. in 12 months, we were altogether losers, cause we could not compel them to redeem. I now, theoretically, we have a power of redemp-on in the Pawnbrokers' Act. The Pawnbrokers' ct says, that if the pledge do not realise the mount of the principal lent and the interest hereon, you may sue the pledger for that mount; but we can never sue the pledger r the amount. The pledger has not what ould redeem it; so what is the use of ur going to law with him? we must simply ffer the loss. When the prices of those com-odities were deteriorating, we had them all left n our hands, and there we have suffered, and I ave myself suffered, during the years of the alling market in the cotton famine, through he 12 months' forfeiture, in some cases to the xtent of from 50 to 100 per cent. But if we ad had a six months' forfeiture, or a shorter ime of forfeiture, we should not have suffered hose 12 months' deterioration, but only six months' deterioration, and therefore if we suffered o the extent of 50 per cent., we should only ave suffered to the extent of 25 per cent.; so hat on that score I think a six months' forfeiture s desirable. More than that, it is desirable on ther grounds; it is desirable for the public good. It is an old saying in Manchester, on Monday mornings, when landlords go for the rent, and the people cannot pay it, "Well, if you cannot pay ne week you cannot pay two;" it is so with the Pawnbrokers' Act: if people cannot pay six months' interest, they cannot pay 12 months' nterest, and there are many people, I believe, who are obliged to leave their goods in the hands of the pawnbrokers, when the end of the 12 months arrives, who would not leave them if hey had the option of a six months' forfeiture. If a man has a watch in for 1 l., at the end of 12 months he has to pay 4 s.; he cannot pay it all n a lump, but if it was only 2 s., he would be in many instances able to pay it. Sometimes when I have found that people could not redeem their goods (we all like them to be redeemed), I have said, "Well, if you cannot pay me the whole of the amount, you may perhaps pay me a part of it," and I have actually taken it by instalments, so that the people may have their goods kept for them. I believe that a shorter time of forfeiture, say, a six months' forfeiture, would be exceedingly beneficial, both to the pawnbroker and to the pledger.

934. What is the extent of your business in any given time?—I think that from the 1st of August 1867 to the 31st July 1868 I had 76,603 pledges.

935. Do you know how many of those were under 2 s. in value?—I went over several weeks' pledges, and I found that about 24 per cent. were under 2 s.

936. Can you give an estimate of the cost per pledge of carrying on the business?—I cannot. We in the provinces carry on our business in rather a different way, perhaps, from some large firms in London and other places. My business has been principally conducted by myself and my wife and my children, and I cannot tell exactly the cost per pledge. I have never been compelled to keep an account of income and expenditure, and I have just simply been working for the last 20 years, and doing what I could, but I have not yet become a rich man. I believe that, from gentlemen who have gone into that question, you have heard that the cost is about 2½ d. per pledge, because there is the appraising of the pledge, and there is the folding of it up and putting it away, and the warehouse room, and so forth. I daresay that the calculation of 2½ d. per pledge is not far from the mark.

937. Do the people in Salford generally give their name and address when they pledge their goods?—Of those who come regularly we know the names and addresses as well as they do themselves. We see their faces, and we know that their names have been such a name at one time, and that it must be the same again. There are others whom we call strangers whom we do not know, and we ask them their name, and I think they scarcely ever give us a correct name. I know people who have pledged with me for the last six or seven years, and I have found that their names have been quite different names from those in which they have pledged. People generally pledge under an assumed name.

938. Is there any difficulty in ascertaining whether the persons pledging are housekeepers or lodgers?—I do not think they would give us a correct answer if we asked them.

939. But do you ask them as required by the Act?—We do not ask the questions prescribed by the Act because, perhaps, if a pawnbroker began, and asked those questions for twelve months, he would find that there was no practical result in asking them, and it would fall into disuse. If the questioning be very close, as it is, if strangers come in, as to where they live, what their names are, whether they are the owners of the articles, and whether they are householders or lodgers, they begin to look if you ask them all those questions, and say, "Do you think I have stolen it?" If the people are people of a modest turn, and have not pledged before, they feel thoroughly ashamed and disgusted, and I have known them so disgusted that they have gone out, and sometimes their eyes have filled, and they have burst into tears. They feel that those questions are to a certain extent degrading, and that is, in many instances, the result.

940. Do the people who make pledges take any interest in having the endorsement on the pledges as to the amount of interest which they pay when they redeem the pledges?—Oh, no; all they want is to get the pledge, and pay the money due.

20 June 1870.

941. Do they ever look to see whether the right sum is written down by you on the pledge ticket?—No, not at all; that is at the time of redemption. They want their pledge, and they get their pledge, and that is all they want.

942. Have you had any question arise afterwards in which it is necessary to refer to the entry of the charge?—Never once; with regard to the endorsement, I never remember an instance in the 20 years that I have been in the trade.

943. Have you ever had occasion to give people into custody for not answering or otherwise, when they come to pledge goods under the Act?—I remember once or twice giving people into custody when they have brought goods which I suspected of having been stolen, but it is always rather a risky affair; if the person happens to be criminal you are all right enough, but if he happens not to be criminal, you are liable to an action for false imprisonment; one or two of my fellow-tradesmen in Manchester have had to sustain actions at their own cost, simply from the fact of detaining a person, and saying, "I believe this article to have been stolen." I remember that in one instance a watch was offered in pledge, and the pawnbroker said, "We have information as to this watch; we shall be obliged to detain you," and he sent for a policeman; the policeman took the man to the office, and on further examination, it was found that the number was incorrectly copied into the book, and that instead of being 3,241, we will say, it was 2,341, or something of that kind, and the watch was not a stolen watch. An action was entered against the pawnbroker, in the Salford Court of Record, and the Pawnbrokers' Association had to sustain it, and it was the cause of a great deal of difficulty. I think that the watch committees of the various towns really should, when pawnbrokers do all they can to further the ends of justice, see that the pawnbrokers should be at least indemnified from any legal proceedings on the man's part, and that they should assist them more than they appear to do. I remember myself having a watch offered that exactly answered to the description of one as to which information had been given to the police. I detained the watch, but not the man, and I had a very ill-looking fellow coming backwards and forwards for nearly a day before the police would come to me and assist me in the matter; and when they came they said, "We are not quite sure whether it is the watch or not," and we were obliged to give it up. That will show that we are obliged to be exceedingly careful as to giving people into custody. I have found some difficulty about that, so that we are always exceedingly careful how we undertake such things.

944. You think that if you are required to do this police service you ought to have the indemnity which the police have?—I think so.

945. Are your pledges for the most part redeemed, or what proportion of them are forfeited?—I am always at the counter myself, and I believe that every pledge which comes in goes under my own eye, except to-day. The amounts forfeited are about four per cent., I think, on the number; that is to say, that four out of every hundred pledges are left, or, I think, about three and a-half per cent. on the amount; that is, for every hundred pounds of goods taken in pledge, about 3 l. 10 s. are forfeited.

946. Do you gain or lose upon the sale of your pledges on the whole, as compared with the amount which you lend upon them?—It would depend upon how they are sold.

947. But as a matter of fact, do you gain or lose upon the sale of your pledges?—I think I just get about my own money. For instance, if I sell them over the counter, I perhaps realise a small sum, say, 10 per cent. on the amount lent. But if I have to sell to dealers, as I have on certain things, I lose upon those, so that I simply strike a balance, and I do not think that I either gain or lose.

948. Is there any difficulty in country pawnbrokers selling the goods by auction, as required by the Act?—I have never sold by auction but once.

949. What do you do with the goods which you are required by the Act to sell by auction?—I either keep them the three years (for we are not obliged to give an account after three years), or I generally know who the persons are to whom the goods belong; we generally know our customers, and sometimes we lend rather more on a thing than it is worth, and we know perfectly well it will not be redeemed. But I have never had any difficulty with such transactions. I cannot tell you exactly the rule which I act upon; but I have never had but one sale by auction in the 20 years that I have been in business, and that sale by auction so disgusted me with the result, that I determined to run all risks, and make the best of the things for the future.

950. In fact, you make some special arrangement, so as to dispense with the sale by auction?—I do.

951. Do you know what is the practice generally in the towns of Salford and Manchester with regard to selling by auction?—Those who are in back streets and places, where they have no sale shop, are obliged to sell the pledges by auction; and they tell me that they lose sometimes as much as from 30 to 50 per cent. by those sales. Those who are in a good position in front streets, and have a good sale shop, can perhaps, sell those goods, and, like myself, realise about 10 per cent., if they can sell them themselves in the shop; but if we have to sell them to dealers, we, of course, have to sacrifice them.

952. Are there many efforts made in Salford and Manchester to deceive pawnbrokers by pledging goods which are got up for the purpose?—Yes. That is one of the most difficult parts of a pawnbroker's business. I have myself seen watches which have been got up with a gold rim and a brass body; and, in fact, I do not think it possible to imagine anything in jewellery, or anything of that description, which is not imitated to deceive the pawnbrokers. Again, there is a class of persons technically known by us as "duffers," who buy up old clothes and alter them. Last week I saw a cloth coat, which nearly escaped my observation, with just the wing of the collar let in with new cloth, and the coat had been rebound, and altogether got up. Perhaps the man had bought it for about 2 s., and he asked me 8 s. upon it. I was nearly passing it, it had been so exceedingly well got up. It had been sponged with a solution, I believe, of logwood and copperas, and then gone over with a brush with oil in it, and for about an hour afterwards that gives it the appearance earance of a new coat; but in 12 months' time, could quite well understand that one part of at coat would be black and another part blue. is a kind of thing as to which you would only y, "Done again!"

953. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] I thought that pawnrokers were not quite so green as to be taken with a thing of that kind?—Your opinion of awnbrokers is quite wrong. My opinion of awbrokers is, that they are just as other men.

954. Chairman.] Do many people come to you ter sales to inquire what their goods sold for?—I have never, that I remember, had a single pplication to know what goods have been sold r; that is to say, I refer especially to goods bove 10 s. in value, to which I suppose you lude. I have in some instances had people me for goods under 10 s. and they have said, Have you sold this? What did you sell it for?" ly answer has simply been that we are not bliged by law to keep a register of goods under 0 s.; but strange to say, I have never had an pplication for goods over 10 s.

955. Do you keep a table of the rates in your op?—Yes.

956. What sort of a table is that?—It is an bstract of the table of rates as in the Act of 'arliament.

957. Can the people make it out and apply it the ticket when they see it?—I do not think ey ever think about it. The fact is, that it is omething like this: if a person goes to a pawnroker's shop, say, to my shop, and I am a fairealing, upright, honest sort of man, who is wilng to do his business in an upwright way, there a sort of sympathy between us, and they can rust me; whereas, if they find that a man is not f that description they do not go to his shop gain. I think that people feel that if they are ot protected by something more than the mere Act of Parliament they will not go to the shop t all.

958. Is there any difficulty in dealing with lost uplicates?—There is; that question is rather a omplicated one. In fact, our practice is quite at ariance with the theory; and I think that it would e quite right to state here what our practice is n that respect. The theory is that if a person se a ticket the pawnbroker shall give an affiavit or form of declaration, and that he shall hen go to the magistrate and declare to the agistrate that the goods pledged at so-and-so re his goods, and that he has lost the duplicate, nd that he has not sold or disposed of it or lent as security, and that he now wants this declaation signed that he may give it to the pawnroker as an indemnity for giving him the goods. uch is the Act; but in practice I dare say I ive 10 pledges or more every week without any ffidavit or declaration of the kind. The theory s a good one, but it so happens that the bulk of hose pledges are wanted on Saturday night. If man come to me on a Saturday night for his uit of clothes he has pledged in the earlier art of the week and he wants them for Sunday, nd says, "I have lost my ticket, I want my lothes, what must I do?" I reply, "The proper ourse for you is to have an affidavit." But the an will answer, "Why give me an affidavit? cannot get the affidavit signed till Monday norning, and I want my clothes for Sunday; will ou not give them to me without you; have nown me sometime; you know I have lost it; ou know I will not do you any wrong?" My practice has been in such cases to give the person his clothes upon his signing his name in a book for them, and agreeing that he will make a legal declaration when he is called upon to do so, and I have found that to act very well. It would simply mean keeping this person without his clothes for the whole of the week if that were not done.

959. Does that arise from your knowing the people who come to you?—It does; because I know the people who come to me. I have given, perhaps, on an average, 10 pledges in a week, and in that way, and have done so, perhaps, for 20 years, and I have never had any difficulty arising from it, but there has been a sort of an acknowledgment from the people that we are doing them a service.

960. Is it much the practice in Salford for people to pledge their clothes on Monday morning, and to redeem them on Saturday night?—Oh, yes; those are what I might call the typical pledges; those are the regular pledges. If you took those out of a pawnbroker's business, I do not think he would care very much about the rest; at least we should not in a manufacturing town like Salford.

961. Then a workman pays this enormous charge which he pays in the course of the year, in preference to saving money enough to keep his own clothes?—I am not quite sure that they look at it in that light. It is an accommodation, and I think that each transaction is judged upon its own merits. If a man wants some money on Monday morning, he borrows the money and makes the best use he can of it, and pays the pawnbroker at the end of the week for the accommodation of that money. I do not think that the people look upon it as a question of saving at all, because, if they pay me 2 d. for the loan of 10 s., there is many a 2 d., that they might save to their advantage. They might save the pawnbrokers 2 d. in tobacco, and beer, and so forth, but it is not so; it is part of their system.

962. Their system is not to accumulate so much even as 10 s. out of their wages to enable them to live through the week?—My business is on the confines of Salford and Broughton, and perhaps I am on the debateable ground between what we call the rich and the poor. My customers are of two classes, the operatives and those who have quarterly salaries; and I find that there is always an idea in people to ape the manners, and habits, and customs of the class which is above them. If a man gets 1 l. a week he wants to dress and look like somebody who is getting 2 l. If a man in a warehouse is getting 100 l. or 200 l. a year, he must dress and live like somebody who is getting 300 l. or 400 l.; so, in my experience, people always want to seem to be more than they are, and this leads to a system which, I think, permeates all classes and runs through the whole of our lives, whether it is done by pawnbroking or by mortgaging. There is a tendency for some people to assume to be more than they are, and they are always the people to mortgage, either their clothes or their estates, or something else.

963. Are those people, not destitute people, but people in regular work?—We do not care about destitute customers, those people who are coming down, and gradually descending and descending, who begin with pledging their plate, and end, perhaps, with pledging their shoes, these are not the people we want. We want people who pay us regularly from week to week; and, in fact, our trade is a regular one, and our profit is got where the money is lent and lent again, and not from the person who wants to get the money and leave the goods.

964. In point of fact, are the people whom you like and whom you get, workmen in regular work and with decent wages?—Yes, they are.

965. With regard to the charge which is made for the ticket under the subsequent Act, do you think that that is a sufficient charge to cover the expenses of receiving the pledge, and issuing the ticket?—I look upon what is called the charge for the ticket, as not being exactly descriptive of the affair. It is really for the appraisement of the goods. Now what we call the Halfpenny Act, was a very good thing for the pawnbrokers, it paid them, perhaps, to some extent, for the appraisement of the goods. We had nothing for the appraisement of goods under 5 s. then, and it is quite certain that nobody likes to work quite for nothing. Now we suffer a little, I think, because for goods of the value of 10 s. we have 1 d., for 1 l. we have 2 d.; and I think that in justice it would seem that if 10 s. is worth 1 d., and 1 l. is worth 2 d., 15 s. is worth 1½ d. Besides, supposing that I had a parcel containing 100 articles pledged for 1 l., if I looked at 100 of those articles, and they paid me 2 d. for them, and paid one penny for looking at 50 of them, it would seem but right that for 75 of them I should be paid 1½ d.; so that I think that ½ d. for 5 s., 1 d. for 10 s., 1½ d. for 15 s., and 2 d. for 1 l., would be equitable for the appraisement or ticket money. When the Legislature gave us the halfpenny for the 5 s., I believe it was only a misunderstanding, and that they forgot to put another halfpenny on for the other 5 s., so as to make 1½ d. for 15 s.

966. Is it your view that there should be a halfpenny for every successive 5 s., or that the accumulation of halfpence should stop at 20 s.?—We now have it 2 d. for 20 s., for 5 l. we have 4 d., but we have no break between the 2 d. and the 4 d. I think it would be more equitable if it were more evenly distributed.

967. In a certain rate per 5 s.?—In a certain rate for 5 s., or in any other manner which might be decided upon; but we jump now from 1 d. for 10 s., to 2 d. for 1 l., and we then go from 2 d. for 1 l. to 4 d. for 5 l.. If it were more equitably distributed, I think it would be more just. Besides, it does not seem to me to be reasonable that for 4 l. 19 s. we should only be able to charge 2 d., while for the other 1 s. we jump at once to 4 d.

968. Are there any regular establishments in Salford or Manchester, to your knowledge, where illicit pawnbroking is carried on?—It has been greatly reduced of late years, but there are some still. They used to be very numerous, but, as I daresay, the Committee are aware, an Act of Parliament was passed especially for their suppression; and I believe it has done a great deal of good. But at the same time, this has been only of a prohibitive kind; it has dealt with the thing in a sort of negative form, and it has said, "You shall not do a certain thing; you shall not take in this bag of mussels; you shall not take in this rain tub; you shall not take in this three-storied ladder; you shall not take in this feather bed, or this chest of drawers, or this hand cart, unless you look upon it as a pawnbroking transaction, and charge according to the pawnbroking rates." Those people who have those things to pledge, must pledge them, or else they must suffer a great deal of injury, and they go to the illicit pawnbroker; by the Legislature simply saying, that these things shall not be taken in by the regular pawnbroker, except at the fixed scale, for the people will pledge them, and must pledge them, whatever the penalties are; and the illicit pawnbrokers will continue, so long as there is no legitimate outlet, for those kind of pledges. Though the Act for the suppression of "dolly shops," or "wee pawns," or whatever they are called, has done a great deal of good, still they will exist, I believe, so long as the cause is not removed, and some way opened for a legitimate trade of this description. If a person goes to one of those places now, he has to pay more, because they have more risk to run, and there are special penalties.

969. Then you think that in the end, the person who borrows has to indemnify the person who lends for the penalties which are imposed under the Act?—He has.

970. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Did you begin the pawnbroking business on your own account and of your own choice?—Yes.

971. You are not one of those gentlemen who have gone into a bad trade as a heritage. Is it a trade which has increased much in Manchester of late years?—I think not. I do not think that pawnbrokers have increased with the population of Manchester.

972. Can you give us statistics of how many pawnbrokers you have in Manchester now, including Salford?—I cannot give statistics, but I think we have about 70 in Salford, and I think that perhaps altogether in Manchester and Salford we have about 300; but my own knowledge of certain districts leads me to the belief (and I think that the tables of the census of the population will bear me out), that pawnbroking has not increased in proportion with the increase of the population.

973. How many were there 20 years ago?—I cannot say; Manchester and Salford have increased so rapidly within the last 20 years.

974. Do you give the opinion, that you do not believe the trade has increased, upon no facts at all?—Upon my own observations.

975. But how can you make an observation if you do not know the figures?—I can see a certain district, and I can see that this district has increased three or four or five times. We have had whole suburbs in Manchester and Salford entirely built, and I can find perhaps that in all these suburbs there are not more than three or four pawnbrokers, except what we call the old pawnbrokers; men and places that I have known for a long time; but I have found that all they have done has been simply to move outside. For instance, we have a street in Manchester called Shude-hill. I remember perhaps, 20 years ago that in Shude-hill there were five or six pawnbrokers, and now there is not one in Shude-hill.

976. Have they given up the business?—Some of them have given up, but they have mostly gone outside, because pawnbrokers' shops can only exist in certain places where there is a certain population who pawn. For instance it would not be much use setting up a pawnbroker's shop in the middle of the square outside the Houses of Parliament, because nobody would come there.

977. Do you give it as your decided opinion that that the number of pawnbrokers has not increased in Manchester and Salford, during the last 20 years?—I do not think it has increased in the same ratio as the population.

978. But has the number increased?—The number of pawnbrokers has increased, but I do not think they have increased in the same ratio as the population.

979. But they have increased very much?—They have increased.

980. Would parties have gone into that business if it had not been remunerative?—I think they would.

981. Do people often go into a business even though they know that it will not be remunerative?—I think it is a sort of speculation; I have never found a person who could go into any business and say that it was certain to be remunerative.

982. And therefore I suppose, like horse racing, they sometimes win and sometimes lose?—Yes; everybody has an idea that the pawnbroking business is exceedingly remunerative and they do it because in the Pawnbrokers' Act, a pawnbroker's profits are laid down. For instance, I, as a pawnbroker would lend a pound for a month or for five weeks, which is the legal time, for 4 d. If I were to lend a man 30 s. on a watch for a month or five weeks (for there are seven days' grace), I should get 6 d. for that transaction. The butcher says, "You are getting rare profits, you pawnbrokers," but I have said, "You have bought a sheep for 30 s., would you like to have all the trouble with that sheep, and to sell it at the end of a month or five weeks for 30 s. 6 d.? Would you like to say on Saturday night, when you had cut up that sheep and weighed it, that you had got 6 d. for your investment?" "Oh, no!" he said. "Well," I said, "what do you think I get for the loan of a pound?" "Why," he replied, "I suppose you get 3 s."

983. Do you know any butcher that kills 76,603 sheep in a year?—I do not know of one.

984. Is not that the number of your pledges?—Yes; but those are pledges, not sheep.

985. Chairman.] You say that you sell 76,603 bits of sheep in the course of the year?—Yes, I do.

986. Mr. Orr Ewing.] What is the rent of your premises?—£.45.

987. Do you agree with some of the gentlemen who have been examined before this Committee, that the pawnbroking business is not remunerative?—I believe it is only remunerative (to me, at least) by my working very hard, and by members of my own family working in it. In point of fact, as I stated before, I have been 20 years in pawnbroking, and I have not become a rich man.

988. You make a little profit, I suppose, besides your rent and expenses?—I have never gone into the calculations; in fact it would be so complicated that really I could not afford to go into the question. I should have to keep my accounts more strictly than I do, and I have never gone into the calculations.

989. You have agreed with the evidence that 2½ d. per pledge is a fair estimate of the cost of rent and management?—I have no doubt of it, so far as the gentleman who made it is concerned.

990. Are you aware that that, on the number of articles that you pledge, amounts to 797 l. 18 s. 11½ d.; and that, deducting 45 l. from that, would give you for the expenses and management 752 l. 18 s. 11½ d.; are my figures correct?—Yes.

991. And you manage the business entirely amongst your own family, yourself and your wife and children?—Myself and my wife, a son, a niece, a shop boy, and an assistant.

992. Are they all in your family?—All but the shop boy and the assistant.

993. And you make a profit over and above this, I presume?—I manage simply to get a living; I do not do any more than that.

994. But is not 752 l. a very good living for yourself and your family, besides the profit of your business?—I did not say that we got that.

995. Does not the result of your own figures bring it out?—No, those are the expenses that have been assumed, I think.

996. But I thought you corroborated the gentleman who gave that evidence?—I have no reason to disprove that as to the amount on his pledges.

997. Chairman.] You do not employ anybody?—An assistant and a youth.

998. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You stated, did you not, that you have great difficulty with the parties that come to pledge with you, because of their ignorance?—Ignorance of the rate of profit.

999. Are they unable to calculate?—They are unable to calculate interest. I do not think that if I were to begin at the beginning of this table, and to go the round of all you gentlemen with regard to the fractional parts of months and moneys at 20 per cent. you could give me a direct answer to the question, though I am assuming, perhaps, more than I ought to assume.

1000. Are they not also very needy and poor people?—No, the very needy and poor people, as I stated, are not the people whom we care about dealing with. We want people who have something. It is no use dealing with those who have nothing.

1001. You do not like to deal with the poor people; you would rather deal with persons in the receipt of regular wages among the working classes?—Yes.

1002. You mean men who are earning good wages?—Take the case of a shoemaker. A shoemaker brings a pair of shoes to me, and he pledges those shoes for the sake of getting the leather and materials to make another pair of shoes, perhaps. When he has done that, he pledges that pair of shoes, and he gets the materials to buy another pair, and so on. If he makes five or six pairs of shoes, the pawnbroker has those shoes in pledge, and on Saturday the man can come and take the shoes to the shoe market and sell them for a proper price; and then he is able to go on again, and he comes back again, perhaps, at the beginning of the next week. The same holds good with regard to small tradesmen and small shopkeepers. A shopkeeper comes who has a little pecuniary difficulty, such as a bill to meet, or an account to settle, and, perhaps, sooner than give a three months' bill and forfeit the discount, he would part with his tablespoons or whatever he has to part with.

1003. You provide capital for men who want it at once?—Capital to all persons who are in pecuniary embarrassment.

1004. I thought you described as the principal supporters of your pawnbroking establishment, men who were ambitious to rival their neighbours who are a little above them?—I assume, or at least least I find in Salford, that that is common to human nature.

Mr. J. F. May.

20 June 1870.

1005. What is the lowest amount that you give upon the pledge?—Sixpence is the amount we generally consider our lowest. We are allowed a halfpenny for each ticket but if a person comes to offer the pledge which is brought forward as the lowest pledge of all others, viz.: a flat-iron, (we do take flat-irons, sometimes) for that we lend 4 d., and for that we do not charge the halfpenny allowed by law. But 6 d. may be taken as the lowest pledge which it is worth a pawnbroker to take.

1006. What proportion of your pledges would be below 6 d.?—I have not gone into that question, but, perhaps, two per cent.; not that I should think.

1007. How many may you have at 1 s.?—I might have gone into that question, but I have not done so. I have a statement with regard to those under 2 s., I think.

1008. Then how many have you at 5 s.?—That, I cannot say.

1009. What is the highest amount that you lend?—£. 10.

1010. Do you not go above 10 l.?—I do not go above 10 l., except by special agreement.

1011. Have you many at 10 l.?—No, not many.

1012. What is the proportion under 10 s.?—Perhaps, I could best answer that question by telling you that the average amount per pledge is 4 s. 3 d. I am not quite sure, but you may safely assume it at 4 s. 3 d.

1013. What is the number of pledges upon which you advance below 10 s.—I could only give a rough calculation, but I think I might say, 80 per cent. or 90 per cent.

1014. Do you think that where the amount which you contribute to the people who pledge with you is so small, it can be of much advantage to them, either as capital for their business, or as enabling them to rival their neighbours in good appearance?—The average of 4 s. 3 d. per pledge, would imply, that if we take some at 6 d. (there are some higher), it evidently accommodates the public. We find that people do come to pledge, and I suppose they find it an advantage to do so.

1015. Do you think that pawnbroking as a trade is beneficial to the public for sums below 5 s.?—Yes, I think it is of very great advantage.

1016. Do you think that it relieves their distress?—Yes, because people can only pledge what they have to pledge; and if people have only articles under 5 s. in value they can only pledge such. I believe that while people of larger means would pledge sometimes for extravagancies and for matters that they could do without, yet of people who pledge under 5 s. I believe it may be said that they pledge a good deal for the necessaries of life.

1017. You stated, did you not, that you had great difficulties in getting the proper names of parties who come to you, and that really you did not often ask them?—We do ask them unless they are regular customers.

1018. I think you stated that sometimes when you asked the names they left the shop?—Pardon me; you are under a misunderstanding. There are a series of about 10 questions if you consult the Pawnbrokers' Act. You ask, of course, do you want to pledge? What have you to pledge? Is this yours? What is your name? What is your Christian name? Are you a householder or a lodger? Where do you live? What street? What is the number of the house? and so on. Now people can rarely stand all that. People who are accustomed to pledging may say, "I will not stand all that;" and if they are not accustomed to pledging, if they have come perhaps under pressure of trouble, they simply would burst into tears, or they would leave the shop in disgust, just according to the disposition of the person.

1019. Do they endeavour to conceal their names?—They nearly all endeavour to conceal their names.

1020. You stated, did you not, that they felt it to be degrading?—I assume so; they conceal their names; I assume, because they feel that to be poor is construed by many almost to be a crime.

1021. Would a poor person going into a baker's shop asking credit for a loaf, feel the same amount of degradation?—I cannot tell.

1022. Do you think that the money which you generally give to those poor people goes to purchasing groceries, or does it go to the spirit dealers?—I do not think it does; I know very many persons who pledge, who I do not think ever taste spirits, and who pledge for small amounts too. I have no doubt, that there are people who make bad uses of the money that they borrow of pawnbrokers, the same as they would make bad uses of money obtained from any other source; but, I presume that, in that case, we are in the same position as a man who sells guns and pistols, and gunpowder. The people come to us, and they offer a security, and I do not think we have any influence on them beyond that; I think it is a prejudice to suppose that most of the people who pledge, pledge for the sake of drink. Some may do so, but I believe it is the exception.

1023. Is it not the fact, that shopkeepers, grocers and bakers generally give credit to the working classes?—Shopkeepers charge more for such credit than the pawnbroker does for the loan of his money; there is a baker who lives next door to me. I am going to tell you something now against the law. I open my shop on Monday mornings at six o'clock. We ought to open at seven, but no matter, we do open at six; the baker opens at six o'clock too, and he says, "All the money I draw on Monday morning I draw from your shop."

1024. Does he sell any beer?—He does not sell any beer.

1025. Is it not the law that spirit dealers cannot give any credit, and that if a man contracts a debt for spirits, with a spirit dealer, the dealer has no right in law to pursue the debtor?—I do not know the law as to spirit dealing.

1026. In answer to the question, whether he did not think that the law should interfere to protect the working classes from pledging their body clothes and bed clothes, Mr. Hardaker stated that he did not think it would be beneficial, because they would immediately have recourse to the beer shops and dolly shops; do you agree with him as to that?—I assume that it is so. The people can only pledge what they have to pledge.

1027. But do you agree with him that it would be of no use to alter the law?—Not the slightest: for instance, if they have an article which is only worth worth half-a-crown to pledge, and they want food, they cannot eat the article, and they must have food; and if they cannot raise the money with pawnbrokers they must raise it somewhere else; in short, they must have it.

1028. Do you think the keeper of a beerhouse will give them money for it?—It has been the practice, to my own knowledge, for people in beerhouses, before this "Wee Pawn" Act, or "Leaving House" Act, to lend money on goods on which pawnbrokers would not lend money. I have known many instances where people could not get money from me on account of the article being of a bulky, or brittle, or perishable kind, and the beerhouse keeper, so acting as an unlicensed pawnbroker, has advanced money on the article.

1029. Is not that quite against the law?—It is quite against the law.

1030. Are you in favour of a higher license on pawnbroking?—For my own part, I would not care what the license was; I am quite content with it as it is, but I feel that whatever amount of license you put upon a pawnbroker, you really in the end put on the public, because his charges in one of two ways must be borne by the public. If you leave pawnbroking at the present rate of interest, and put him at a higher rate of license, then he must manage so to lend on his goods that his trade must become exceedingly limited, and people must suffer in that respect. If you left it as it is, the public would have to pay what they have to pay; but whatever you put on with regard to the license it must come out of the pledgers, because the pawnbroker would have to get a living in some way or another; I do not think, therefore, it would be any benefit.

1031. Do you think that it would be any improvement to give power to the magistrates to grant licenses to pawnbrokers, as we do in Scotland in regard to spirit dealers?—I do not think it would, because in small places there is always, unfortunately, a good deal of political prejudice, and men are apt to degenerate into cliques. Supposing that you put the licensing of pawnbrokers into the hands of the magistrates, I think it would happen that those men would get the licenses who happened to be of the particular political clique that was then in power.

1032. Do you think that the inhabitants of this country are now such strong politicians that they are more influenced by that than by the social bearings of public questions?—I may state, as an illustration, that in the Salford Council we have a majority of Conservatives; a man who was exceedingly active in our parliamentary canvass, and who engaged a number of what Mr. Baron Bramwell, I think, called "gladiators," or "pugilists," after working very hard for his party, was rewarded at the last council but one by being made an overseer or superintendent of the scavenging department I believe that in Salford party politics run so high that party political prejudice would rise above everything; and if we had a distribution of licenses to pawnbrokers upon that score, I believe that those pawnbrokers would get licenses who happened to belong to the predominant political party, and that the others would not have to go on their merits. That is my opinion, and other facts bear it out.

1033. Is freedom of contract between the pawnbroker and the parties with whom he does business desirable, in your opinion?—Yes, I think it is desirable.

1034. Do you think that the poor people who come to you and pledge their articles for small sums, such as 1 s., 6 d., 4 d., and so on, are in a sufficiently independent position to deal with the clever men in your profession?—I do; I believe the Almighty has endowed every one of His reasonable creatures with common sense.

1035. Chairman.] Without going to the Almighty, you might say that if the people are free to buy the goods, they are equally free to sell them again, or to pledge them?—Yes; I believe that some of the sharpest bargains would be found to be made by people who are what we may call working people.

1036. Do you think that, as a matter of fact, they do understand what they are doing when they pledge goods worth 7 s., getting 2 s. upon them?—Most certainly; they are as capable of knowing what they are doing as you or I can be.

1038. Mr. Thomas Hughes.] You say that false names are often given you, has any harm come of that, so far as you know?—It causes a great deal of inconvenience; for instance, supposing that a person comes to me and says, "My name is So-and-so; I have pledged an article," and then I ask him, "What name is it pledged in?" and he says, "I do not know what name it is pledged in; I gave you some name at the time, but I really forget what the name was," and so we have sometimes particular difficulty in finding out what the name was that the article was pledged in. Then there is perhaps some difficulty about the declaration, and after all, no good can come of giving a false name; but harm does come, as we frequently tell them; still they are so ashamed of being in want of money that we cannot help it.

1039. You say, do you not, that about 4 per cent. upon the whole of your pledges are forfeited?—About 4 per cent. on the whole of our pledges are forfeited.

1040. Do you think that that is a fair average upon the whole of your neighbourhood?—I think that I am below the average.

1041. Are you aware that the London average has been given as far higher?—Yes.

1042. In general, do you think the average reaches anything like 20 per cent.?—I should think not for all goods.

1043. You say that you have a habit of allowing persons who have lost their duplicates to redeem their pledges upon signing a book, and agreeing to obtain a declaration; have you ever found any inconvenience in that; have you ever been deceived?—I have been deceived only once, I think.

1044. And you find that a far more convenient method of carrying on business for yourself and your customers?—Yes, much more.

1045. Do I rightly understand you to wish for perfectly free trade (as it has been called before) with regard to low pledges, or do you think that the fixed scale which you have suggested would be sufficient, without allowing special contract as to low pledges?—I should like to be paid for work done. I would suggest that we should be allowed to make our bargains for articles, not being watches or jewellery or wearing apparel.

Mr. J. F. May.

20 June 1870.

1046. In fact, for all perishable or bulky articles?—Yes, for all perishable articles or bulky articles or brittle articles.

1047. But you do not object to a fixed scale as regards watches and trinkets?—It would fall into it. Competition would make the fixed scale.

1048. Mr. Montague Guest.] I understood you to state that you have had only one auction in the last 20 years?—I never had but one auction.

1049. According to the Act you are bound to sell, by public auction, all goods on which any sum above 10 s., and not exceeding 10 l., shall have been lent; is your practice an evidence of the law?—Most certainly it is. Without doubt it is an evasion of the law, or at least it is a non-compliance with the law.

1050. Then, according to that, as far as I understand, there are three evasions of the law; one being with regard to the ticket, another with regard to opening the shop before the time mentioned in the Act, and a third with regard to not having auctions; is that so?—Yes.

1051. Is not that a proof that the Pawnbrokers' Act is not carried into effect in the country in the way in which it should be carried into effect?—Quite so; I might not only say that I have made three evasions, but that I could not point my finger to any section of the Act which is carried out strictly by pawnbrokers. With regard to auctions, I think I explained exactly how I managed the auction pledges. After the termination of three years, we are not obliged to give any account of them. If there were a pledge that I did not know anything about, as regards the people to whom it belonged, I should most likely keep that for the three years if it was a watch or spoons, or anything that I thought they would come for, but if I knew the people to whom it belonged, as we do in a place like Salford, where we know all about the name, and all about the address, almost as well as they know ourselves, I might safely say to them, "Here, we have this article of yours, are you ever going to take it?"

1052. I have no doubt that being a straightforward man you would very likely give the people an opportunity of redeeming those pledges; but do you not think that if that was carried out as a general rule in pawnbroking it would lead to a great deal of robbery of the working classes, and that pawnbrokers would never think of keeping their pledges for the three years, so that it would entirely obviate your being asked for the overplus, if there was any overplus?—I assume that if the people want the goods they will generally come before the expiration of the time and make some arrangement as to either paying the interest of it and renewing the ticket; or, if they thought it was worth more than the amount lent, they would negotiate with some person for the purchase of it.

1053. Do you keep your books every day, as the Act requires, or do you infringe the law in that way?—We keep the book exactly as the Act prescribes.

1054. You have no sale book, have you?—We have no sale book; we do not sell.

1055. Mr. Ridley.] Did I correctly understand you to state in the earlier part of your evidence, that you were content with the present scale of a halfpenny for half-a-crown, and so on, upwards?—Yes; I could do with that very well. If a person asks me how he must calculate this interest, I always say, "You must calculate a halfpenny for every half-a-crown, or part of half-a-crown."

1056. Do you consider that sufficient?—I think it would pay me.

1057. You stated something about making 10 per cent. I did not clearly understand whether it was upon the sale of forfeited pledges or upon your general business?—When I sell unredeemed pledges over the counter to people, singly, I daresay I can make 10 per cent. on the amount lent on them; but if I sell them to dealers in old clothes, I daresay I lose about that much per cent.; but I think I get about my own money back again.

1058. Do you find in practice that you have to refuse a great many articles of a bulky, brittle, or perishable nature, such as you have described?—A great many, continually.

1059. Do you happen to have any pawn duplicates that you could show to the Committee?—I have not.

1060. What do you specify on the ticket, generally?—According to the requirements of the Act of Parliament.

1061. Do you specify the time within which the pledge is to be redeemed?—It says, "all goods forfeited within 12 months," but, I think, that is quite superfluous, because every Englishman is supposed to know the law, and London pawnbrokers do not state that. It is not necessary.

1064. But you say, that the number of your pledges in the year is 76,000; and you have said, have you not, that you thought it was a fair estimate in your business, as in other businesses, that your pledges cost you about 2½ d. each?—I am not able to go into those calculations, because I have never made them; but I have no doubt it will cost something like that.

1065. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You balance your books every year, I suppose?—I do not.

1066. You have talked about wanting a higher rate of interest on certain fragile, perishable, and bulky goods; are you not satisfied with 20 per cent.?—I want simply a bargain, and so much per month.

1067. Is not 20 per cent. per annum sufficient?—That is only 1½ per cent. on the transaction. For instance, supposing that you brought to me this table, in front of me, to pledge, and you wanted me to lend you 2 l. on it, though I daresay it would be rather an awkward thing to sell, I would say, "I cannot take that table for 8 d. a month"; if I must pay the rent of a room to keep that table for 8 d. a month, it would not pay me at all.

1068. But is not the payment for the ticket, which represents the warehousing, sufficient?—No, that is for the appraisement, for examining the goods, to see if that is the sufficient value. What we call the ticket-money is really, I assume, the appraisement money.

1069. But the judging is part of your business like anybody else's when they buy; and it is almost part of their capital in trade, is it not?—No; I think we generally consider that the ticket-money is for the appraisement of the goods, and and that the interest is for the loan of the money.

1070. That is so much for your judgment then?—Exactly, so much for our judgment.

1071. But surely you should not be paid for exercising your judgment; does anybody else who is engaged in trade receive payment for exercising his judgment?—Perhaps not directly.

1072. Is not the ticket-money paid for the expenses of warehousing and taking in?—Not so; because the ticket-money increases according to value and not according to bulk. If it were for the warehouse room, the ticket-money for an article, one foot cube, would be a halfpenny; and for an article three cubic feet, it would be more; and for an article nine cubic feet, more, and so on in proportion to the number of the cubic feet that it contained; but the ticket-money increases according to the value; so that it is quite evident that the ticket-money is intended to be proportioned to the value of the goods, and not to the bulk of them.

1073. Do you find that the small pledges, and particularly those which are put in on Monday and taken out on Saturday, pay very well?—Yes; they pay the ordinary rate of interest, and I consider them the best pledges.

1074. Are you aware that some of the previous witnesses have stated that that is the worst class of the business?—Of course you have a great deal more work with those which come in every week, but we have less risk decidedly.

1075. How do you mean that you have less risk?—We have no loss if they redeem them; and if they redeem them nine times, we assume that the tenth time they will be redeemed.

1076. Do you not think that it would be a good plan if the endorsement were put on the ticket, when you issued it, instead of its being endorsed when you took it in?—It would be a very good plan I think if, instead of having under the Pawnbrokers' Act a fixed rate of interest, it was stated on the face of every ticket, that this article would remain in pledge for whatever time it might be for six months, for two months, or for three months; and that for three months you should pay 1 d. or 2 d. a month, or whatever rate it might be. I believe that that would be intelligible to the pledger, and would save him a great deal of trouble, because everybody who comes to redeem a pledge says, "How much is it?" whereas everybody would know that if it were redeemed in six months, it would be 1 s., or if in three months, it would be 6 d. I think that would be a very good thing indeed, and that it would simplify it very much. It is one of the things that I am exceedingly anxious we should have altered; it is just the thing I want.

1077. The pledger hardly ever sees the indorsement, I suppose?—We never do indorse the tickets. If we indorsed our tickets, it would take one person's time to do nothing else but to indorse them. When I began the trade I tried to do two things; in fact, I tried to keep as near the Pawnbrokers' Act as possible. I tried to write off every bundle which was given out, and I also tried to pay everybody the farthings, and to take farthings in interest. The first thing was that to check those things off, to see that they were delivered at such-and-such a time, took nearly one person's time, and no good came of it. In fact, it was simply time wasted. Then, as to paying the farthings, I paid farthings for eight months. If I asked a person for a farthing, he would say, "What do you charge me more than anybody else for?" People could not understand that I was charging a farthing less, and they said, "We don't want those farthings. We know perfectly well that if you take in a pledge for 3 s. it is worth a penny for the first month, that for two months, it is three halfpence, for three months two-pence-halfpenny," and so on. The people could understand that; but when I went, according to the scale of interest which is prescribed by law, people were always bothering me to explain how it could be.

1078. Mr. Montague Guest.] If you could not go on paying the farthing you made it up to a halfpenny, I suppose?—If they came and made a bother about it, I should give them the halfpenny. Otherwise I should not give them the farthing.

1079. Mr. Hambro.] Do you wish the Committee to understand that the pawnbroking trade is the only one in which free contract is not allowed?—No; I did not say so; but I believe it is the only trade.

1080. Chairman.] Do you think that the pawnbroking trade should be an exception to the rule?—I have not drawn any comparison between pawnbroking and other trades. I am only speaking as to how free contract would bear upon pawnbrokers.

1081. Mr. Hambro.] If the law allowed you to make free contracts, should you have any objection to a stamp duty on your special contracts under 10 l.?—I should have no objection; but I should want either increased interest or profit to pay it, or the pledge would have to pay it. I think that pawnbrokers are exempt by law from stamp duty.

1082. But if by this Bill you proposed to have special contracts, then you would come under the law of stamp duties, as I understand?—That would not be a question for me.

1083. But you see no objection to it?—Not the slightest; I do not think that it would make any difference.

1084. Have you any idea as to what revenue it would produce?—I have not.

1085. Do you think that the revenue produced by it would be large?—I believe that if a system of contract were entered into it would be the means of doing great good.

1086. And of bringing in a large revenue?—Yes.

1087. Is money often pawned with you?—Sometimes. People sometimes have pawned a sovereign or a 5 l. note for fear they should spend it; I have seen that done.

1088. You have not money often pawned with you?—No.

1089. Do you charge the halfpenny ticket on different parts of the same article occasionally or ever?—For each pledge; but not for parts of the same pledge.

1090. Would you charge the parts of a clock separately?—No, a clock is one thing.

1091. Are you aware whether it is a custom of the trade to divide such articles?—If a man brought me in a cartload of tools; I should say, "I cannot take in a cartload of tools."

1092. In reference to a pair of decanters, for instance, would you separate them?—If a person brought me a lot of decanters we would like to oblige the person bringing the decanters, and we feel that we have articles of a brittle kind.

1093. Would you take a halfpenny for the ticket on both the decanters or on one only?—If a person pledged a decanter I should make a pledge on the decanter; and if he offered to pledge another decanter I could take another decanter in pledge.

20 June 1870.

1094. Mr. Montague Guest.] Would you make one pledge or two of the pair of decanters?—I do not see how I could make them one pledge; I could not put one ticket on two articles.

1095. Mr. Morley.] Would you require the person pledging to pay on two tickets?—Yes; unless we could put them into one bundle.

1096. Mr. Montague Guest.] Would you charge for the stoppers, too?—I think the stoppers would, perhaps, keep in the decanters. In regard to decanters, I find a very good way of managing them. You see we cannot put them in a wrapping, because they would get broken; and I generally put a check in, and put the stopper in with the check, and it keeps it there.

1097. But would you charge for the stopper and the decanter, too?—No; the stopper is part of the decanter.

1098. Chairman.] Is it the practice of pawnbrokers, if several articles are brought to them, to split the articles into separate lots, in order to charge a halfpenny for each, or do they ticket all the articles as one parcel, and take one ticket for the whole?—I should take them as one parcel, and give one ticket for the whole, excepting in the case of decanters.

1099. Mr. Morley.] In the case of a pair of boots, what would you do; would you make out a ticket for each boot?—Certainly not. A case has arisen which brought that very prominently before the public; but I think it is altogether outside the regular trade.

1100. Mr. Hambro.] You say that the working classes are in the habit of taking their clothes out of pawn on the Saturday for the Sunday's wear; is it a usual thing for a man to take his Sunday clothes out of pawn every Saturday in the year?—I do not know that I have ever taken notice of a man pledging his clothes every week in the year; but as often as they want money they will pledge them. People frequently pledge their Sunday clothes, there are people who make a habit of it. They may pledge them one week and then leave them for three or four weeks. The fact of their redeeming them shows that they are pretty well off; because, if they could not redeem them, it would show that they were getting short of money, and were worse off.

1101. You have described the pernicious results of persons living above their incomes, which you say is the custom of the poor; do you think that the facilities of obtaining money by the lower classes by the practice of pawning tends to encourage this habit of living above their means?—I do not think it does.

1102. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You mentioned, did you not, that although the law is that you must sell all articles of 10 s. value by auction, still you do not do so?—I did.

1103. I think you stated also that you kept your articles for three years?—Some of them, but not many. If I suspected that the person would come to redeem the article, I should keep it. As I stated before, we generally know to whom the things belong, and we also know that if a person in needy circumstances has an article in pledge which would be forfeited at the end of 12 months, he will very probably at the expiration, or before the expiration, of that time, come and pledge something else to keep the first article going for another 12 months; or if he finds that it is beyond his power to redeem it, he will sell his interest in it, if he knows that he can sell it for more than the amount of the interest.

1104. I suppose you do not sell the articles under 12 months?—Certainly not.

1105. Do you keep regular books showing what you receive for the sales?—I do not.

1106. Do you keep no account of them at all?—No.

1107. Then nobody knows whether you sell the articles under or above the sum which you have given in pledge?—No; I stated, I think, that I never had a single application of that kind; and as I have been for 20 years in business, and never have had such an application, it would almost seem (at least to me) superfluous to do it. I daresay there are some cases in which they would as much see the necessity for doing it as I see the necessity for not doing it. My trade is of a different kind, running principally to a lower kind than that which is contained in the books which I have seen, and the number of the articles, as I have said, is greater.

1108. Are you aware that a great number of articles on the books, which have been submitted to the Committee, are of a very small value?—I was not aware of that, certainly not under 10 s., because the Pawnbrokers' Act does not recognise the keeping of sale books for articles under 10 s.

1109. Colonel Beresford.] In a very early part of your evidence, in answer to the Chairman, you spoke about your customers making inquiries as to the Act, is it the fact that anything like a majority of your customers ever make any reference to the Act at all?—No, I do not think they do.

1110. Do they not go in, and pawn, and come away, and know no more about the Act than the Man in the Moon?—I think the majority of them do not know anything about such a thing as a Pawnbrokers' Act being in existence.

1111. Your business seems to be of an exceptional character, are there not many other pawnbrokers in Salford, who do all the business which you decline, and who are very glad to get it?—No, people come to me and say (it is a common phrase), "If he will not take it in, nobody else will."

1112. And yet you seem to pick and choose?—I pick and choose; but I pick as many as I can get.

1113. You give as an illustration an article left at the cloak room or parcel office at a railway station; what analogy is there between an article taken to a cloak room at a railway station, where the charge is so much rent for a week, they advancing no money upon the article, and an article pledged at your shop?—If I take a cane, for instance, to a railway office, they will say that they want a penny for the first day, and a halfpenny a day afterwards, and they do not lend me any money on it, and they have no capital invested in it.

1114. Mr. Morley.] But they do not say that they charge a halfpenny for each day, do they?—Yes, they do, at the Victoria Station in Manchester; but I charge a halfpenny for five weeks and I advance money into the bargain, so that I have capital invested and they have none; therefore they would charge 30 times as much as I do, and they have no capital invested.

1115. Then why do you not set up a cloak room

oom ?—I would take the old maxim that a shoe-aker should stick to his last.

1116. There have been two or three questions at about the books, but I want a definite answer o this question: do you not, as a man of busi-ess, keep a regular set of books, including a dger, which will show at the end of the year hat profit you make ?—No.

1117. Then you ought to do so; do you really ot know what you make in the course of the ear; is it all haphazard?—It is; I do not keep ny exact account of income and expenditure; re do not require it, we can trust each other. f I had to employ hired labour very much, I aresay I should be compelled to do so.

1118. Do you know what is the average rate f interest that you get upon all the money that ou advance, taking all the year round?—I can-ot tell exactly; but my capital is turned over, believe, about four times in the year.

1119. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not turned ver from six to seven times?—The money is not rned over as often as that.

1120. You say that your pledges average s. 3 d. and that you have only about 2,500 l. in he business; that will be 16,000 l. a year, will not?—I have not gone into those figures; but assume that it is turned over about four times n the year, though I may be wrong.

1121. Colonel Beresford.] You stated, did you ot, that each ticket cost you 2½ d.?—I could ot state that precisely, because I could not tell what it cost. I have not gone into the calcula-ion; but I can rely upon the probity of those gentlemen who have stated so, and they will now better than I do about those calculations.

1122. It is clear to me that if they cost you nything like that, you not only could not make profit, but you must make a loss upon those ickets; because the cost upon those tickets would come to 791 l., is not that so?—Perhaps it osts me less, because I work a great deal at it myself; but in the case of those who have to pay or labour, it must cost them a great deal no doubt.

1123. You speak of liking, as customers, the people who come in every week for the same things over and over again; what class of people are they generally?—They are people who re-eive weekly wages, and who, therefore, have a resh supply of money every Saturday night. There are some people who only come once a quarter, and who draw quarterly wages. Then again there are some who draw their wages monthly, and who come when they get their fresh supply of money.

1124. What distinction do you draw between the people who you say are descending and de-scending, and whom you say you do not want as customers, and those people who are so wretchedly poor that they are obliged to come week after week with the same article, paying you an enor-mous rate of interest in the course of a year upon a small amount, whatever it might be?—They are not the poorest class; they are simply mortgaging their property every week and re-deeming it every week; they are people who are in receipt of a weekly wage, and the very first thing that they do with their money when they get it is to redeem the articles and put them in the position they were in before. There are others who receive monthly wages, and they do precisely the same thing every month; and those who receive a quarterly income do precisely the same thing every quarter. If those people got their money every day the probability is that they would have to redeem something every day, because the reason why they come every week is that they have weekly wages. Those people are not the very poorest people. They are sometimes getting good wages, but they manage to run a little beyond them, and they have to speculate upon the receipt of their wages the next week.

1125. Do you not think that it would be a great boon to them if they had not such a shop as yours open to them to come to and get this money, as probably then they would not "speculate" in the manner you have described?—If they could not borrow money they would have to sell their goods; that is what they would be reduced to.

1126. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Have you made any calculation as to your loss on pledges under two shillings?—I have not; but I assume that it is something like this: there are small tradesmen, grocers, for instance, who always sell certain things at a loss, but they say that it sells other things; and we say the same when we take in things under two shillings.

1127. Is your business a profitable one or not?—I can only answer that question in the same way as I answered it before; I have been a pawnbroker for 20 years, and I have not become a rich man.

1128. Colonel Beresford.] What do mean by "a rich man"?—A man who has enough and to spare.

1129. Chairman.] The question is whether, having regard to the extent of your business, you have made as much out of it as other people in other trades have done in 20 years in Salford; would a butcher or a baker, for instance, who was turning over as large a capital as you in the immediate neighbourhood, and who had been in steady business for 20 years, be supposed to have made more money than yourself?—Yes, I think he would.

1130. Have you made as much money in 20 years, with reference to your capital and position, as other persons carrying on retail trades in your district with the same capital?—I do not think so; but people are shut out from pawnbroking because they require more money to commence it with than most other trades.

1131. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you keep no books of sale of pledges above 10 s.?—I do not. We are not required by law to do so.

1132. Then, if a party applied to you for the surplus (if any) on the sale of an unredeemed pledge formerly belonging to him, I presume that you could give him no account of the sale of it?—I could not give him any account of the sale; I should simply say "We kept this article of yours for a long time, and you never came for it, and it is now forfeited."

1133. But you might, perhaps, have sold it immediately after the 12 months were up, might you not?—I am quite prepared to say that I should be open to that imputation, and I should have to do the best I could with the person when he came; but I have never yet suffered that inconvenience, as we are not required by law to account for pledges under 10 s.

1134. Do you not think that that is a very serious infringement of the Act of Parliament?—I cannot see it, because I have not complied with it for 20 years; and I presume that a thing which has never occurred to me for 20 years, with the number of pledges which I have taken in, cannot be of very great importance, as it is not an infringement of the law. There is one remark which I may make with regard to the time of forfeiture of bedding, for instance, and articles of winter wear. We have to keep them for 15 months, though the Act of Parliament would seem to imply that they need only be kept for 12 months. They are generally pledged when people can do without them; that is to say, blankets and bedding, and overcoats, and other things of that sort, are generally pledged about March, or April, or May. Those things are forfeited in March, April, or May in the year following; and, consequently, we have the overcoats and the blankets, and the heavy goods, to sell as the warm weather is coming on; but if we had a six months' forfeiture, the articles pledged in April or May would come out in the September or October following, and we should be able to lend a great deal more on them.

1135. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is there not a three months' power of notice?—Yes.

1136. That would make it nine months, would it not?—Yes.

1137. Mr. Morley.] Do you not consider that the present system favours those who have stolen goods to sell?—I do not think it does.

1138. Do you not think that it would be a desirable thing, with regard to pledges above a certain amount (say, above 10*s.*, or even above 1*l.*), if you were to require the person coming to pledge to write his name in a book, because, although he might write a false name, yet, supposing that he were brought to you by the police, or were taken before a magistrate, and were made to sign his name, it could soon be seen whether or not the writing was his own?—The idea never struck me; but I cannot see that there would be any great good arising from it.

1139. Upon your exceedingly loose system, I say deliberately that I think you deserve to be pulled up for your evasion of the law, because it is clear from your system that you could not help the police at all; is not that so?—We do frequently help them.

1140. Is it the case, that every time you renew a pledge you charge for the ticket?—That is so.

1141. Can you tell me any reason why you should charge for that ticket any more than a butcher should charge for a skewer, or in plain English when an article is brought into the shop, you being the party to determine whether you will offer 25 or 50 per cent. upon its value to the poor creature who comes into your shop, having no option but to accept your offer (although no doubt the competition of the trade keeps the thing pretty square), is it reasonable to charge for the exercise of your judgment, since you also charge a per-centage for your money?—I do not take that view of it; if you brought me an article into the shop and said, "I have brought this, tell me what it is worth"——

1142. I am not supposing anything of the kind; if a man brings you a watch, and says, "I want 30*s.* upon that," and you look at it, and see that it is not worth 30*s.*, and say, "I will lend you 15*s.*," and you charge him for that appraisement, what reason is there for that charge for the ticket?—I cannot give the reason, because it has been made before my time.

1143. Would it not be far better to charge, if it is necessary, a higher rate of interest, so that people may know in one sum what they have to pay?—I do not think that it is, for this reason: we will take a 5*s.* pledge, upon which I may charge a halfpenny for the appraisement and a penny for the interest. I only charge the appraisement once, and the article is only appraised once, so that if it remained in pledge for twelve months the total charges would be 1*s.* -$\frac{1}{2}$d. But if I made an extra rate of interest, and that halfpenny should extend over the twenty-fourth part of a shilling a month, for twelve months, it would complicate our accounts. I have never looked at it in that light.

1144. In regard to the mode of selling pledges, have you ever considered whether, in the interest of all parties, there might not be something like the Irish system introduced; that is to say, a professional auctioneer, who should keep a list of all the pledges, you first keeping a list (as you ought to do) of the number of each pledge, so that there might be the means of following them on the part of those who might turn up some of those days, and say, "I hope you have got such-and-such an article; I will pay your charges, and I should like to have that handed over to me;" and would it not be a satisfaction to you, in such a case, to be able to say, "Johnson the auctioneer did all that; he will tell you all about it"?—It would if the articles were valuable; but you must remember that the people who pledged those small articles would have to bear the additional charge; and I believe that it has been found that the Irish system does not work well, but that it is simply money wasted.

1145. Mr. Montague Guest.] I drew from you that you did not carry on your business very satisfactorily so far as the Act goes; in your opinion, is the business carried on pretty generally in the same way as you do it, and is the Act evaded?—Certainly; very generally.

1146. Is it generally evaded as much, if not more than, you evade it yourself?—Yes; I think I am a fair specimen of the pawnbrokers of our district.

1147. In fact, you think the Act is of no use?—I did not say so.

1148. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you mean to say that none of the pawnbrokers of Manchester or Salford deal according to the Act of Parliament?—I do not say so.

1149. You say that you are a good specimen of the mode in which the pawnbroking business is transacted in Manchester and Salford; do none of the pawnbrokers of those two large towns conduct their business according to the Act of Parliament?—I do not think they do. Some might evade it in one point, and some might evade it in another.

1150. But I mean as regards selling goods by auction, and keeping proper books; do they evade the law?—I believe generally it is evaded.

1151. Do you take in pictures, prints, books, bronzes, and things of that description?—No, we do not take those in.

1152. Colonel Beresford.] Do you allow three months at the expiration of the 12 months?—Yes.

1153. You would wish to reduce the 12 months to six months?—Yes.

1154. Would you still continue the three months?—Yes; from my experience, we have about 50 per cent. of the goods left, which have notice

notice given to be kept. It is not worth much, but I think I would retain it.

1155. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would you tell me what would be the rate upon 3 s. for 12 months?—Yes; 7½ d., or rather 7¼ d.

1156. Mr. Montague Guest.] Then you would charge the halfpenny instead of the farthing, I presume?—Oh! yes.

Mr. J. F. May.

20 June 1870.

Mr. Joseph Brooking, called in; and Examined.

1157. Chairman.] Where do you come from?—From Exeter.

1158. Have you a large pawnbroking business at Exeter?—Yes.

1159. Have you any other houses of business?—I have not at present, but I have had businesses in Bristol and in Leeds.

1160. Are you conversant with the state of business in those towns?—Yes.

1161. How long have you been in Exeter?—Nearly 41 years.

1162. How many people do you keep in your place in Exeter?—There are four there now.

1163. Are there four assistants besides yourself?—Yes; I do not attend to it much myself.

1164. What is about the capital employed in that business?—I have about 4,000 l. in it.

1165. Have you heard the evidence of the last witness?—Yes.

1166. With regard to the defects and inconveniencies of the present Acts, do you concur generally in the evidence which he has given?—Generally so, the Act is so exceedingly imperfect, that it is not possible to carry it out.

1167. Do you think that the Act is not carried out in the country, in the particulars which he mentioned, arising from the difficulties of the Act?—Probably so in his district, but I cannot speak of it. It is just so in the West of England.

1168. Do you think that the changes which have been proposed, are necessary to enable pawnbrokers to conduct their business fairly?—I think six months' forfeiture would be preferable to both parties, the pledger and the pawnbroker.

1169. Have you seen the Bill which has been submitted to Parliament?—I have.

1170. Do you consider that the changes proposed in that Bill are necessary?—I do not exactly approve of the Bill; in fact, there is scarcely anything in it of which I do approve.

1171. What changes do you think are necessary?—The present rate of interest, I think, is framed wrong entirely, and the lower class of pledges do not pay their way fairly. It is the higher class of pledges now which pays the pawnbroker.

1172. Have you made out a table of interest different from that which is now charged?—I have.

1173. What is your proposed rate of interest?—I would propose to reduce the rate of interest from 20 per cent. to 12½ per cent., and it would be strictly a monthly interest.

1174. Then what is the particular merit of your scheme?—Pledging and redeeming are two distinct transactions, and a charge should be made for brokerage, so that each pledge should pay its way more fairly.

1175. Do you mean that you would divide the charge into part interest, and part brokerage?—Yes.

1176. Do you think that people would readily understand that?—I think so; it seems to me very simple and very short.

1177. You recommend that there should be a brokerage of ½ d. on a shilling, and 1 d. on 4 s.; and 1½ d. on 6 s., and 2 d. on 8 s.?—Yes.

1178. Mr. T. Hughes.] Would you have that paid at the time of pledging?—Yes.

1179. Chairman.] What is the merit of going from 1 s. to 4 s.?—With regard to the shilling and under, the sums are very small. I have always found that my pledges have cost me on an average to work about 2 d. each; and by all those pledges delivered out for 1 d., that is to say, one halfpenny interest, and a halfpenny for the ticket, I consider that I lose a penny.

1180. And you could charge the same rate of interest for everything under 4 s.?—Yes, all below 4 s., a halfpenny a month.

1181. Would it be satisfactory to people who pledge, to pay as much for 2 s. as they paid for 4 s.?—You are obliged to strike an average, in matters of this kind.

1182. Then what is the merit in this table, as compared with the one which now exists?—The one which now exists is very complicated. As I said just now, scarcely any body can understand it strictly, whereas there would not be any complication at all in this, because it is very simple.

1183. There would be a charge for brokerage for 1 s.; and they would be compelled to pay interest for 4 s. under this scheme, would they not?—Yes, it would pay no more for one month for 4 s. than it does now; all pledges of 1 s. now pay one halfpenny for the ticket, and a halfpenny interest.

1184. The scale for the interest would not coincide with the scale for the brokerage, would it, as a scale of rates?—The brokerage would rise by 2 s. steps, and the interest would rise by 4 s. steps.

1185. Would not that be a double scale which would not harmonise?—That would be 2½ d. in the 1 l. for every month. The brokerage for work and stationery in the receiving of a pledge is one thing, and the redeeming at some future time is another.

1186. Have you found any general acquiescence in your idea?—I cannot say that I have.

1187. Have you had much experience with reference to sale by auction?—Yes.

1188. What is the practice in Exeter with reference to that?—It has been customary there for a number of years to hold an auction now and then, and we have what we call knock-down sales; we advertise them according to the Act of Parliament, and knock the goods down, but scarcely anyone ever attends.

1189. Then if nobody attends, who buys?—It is knocked down to those who are there and thus sold according to the Act of Parliament.

1190. Are the attendants chiefly pawnbrokers themselves, who buy in their goods and protect themselves?—Yes, in fact no other people come.

Mr. J. Brooking.

20 June 1870.

1191. On those sales is there generally a profit or a loss?—A loss.

1192. Are there many inquiries made as to the goods sold, to know whether there is any surplus?—I have been in the business more than 40 years, and I do not think 10 persons ever applied to me about it.

1193. Have you any other suggestion to make as to the alteration of the law different from those made by other witnesses, except the one which you have given?—No.

1194. Then what are the alterations of the law of which you disapprove in the Bill which has been introduced?—That would raise the interest up to 25 per cent., and I think a great prejudice would be created against pawnbrokers if anything of that kind came into use.

1195. Have you any objection to the other clauses of the Bill?—I do not approve of them generally. The six months' forfeiture is very good. Then, as regards time, I do not see why the pawnbroker should be bound to shut up and open at certain hours more than other trades.

1196. Then would you like to see the law entirely altered in that respect, and that he should be allowed to open and shut whenever he pleased?—I think so. As regards the tables of rates, I think it would be much better if it were left open, so that borrowers and lenders might deal with them in their own way.

1197. Do you mean that there should be free contracts?—Yes.

1198. With no statutory rate at all to protect people where there was no special contract?—Special contracts would form exceptions. There must be a running contract, so to speak.

1199. Do you think that it is desirable that a duplicate should carry on the face of it the rate of charge?—Yes.

1200. And that, if there is a special contract, it should be also stated?—Decidedly. It cannot be stated on the ticket now, because it is so complicated.

1201. Do you think that any days of grace should be allowed?—I think none at all. The plainer you make laws the better.

1202. Do you think that the forfeiture should be at the end of six months, unless there is a special contract to the contrary?—Yes; as regards the six months, a great many pledges no doubt would be left very much longer, and the pawnbroker himself would prefer its being done frequently, but that should be left to the pawnbroker and pledger.

1203. You mean that the pawnbroker should have the power of refusing to take a pledge, except for a certain limited period of six months?—I rather mean that six months should be the shortest period, but that a pawnbroker would keep a pledge longer if it was necessary.

1204. Do you mean that that should be the legal period, but that the pawnbroker should by contract keep it a further period if he chose?—Yes.

1205. Mr. Montague Guest.] You say with regard to those sales, that as a rule a sale is not well attended by anybody but the pawnbrokers themselves; other witnesses have told us that they always suffer a loss upon their sales by auction: is not that counteracted by means of the pawnbroker, whose sale it is, buying in his articles at a cheaper price than what he lent on them originally, and putting them into his stock, and then selling them at a greater profit afterwards?—I think not.

1206. Supposing that you lend 2 l. on a thing, and then buy it in for 1 l. 15 s., you buy it in at a profit, do you not?—They get knocked down, there are no bidders come.

1207. Do you mean to say that you originally have a loss of 5 s. and that then you lose afterwards?—Yes; I should be very glad to sell all my unredeemed pledges at 5 per cent. profit upon the principal.

1208. I understand that in reality, as a rule, you lend more money upon your pledges than you can possibly realise afterwards?—That is it; we are obliged to do so on account of the competition.

1209. Then I suppose that if you were not allowed to make a private sale and different charges you could not possibly carry on your trade?—No.

1210. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Do you keep any balance sheet?—I have always kept one until the last two or three years; I have left it to my son now principally.

1211. Does he keep a balance sheet?—Yes, we keep the books according to the Act.

1212. Therefore you can see what your expenses are?—Yes.

1213. What are your expenses for the year?—My expenses are from 250 l. to 300 l. a year.

1214. What number of pledges did you take in last year?—I think about 3,000 a month.

1215. That would be 36,000 a year, would it not?—Yes.

1216. During what hours do you keep open your shop?—We have opened for the last 20 years from eight to seven, 11 hours a day; the Act of Parliament states eight o'clock, for the summer half-year, but we always shut at seven o'clock.

1217. You shut earlier, but you do not open earlier?—No, we never open until eight o'clock.

1218. Do you always sell the articles above 10 s. which is unreclaimed at the end of 12 months?—We never take a thing down from the warehouse under 17 or 18 months; we keep it to see if the parties will come for it.

1219. And then you have a regular auction?—Sometimes, but not every year. We used to have it every year, but I never found any good come from it. Each auction cost me several pounds, and was of no benefit to anybody.

1220. You would never be able to show anybody where you had sold an article which he had pledged with you for more than 10 s.?—No, not after an auction.

1221. Mr. Hambro.] Do you think that any extensive alterations are necessary in the Act, or do you think that it works pretty well with the exceptions which you have stated?—I find that my gross profit is about 3 d. on each pledge.

1222. I ask, do you think any alterations are necessary in the Act?—I think it ought to be reduced to six months, and that there ought to be a fresh table of rates.

1223. Do you try to carry out the Act?—Not perfectly.

1224. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you say that you have no profit upon sales of pledges above 10 s. in value?—As regards the whole of my pledges above 10 s. I do.

1225. You have no pledges, then, above 10 s.?—Yes, I have a few.

1226. When you have an auction sale, do you get no profit upon your pledges above 10 s.?—Never.

1227. Do you take in jewellery?—I do.

1228. Do I understand you to say that you had a business at Leeds?—I had.

1229. Do not the pawnbrokers at Leeds have periodical auction sales?—Some sell by auction regularly there, and some do not, just as they do in the West of England.

1230. But the principal leading pawnbrokers have periodical sales in Leeds, have they not?—Yes; they have four a year; but the goods are brought from Liverpool partly.

1231. Do you know whether those pawnbrokers who have those periodical sales comply with the Act of Parliament as respects keeping books?—I really cannot say.

1232. Mr. Montague Guest.] With regard to the sales which you were mentioning, you said that, as a rule, only the pawnbrokers and the trade were there; do you have a regular knock-out afterwards, like Christie and Manson?—No; in fact, it is only pawnbrokers themselves and their assistants are present.

1233. If the sale were public and more generally known, do you not think that you would get a larger number of people there who would be more likely to run up the articles?—Not on pledges above 10 s. I had an auction last November for five days, and I lost about 70 l. or 80 l. by it.

1234. Did you have it properly announced in the papers?—Yes.

1235. In what journal did you have it advertised?—In all the public papers of Exeter, and I had 100 people there generally at a time, at the least.

1236. That was the produce of some time, I suppose?—That had been collecting for some time. I sold off my business at Bristol, and the unredeemed stock came down to Exeter to be sold with the unredeemed in Exeter.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALEXANDER M'CALL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. M'Call.

23 June 1870.

1237. Chairman.] WHAT is your office?—I am Chief Constable of Glasgow.

1238. How long have you held an office in connection with the police?—I have been 20 years in the Glasgow police force.

1239. How long have you held any superior appointment?—The whole of that time. For eight years of the 20 years I was inspector of the detective department, and I was 12 years superintendent of the central district, the principal division of the city.

1240. How long have you been chief constable?—It was within the last month that I was appointed chief constable.

1241. Have you had any opportunity, in your several appointments, of seeing the manner in which the pawnbrokers in Glasgow conduct their business?—I have had numerous opportunities.

1242. How many pawnbrokers are there in Glasgow?—I do not know the number of licenses which may be issued by the Excise; but there are 109 pawnbrokers doing business.

1243. What could be the proportion of pawnbrokers' shops to the population?—In the proportion of one pawnbroker to 4,220.

1244. Is that a greater or a less proportion than that of other trades to the population?—I cannot answer that question.

1245. How many publicans, for instance, are there in Glasgow?—The publicans are upwards 1,500 in number.

1246. So that there would be proportionately 15 times as many publicans as pawnbrokers?—Yes.

1247. Do you know how many bakers or butchers you have in Glasgow?—No; I could not answer that question.

1248. Is there much business transacted by each of those pawnbrokers in general?—A very large business.

1249. Do these shops exhibit large quantities of goods?—They do.

1250. Do they do a great business in receiving pledges?—They do.

1251. Have you any mode of ascertaining about how much the aggregate of the business is, either as regards capital or as regards the number of pledges?—Not in regard to capital or the amount paid on pledges; but I can form some opinion of the aggregate of the number of pledges.

1252. To what would that amount?—It would be at least equal to five and a-half millions per annum.

1253. How many of those would be pledges of small value, say, under 5 s. or 10 s.?—There will be five millions under 10 s., and about half-a-million above 10 s. and under 10 l.

1254. Do you know how many pledges, probably at one time, remain in pawn in those 109 shops?—I cannot state the number that may be in pawn at any one time.

1255. Can you estimate the number in any way?—I have no data from which to judge as to that.

1257. Do you mean that there are some pawn shops which stand in a doubtful aspect in relation to the police?—Yes; they are not honestly conducted.

1258. Have you had many complaints made to the police respecting the conduct of the pawnbrokers in the management of their business?—In regard to a few of them, and as to the illegal way in which they manage it.

1259. What is the chief illegality that has been brought under your notice?—I know of one pawnbroker, for instance, who engaged parties, or who had them in his service, to go out to the streets and sell his pawn tickets to any simpleton whom they might meet with in the streets; and when they came to lift the article out of pawn they found that it was inferior in value to the amount that was represented on the pawn ticket which they had bought.

1260. But how would the pawnbroker get possession of a ticket to sell in that way?—He perhaps takes what is represented to be a gold chain out of his sale room, and he issues a ticket for it perhaps at 2 l. 15 s.

1261. He makes a ticket for that article?—He makes a ticket for that article, and hands it to this person (who is called a "sticker") for 2 l. 15 s.

That

That "sticker" goes out into the street and induces country people to purchase this ticket, and when they come to lift the article, they find that the article represented in the pawn ticket is not value for the sum represented on the pawn ticket as having been advanced upon it.

1262. Then the article not being worth the value, of course the man is imposed upon to that extent?—He is.

1263. Have you found that to be an extensive practice, or is it only limited to a few shops?—It is only limited to a few shops.

1264. Is there any other particular class of deception which you find practised?—I have found cases where a pawnbroker issues a ticket marked with a larger sum than was paid to the individual on the ticket, and the pledger not examining the ticket when he takes it away, he finds that he has a larger sum to pay, when he comes back to redeem his pledge, than he really received.

1265. Do you mean that the pawnbroker marked more on the ticket than he advanced?—Yes; then I have found also, that parties when they wanted to redeem their pledges could not get the article which they pledged, but they got an inferior article to that which had been pledged.

1266. Do you suppose that that was from any blunder, or do you think that it was from design?—From the number which have come under my notice from one pawnbroker especially, it must have been designedly done by him.

1267. Do you mean that he shifted the tickets in his store, and gave an inferior article?—He put an inferior article under that pledge.

1268. And therefore got possession himself of the better article?—That was so.

1269. Have you any other class of deceptions?—A case came under my notice lately in regard to a pawnbroker who took in pledge from a woman, a large number of new shirts, drawers, and webs of plaiding, intrusted to her for the purpose of making up into articles; the woman was apprehended for embezzling the goods. The detective officers on going to the pawn office, where the woman said she had pawned the articles, found that the pledges were marked off as redeemed; but afterwards, they found the articles in the pawnbroker's possession.

1270. Did he refuse to give them up, saying that they had been redeemed?—He told the detective officers that they had been redeemed, but the detective officers afterwards found them in his possession.

1271. Have you experienced much difficulty in following goods into the pawnbrokers, or in getting them back as a rule, or is it an exceptional case?—It is exceptional; it transpired that this same pawnbroker had called on the prisoner a day or two before the apprehension, and had got delivery of the tickets from her.

1272. Do you suppose that in that case, he must have known that the goods were wrongfully obtained?—I think at that point, when he went to get the tickets from the woman, he did know it; but whether he knew it at the time of taking them in, I would not like to say, although I think that that is indicative of his suspecting that there was something wrong.

1273. By getting those tickets, he prevented the discovery of the fact, that the goods were with him, and so would not have had to give them back again; would that have been his motive?—That would have been his motive.

1274. Have you had many complaints that people have a difficulty in getting their goods back at all, or that obstructions are thrown in their way?—With one pawnbroker I have had almost daily complaints. He is a man who is not of sober habits, and is not honest.

23 June 1870.

1275. Then, perhaps, he does not know at one time what he does at another time?—That is very possible, but still I would say that such a person should not be in the trade.

1276. Do you think there is any considerable facility for pledging stolen goods by pawnbrokers in Glasgow?—There is a facility.

1277. Have you reason to suppose that they have given effect to the Act to any extent by making inquiries from suspicious people before taking goods in pledge?—I think there are very few of them who would take in stolen goods knowingly.

1278. Have you any reason to suppose, from cases which have occurred, that they are active in making any inquiries when suspicious pledges are offered to them?—I think more might be done by them in the way of assisting the police.

1279. Have you had many cases where a pawnbroker has given information in consequence of suspicious circumstances arising at the time a pledge is offered?—Yes, we have had a number of people handed over to the police by the pawnbrokers for having in their possession stolen property, and offering it for pledge.

1280. Do you think generally that the pawnbrokers fairly carry out that provision in the Act in assisting the police in the detection and recovery of stolen goods?—I do not think they do it to the extent that they might do, for they look upon themselves as aggrieved in having to give time to attend police courts and other courts, losing their time without any remuneration. They have no interest in putting stolen goods into the hands of the police, as it may thereby cause them considerable loss in regard to the time of themselves and their assistants. So far as the pawnbroker is concerned, there is no remuneration for him whatever, supposing he remains a whole week at a court, so that I am persuaded that some of them rather than put themselves to the trouble of handing over to the police a doubtful person who comes to pledge, would rather let him go.

1281. They would rather send the man away altogether?—Yes, they would let him go, and say that they would not take the pledge.

1282. They are the only people who are called upon by the law to take an active part, I think, in assisting the police in the detection of robbery?—We have a class of traders called brokers, who are under a license from the magistrates, and who are also bound to assist, as far as possible, in the detection of crime.

1283. Is that under the general law of Scotland, or under a special Act?—It is under the Glasgow Police Act.

1284. Are they bound to make inquiries of suspicious people, and to communicate to the police?—They are.

1285. Supposing that they neglect that duty, have the magistrates the power of withdrawing their license?—They would withdraw their license at the next licensing court, in all probability.

1286. Have the magistrates an absolute discretion in granting the licenses under the Police Act?

23 June 1870.

Act?—They have an absolute control in regard to the brokers.

1287. So that they may cancel the license without a judicial conviction?—They may do so without assigning any reason for it.

1288. Do they, in point of fact, exercise authority over the brokers, without waiting for a judicial conviction?—They have frequently deprived a broker of his license where there was not a conviction before a court against him.

1289. Under the Police Act, can those brokers be summarily tried before the magistrates for offences?—They can.

1290. Will you give a short statement of the sections of the Glasgow Police Act relating to those brokers?—The sections are from the 200th section to the 206th section inclusive, of the Glasgow Police Act 1866.

1291. In the first place what sort of brokers are they?—These are what are called the small brokers. The words of the Act are these: "The word 'broker' shall mean any person who occupies and uses any building or part of a building or other place, including a stall in public market, as a dealer in second-hand goods or articles, or in old metals, bones or rags.'" He is liable to be fined 5 l. if he carries on the business of a publican; if by himself or his servant he purchases any ticket issued by the authority of any parochial board or charitable institution for relief or any article of clothing issued as aforesaid, and legibly marked as or known by him to be so issued; if by himself or his servant purchases, receives, or takes in any goods of any manufacture, or of any part or branch of any manufacture, either mixed or separate, or in course of manufacture; if after notice by any constable that certain articles have been stolen, embezzled, or fraudulently obtained, he omits or fails to give information at the police office of the district in which his shop is situated; if he keeps or suffers to be in his premises any smelting-pot or implement for melting, altering, or defacing gold, silver, lead, or other metals; or if he receive stolen property knowing it to be stolen. He is also liable to a penalty of 5 l. if he acts as a pawnbroker or carries on his trade communicating with a pawnbroker's office, if he has not the words "licensed broker" painted over his door; if he carries on his business between 11 o'clock on Saturday night and eight o'clock on the following Monday morning, or between 10 o'clock on any other night and eight o'clock on the following morning; if he by himself or his servant purchases any article from any person who is apparently under 14 years of age; if he receives or purchases the note or ticket of any pawnbroker for any article which has been pawned, or contracts and negotiates in any manner with the holder of such note or ticket, or any person on his behalf for the purchase of any article specified therein; if he omits to keep regular books or to enter therein a proper and distinct description of any article purchased or received by him or his servant; or if, in the case of the purchase of a lot of books, he shall not enter the name and place of abode of the person from whom he purchases or receives the same, the date and hour of the day of such transaction, and the price paid; if at any time during his business hours without reasonable excuse, he does not on demand produce the books kept by him to the chief constable, or any constable acting under him, and permit such constable to subscribe his name immediately after the last entry therein; if he omits to enter a proper and distinctive description of any book, or lot of books, sold or suffered by him to be removed from his premises within seven days; if he omits to keep on his premises any other article purchased or received by him for the full period of seven days; if at any time during his hours of business, or at any other time, without reasonable excuse, he does not on demand produce to the chief constable, or to any constable acting under or appointed by him, every or any article which he has purchased or taken in, and which is in his possession, regarding which information has been given tending to show that it has been stolen or fraudulently obtained. Then there are certain conditions which the pawnbroker must observe also under this Police Act in addition to the ordinary law.

1292. Will you state what those conditions are?—A pawnbroker is here defined to be any person who occupies and uses a building, or part of a building, or other place for the purchase or sale of any article, or for taking in any article by way of security for money advanced thereon, and who purchases or receives, or takes in any article, and pays or advances, or lends thereon any sum of money not exceeding 10 l., with or under any agreement or understanding express or implied, or which, from the nature or character of the dealing, may reasonably be inferred, that such article may be afterwards redeemed or re-purchased on any terms whatever: then any pawnbroker who is guilty of any of the following acts or omissions within the City, is in respect thereof liable to a penalty not exceeding 5 l., if he acts as a broker, except in the sale of articles bonâ fide forfeited, in accordance with the provisions of the Pawnbrokers' Acts; if he carries on his trade in premises communicating with those of a broker; if at any time during his hours of business, or at any other time without reasonable excuse, he does not on demand, produce to any constable, and suffer to be examined his books in which articles purchased or taken in by him are entered, and produced to any constable every or any article which he has purchased or taken in, and which is in his possession, regarding which information has been given tending to show or to render it probable that the same has been stolen, embezzled, or fraudulently obtained, or does not, when required by any constable, deliver every or any such article for the ends of public justice to the officer on duty at the police office, who shall grant a receipt; therefore the same regulations in regard to brokers which I have already mentioned, apply to some extent to a pawnbroker; he is not to carry on the business of a publican; he is not to receive any goods belonging to a charitable institution; he is not to take in any articles which are apparently in the course o manufacture or unfinished.

1293. You say that he is not to take in any article that is in the course of manufacture; bu supposing that the pledger was a man working u his own goods, and was himself the manufacture of the article, he then could pledge it, could h not?—The pawnbroker must not take in an article in the course of manufacture brought t him as a pledge. The pawnbroker would not i that case take it in.

1294. Would he not take it in even thoug the man was working up his own raw materia and wished to pledge it?—It would be illega bu at practically we have never had a case of that rt, where a pawnbroker has been charged with king in goods which did not turn out to have en dishonestly got by the person who pledged em.

1295. He does it at his own risk?—He does it his own risk. The Act would prohibit him om taking from a manufacturer his own goods.

1296. And therefore, if he does it, he must tisfy himself that the person is the true owner, herwise he does it at his own risk, and is subct to the penalty; is that the effect of the Act?—It is, practically.

1297. Are there any other restrictions upon e pawnbroker?—He is also bound to give noce to the police office when he discovers that he as any property which has been reported to him stolen, or embezzled, or fraudulently obtained. hen he is not to keep any smelting-pot or imple- ent for melting, altering, or defacing gold, lver, lead, or other metals. Those are the prosions of the Police Act as regards pawnbrokers.

1298. How do you find that those provisions ork in restraining the pawnbrokers in Glasgow om doing those various things which are prohiited?—I think they are very useful.

1299. Do you think that they tend to assist e pawnbroker in preventing him from embarkg in improper transactions?—I have no doubt at they have a very considerable restraining ffect upon him.

1300. I suppose that this Act enables an honest an to assume a firmer attitude in relation to his ustomers than he otherwise could do?—It does; nd the Police Act protects him against damages he hands over any suspected person to the olice.

1301. Will you be good enough to read the ndemnity clause?—It is the 205th clause, "It hall be lawful for every pawnbroker or broker, nd he is hereby required to seize and detain any erson who offers to pawn, sell, or deliver to him ny article regarding which notice has been given o him, in manner hereinafter provided, tending o show, or to render it probable that the same as been stolen, embezzled, or fraudulently obained, or which he has reasonable ground for uspecting was stolen, embezzled, or fraudulently btained, and to deliver such person to a constable, to be taken to the police office; and every pawnbroker or broker so acting shall be freed rom responsibility, unless malice be averred and proved."

1302. Have you ever heard any objection from he pawnbrokers in Glasgow as to the stringency f those provisions affecting them in the Police Act?—I have not.

1303. Do you think, on the whole, that they approve of them?—I think they do. So far as I have been able to ascertain their opinion upon the matter, they do not seem to have any objection to it.

1304. Do you consider that the general law, and your local law, together, are sufficient to prevent any inconvenience arising from the pawnbroking system, or that any further provision should be made?—I think that it would be very desirable that the magistrates of the city should have the power to license pawnbrokers as well as brokers, or that they should, at all events, give a certificate to the Excise, as is done with regard to publicans.

1305. Would you recommend that the license should be granted by the Excise upon the magistrate's certificate?—The license should, I think, be granted by the Excise on a magistrate's certificate.

1306. Do you think that the magistrates should have the same jurisdiction in cancelling the certificate as they have over other brokers, or as they have over the publicans?—Something similar to the publicans. I would advise that they should be entitled to inquire into the character of the applicant for a license; that they should be entitled to judge whether an additional pawn office was needed in the locality, and whether the premises were properly situated and constructed, and were well lighted and ventilated through the day. Such matters as those, I think, they should be entitled to inquire into.

1307. Do you mean that they should inquire whether the premises were suitable as regards the safety of the pledges?—Whether they were suitable as regards the safety of the pledges as well.

1308. What jurisdiction do you think that the magistrates should have in cancelling those licenses; should it be summary, or upon conviction?—If such conduct as I have referred to was acont ravention of the Pawnbrokers' Act, I think that perhaps a conviction would be the safest course.

1309. With regard to convictions, what do you think is the most convenient jurisdiction for entertaining all questions connected with pawning between the pledger and the pawnbroker; the fiscal court or the magistrates' court?—All cases in Scotland are prosecuted at the instance of the procurator fiscal; but there are different procurators fiscal; there is the procurator fiscal of the justice of the peace court, the procurator fiscal of the magistrates' court, and the procurator fiscal of the sheriffs' court.

1310. Where do you think they ought to be prosecuted?—I think before the magistrates who granted the license to the pawnbroker.

1311. Not in the sheriffs' court?—Not in a city like Glasgow at all events; but in country districts it might either be before the sheriffs' court or before the justice of the peace; but in a city like Glasgow, I should say that it should be before a magistrate's court.

1312. How many magistrates sit upon the bench in the Glasgow magistrates' court?—One.

1313. Is that a stipendiary magistrate?—No, they are citizen magistrates. He has along with him a legal man, an assessor to advise him in matters of law.

1314. Is he a part of the court?—He is not part of the court. In the licensing courts, the whole of the magistrates may attend or any portion of them.

1315. What is the number under the Publicans' Act?—There must be two under the Publicans' Act.

1316. That is a special committee, is it not?—No, there is a statutory time for the court sitting.

1317. Is there not some restrictions under the Licensing Act against all the magistrates coming in?—No; there must be at least two magistrates before they can sit upon such application.

1318. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] What is the general attendance upon the licensing courts?—Sometimes we have the whole eight magistrates, and sometimes four and sometimes five.

1319. But generally is there a majority of magistrates present?—As a rule there is a majority.

1320. Chairman.]

23 June 1870.

1320. Chairman.] With reference to the effect of the Pawnbrokers' Act compelling a pawnbroker to do his business under very close restrictions, and at a certain rate of charge; do you think that it would be an advantage to the community, if there was more facility given for making special arrangements or other arrangements?—I should be inclined to think that there should be strictly defined rules, in regard to the transactions between the pawnbroker and the person who comes to pledge the article.

1321. Do you mean that the conditions of the dealing should all be statutory?—The conditions should, I think, all be statutory.

1322. Do you think that those statutory conditions should enable the pawnbroker to take in every kind of commodity that was offered, and that he should be at liberty to make a special charge for commodities which were expensive to deal with?—I think that it would be very desirable that as far as possible there should be no inducement held out to poor people, or improvident people, or drunken people, to dispose of their body clothing or their bed clothing.

1323. Would the inducement be pledging it with a pawnbroker rather than selling it?—I think they would be more likely to retain it in their possession, and that if they had to resort to selling to a party they would not so readily part with it.

1324. Is it your opinion that a pawnbroker should not be allowed to take in body clothing?—I think at all events that they should not be allowed to take them in under a certain pledge value.

1325. How would you estimate that?—My notion, is that if it could be done there should be no pledges under 10 s.; perhaps that is too high, but I think at all events 5 s. would be low enough, so that there should be nothing under 5 s.

1326. But then what would be the condition of a man who was in absolute need of bread, who had more coats than he had upon his back?—There are very few cases, I should say, of provident well-behaved people in such circumstances.

1327. May there not be men whose families want food, and who have more clothes than they have on their backs?—Those families are generally the families of improvident parents, given to intemperate habits, or wasteful habits.

1328. But if they are in want of money, would it not rather lead to their selling their clothes, and getting rid of them altogether if they could not favour them?—It might under such a necessity.

1329. But as between the two evils, which do you think the lesser: that a man should sell his clothes, out and out, or that he should pawn them and have the chance of getting them back?—I think it would be better that he should lie under the necessity of selling them out and out for the purposes of restraint, so that he would be less likely to sell them; I am strongly of opinion that there should be no pledges such as 9 d., or 1 s., or 1 s. 6 d., or 2 s.

1330. What is your idea then of what the people do with the 1 s. 6 d. or the 2 s. when they get it?—As a rule, they expend it in the purchase of whisky or other intoxicating liquors.

1331. You do not think that much of the money goes for any of the necessaries of life?—I do not think so.

1332. Passing from clothes, do you think it desirable that there should be further facilities given for pledging in general, so that the pawnbroker could take in commodities attended with risk, and be entitled to make a charge for the risk?—When you go above 10 s., I think the pawnbroker has to deal with a different class of people to a considerable extent.

1333. Do you think they might be left to make their own bargain?—No.

1334. Would you give the person pledging the power to make a bargain for himself?—No; I think he should have a defined interest to charge.

1335. But supposing that commodities are brought to the pawnbroker which cannot conveniently be taken in at that rate, may the person pledging with the pawnbroker be at liberty to make any special contract?—In the case, perhaps, of a chest of drawers, or an eight-day clock, or where the articles are bulky, or fragile, or in any way risky, there might be some power given to them to make some agreement in regard to storage.

1336. Supposing that a man wished to pledge a cheese, do you think that a pawnbroker should be bound to keep it for 15 months, for instance, or that he might be at liberty to make a contract to keep it for a month?—Some cheeses would improve by keeping, and others would be spoiled.

1337. But having regard to that fact, would you allow the person pledging with the pawnbroker to make a special contract to advance upon the cheese?—That is a perishable article, or at least perishable to a greater extent than it is improveable. There are more cheeses that are perishable in that time, I think, than there are that are improveable.

1339. What would you do then?—I think that the pawnbroker should refuse to take the article.

1340. But supposing that a man wants assistance, why should the law prevent the man from having assistance; if he has something which he can convert into money, why should the law say that he must not do it; how would the police, for instance, think that good order was prejudiced by such a transaction as that?—Unless you defined such articles, I think you would open a door to the pawnbroker, perhaps taking advantage of people who are not able to protect themselves.

1341. Do you think that, as a rule, people do not know the value of the goods which they possess, whether large or small, and that they are not able to protect themselves?—I think that, perhaps, in pledges above 10 s., people very likely do know the value pretty well.

1342. They have bought them, have they not?—They have bought them.

1343. And, therefore, they have already exercised their intelligence in dealing with the commodity, have they not?—Yes, but it is more a matter of necessity, I should say, with a person pledging an article above 10 s. in value, and he might therefore submit to any terms.

1344. But would it not rather give him more power of dealing with a pawnbroker, if he had everything in his house to pledge, rather than if he were condemned to pledge particular things?—He would have the more choice.

1345. Therefore, to that extent would he not be in a stronger position in making his bargain than than as if he were restricted to a few articles?—He certainly would have a greater choice of the articles in his house.

1346. Do you think that there is any advantage in pledges being kept for 12 months at the option of the pawner, or that the time might, with advantage, be shortened?—I think that it is possible that it might be advantageous to shorten the period with reference to some articles, such as woollen articles and wearing apparel, where they are liable to depreciate in value from moths, and perhaps from the change of fashion.

1347. Do you think that, considering the difficulties of discriminating in any Act of Parliament, as to what would be desirable, and what would not be desirable, the time generally might be shortened, or that it would be possible to draw up a schedule of commodities in respect of which the time should be shortened?—I think it would be desirable to have a schedule of articles.

1348. Do you think that you could draw up such a schedule?—I think it might be done.

1349. Supposing that the justices had had the power during the time of your experience of cancelling licenses, how many licenses do you think they would have cancelled during any given period in Glasgow?—I think just now, at all events, there are three pawnbrokers out of the 109 pawnbrokers in Glasgow who are ripe for their licenses being cancelled if the magistrates had the power.

1350. Mr. Hambro.] Are the Glasgow pawnbrokers generally as a class men who are well off; are they men of some capital?—They are men of capital, either belonging to themselves or borrowed.

1351. Do many of them fail in business?—I have heard of very few, if any, failing.

1352. If a man fails in business, is his business generally bought up by some other pawnbroker?—I think that, as a rule, that is the case. If he goes out of the trade or leaves the country, or anything of that sort, I think his business is bought up by some other pawnbroker.

1353. Do the form of books kept by the pawnbrokers vary very much?—They do; that is to say, the ruling of them varies, and the different columns.

1354. Do the tickets vary?—They do.

1355. Are you speaking now only of Scotland?—I am speaking of Glasgow.

1357. Do you think from your experience of Glasgow, that the present facilities of pawning are injurious to the moral welfare of the lower classes?—I think that the pawnbroking system is injurious to the working classes as a system; it holds out too many facilities to improvident people to dispose of their property.

1358. If free contract were allowed between the pawnbroker and the pawner, do you not think that the pawnbroker would be likely, as being in the position of a rich man dealing with a poor man, to have the best of the bargain?—I think he would; he would be quite able to dictate the terms.

1359. Can you imagine the case of a man being hard up who came to a pawnbroker and said, "I want some money," and of the pawnbroker refusing to lend him any except upon the most usurious terms?—Yes; I think it would be quite within his power to dictate what terms he should give him.

1360. And the poor man wanting money would have to put up with it, would he not?—He would have to put up with it.

1362. Do you not, as head of the police, know it yourself?—They are not to receive or take in any goods or chattels by way of pawn before eight o'clock in the evening between Michaelmas Day and Lady Day, or before seven o'clock in the forenoon and after nine o'clock in the evening during the remainder of the year, except only until 11 o'clock on the evenings of Saturday throughout the whole year.

1363. Do you not think that it would be an advantage for the interest of the public, that those hours should be further restricted?—I think the nearer that you bring the hours of a pawnbroker to daylight the better.

1364. The pawnbroking trade is under the inspection of the police in Glasgow, is it not?—It is.

1365. You require no special warrant to search a pawnbroker's establishment, I believe?—No special warrant; the Police Act is the warrant.

1366. The brokers are obliged to register all their purchases, but the pawnbrokers do not register any purchases above 10 l., I believe?—Yes, in the case of every purchase by a broker, he must register the amount paid, the person from whom he received it, the date, and the hour of the day at which it was brought.

1367. Have you ever suffered any inconvenience in searching for stolen property under that system, from the fact that you could not ascertain whether the property was in the hands of the pawnbroker or not?—We have experienced disadvantage from it.

1368. Have you searched for stolen property when it was denied that it existed in the pawnbroker's shop, and have you afterwards discovered by the tickets on a thief who was apprehended, that it had been in the pawnbroker's shop?—That it had been lying in the pawn office when the police were searching for it, and also for some months after the pawnbroker had been furnished with a description of the property.

1370. Do you not think that it would be an advantage in the public interest, that pawnbrokers should be obliged to register all their transactions of whatever value?—I think every transaction which a pawnbroker has, should be entered in his book, and be open to the inspection of the police, whatever may be the amount.

1371. Do you think that there is a great deal of stolen property which is pawned?—A considerable quantity of the property which is stolen is pawned, and some of it is recovered, of course, by the police, after it is pawned.

1372. When you apprehend a gang of thieves, do you often find in their possession, either upon their persons or in their houses, a great many pawn tickets?—Almost invariably; I do not think the police will search one house in 20 of the the thieving class without finding pawn tickets either in the house or on the person of the thief.

1373. Could you give the Committee any idea of what is the greatest number of pawn tickets which you have found on the person of one thief?—I think I could almost say that I have known the presence of 100 pawn tickets in the possession of one thief. That is perhaps an extreme case, but still I have known it.

1374. Do you think, therefore, that under those circumstances pawnbroking induces stealing?—I have not the slightest doubt about that, to this extent, that everything that a thief steals is turned into whisky or other strong drinks, and that whatever he steals he turns it into money to obtain that; and very frequently he does that by resorting to the pawn office as a means of getting the money for the purpose.

1375. The Right honourable Gentleman in the Chair has endeavoured to draw a comparison between the number of pawn shops in proportion to the population and the number of other trades; but I suppose that a very small portion of the community of Glasgow deal with pawnbrokers, whereas the whole community deal with grocers and other trades?—That is so.

1376. Chairman.] For whisky?—For whisky. The number who deal with the publicans is certainly greatly larger than the number who deal with the pawnbrokers.

1377. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You may say the whole community?—You may say the whole community, except a small section of teetotallers.

1378. I suppose even you, yourself, sometimes take a "jo"?—I do not consider it a sin, at all events.

1379. Chairman.] I took whisky as the standard of universal dealing in Glasgow, and I presume that my assumption was correct?—That is the standard drink, no doubt, in Glasgow, and for Scotchmen, I think, generally.

1380. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I suppose that the parties who deal with pawnbrokers' shops are generally the very lowest in the community?—The very lowest, I should say as a rule, and that applies very strongly to pledges under 10*s.*

1381. You have already stated that you believe that by far the greater proportion of that money goes for the purchase of drink?—It does.

1382. Have you known instances in which a drunken wife has pawned every article of furniture in the house, and every stitch of clothing belonging to her family?—Yes, I have known drunken wives who have cleared out the house entirely in that way, and have not left an article in the house.

1383. And driven her family to the streets and her husband to destruction?—Yes; stripping the children of their clothes.

1384. I suppose that you are of opinion that we should endeavour, as far as possible by legislation, to restrict the possibility of such a thing happening, rather than to encourage it by giving it greater facilities?—I am clearly of opinion that it should be restricted.

1385. Although you stated that you thought that the pawnbrokers should not be at liberty to take in body clothing or bed linen, at a lower sum than 10*s.*, you did not intend to prevent other kinds of property being pledged for a lower sum than that?—I do not think it would apply to some other property which might be named; I mean body and bed clothing.

1386. Do you think it would be to the advantage of the public that pledges below half-a-crown should not be permitted under any consideration?—I should have no hesitation in saying that under half-a-crown there should be no pledges at all.

1387. The amount is so small that there is no class of the community to whom it can be of any advantage, I presume?—I do not think that half-a-crown is likely to meet the case of a provident man in distress, and the likelihood is that that half-crown is spent in drink.

1388. Do you think that the present system encourages vice and improvidence?—I am clearly of that opinion.

1389. Have you any idea of the average value of the pledges in Glasgow?—I think it will run to about 4*s.* or from that to 4*s.* 3*d.*, over the whole of the pledges. I am guided to that opinion by a pawnbroker who is pretty extensively engaged in the business.

1390. Can you give us statistics of the growth of this trade?—In the year 1861 there were in Glasgow 79 pawn offices, I think; I do not state that from official information, but I think I am correct. Now there are 109.

1392. Do you think that the social position of the working classes and the poorer classes has improved with this increasing trade of pawnbroking, as regards their comfort and well-being?—Of course wages have risen, and the working classes as a whole, I should think, are in a better condition than they were.

1393. I am speaking of the class who deal with pawnbrokers; do you think that they have improved?—I do not think they have improved, but, on the contrary, that they are getting worse.

1394. Is it not the case, that poverty, misery, and disease have increased very much within the last 10 years in Glasgow amongst the very lowest of the population?—They have increased, and they are increasing.

1395. Are you aware whether the parties pledging for those small sums are Scotch, English, or Irish?—I believe the large majority are Irish.

1396. Are the great majority of your pawnbrokers Irish also?—I could not say that; I know that there are some Scotchmen amongst them, and I know that there are some Irishmen; I should think the Irish element would preponderate.

1398. Is that decidedly an advatage to the public?—It enables you to go back upon the transaction more easily.

1399. Would it be an advantage that it should be required of all pawnbrokers to keep books of an exactly similar character?—I would have in any Act which might be passed hereafter a schedule defining the book to be kept, giving a specimen of what might be desirable also in regard to the ticket, so as to have an uniform ticket.

1400. What books do you consider it desirable that a pawnbroker should be obliged to keep?—I think the two books which they have just now are very good, one for pledges up to 10*s.*, and another for pledges above that amount.

1401. You

1401. You were speaking of the number of pawn tickets which you occasionally found upon the persons, or in the rooms of thieves; I suppose it is quite the exception for thieves to redeem pledges?—I would not like to say that it is exceptional altogether, for instance, a thief acquiring a sum of money by theft at any time, lives upon that until it is spent; then when that is done, he may lift with some of the money the articles which he has pledged before, and then when the money is done he goes back and pledges them again, until he commits another theft.

1402. Have you any idea of the ratio of forfeited pledges in Glasgow?—I have not.

1403. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Is there generally more than one entrance to the pawnbrokers' establishments in Glasgow?—Frequently there are three or four entrances, but I think, as a rule, they have more than one.

1404. And you very often find them at the corners of streets, do you not?—There are some at corners of streets, but they are always up closes or courts.

1405. Do you find that that increases the difficulties of the police in watching suspected places?—The more numerous the entrances to the pawn office, the more difficult it is for the police to control it.

1406. Would you suggest any restrictions on the number of entrances?—I think it would be very desirable to have only one entrance to a pawnbroker's, and that entrance as public from a public street as possible.

1407. Do you think there is any adequate reason for allowing more than one entrance?—I do not think so; I do not see what purpose it can serve, except to screen people going up to the pawn office. The largest warehouses in Glasgow have entrances flush with the most public streets.

1408. Colonel Beresford.] Do you come here voluntarily to-day, or at the request of anybody?—I came here from a notice which was sent down through the post from the Committee.

1409. Have you made yourself acquainted with the Bill which is now before the House?—I have.

1410. Do you think that the present rate of interest which pawnbrokers get, is not sufficiently remunerative?—I would not like to express an opinion upon that; I do not think that I am in a position to do so very well.

1411. Do you approve of freedom of contract?—I do not; but I am clearly of opinion that whatever may be the rate of interest that a pawnbroker is allowed to charge, it is desirable that it should be a remunerative one; that is to say, that it should remunerate him properly for his time and trouble, and money; for I would expect that if you did that, you would increase the respectability of the pawnbroker and of the trade generally.

1412. According to your evidence, it appears that out of five and a-half millions of pledges, five millions are for sums under 10 s.; the conclusion is, that the business generally done at Glasgow is of what is called the "low" class?—Yes, there is only one pledge in twenty that is above 10 s.

1413. As I understand it, they are two quite distinct businesses, or at least nearly so; it is so in London at any rate?—The same pawnbroker carries on both branches, but he enters them in different books.

1414. But you would not find the more wealthy man, at all events in a city like London, doing much of the low business?—No; the higher the class of the pawn offices the less of that is done. We have one or two pawn offices where they have very few small pledges, the majority of the pledges being of the higher class.

1415. You spoke about the necessity of the getting of a license being preceded by a certificate from the magistrates; why should not the magistrates issue pawnbrokers' licenses just as they issue spirit licenses?—The magistrates do not issue spirit licenses; they merely issue a certificate to the Excise that they may grant a license.

1416. Do you think that the license should be renewable from year to year, and that in the event of complaint against the pawnbroker it should be stopped?—From year to year it should be renewed, and the authorities should be entitled to state to the court any contraventions that had taken place during the year by the pawnbroker, and let the magistrates judge whether he should continue a licensed pawnbroker or not.

1417. Would you do away with pawn-shops altogether?—I do not think that would be a loss to the country, or a national calamity, supposing that they were done away with altogether; I think that if we did without them up to the year 1800, we should be able to do without them now.

1418. Chairman.] But there was a time, was there not, when the people of Scotland did without breeks?—That was not done for want of breeks.

1419. Colonel Beresford.] I suppose that the reason for your proposal to confine the time during which the pawnbrokers' shops should be open to daylight is, that you consider that illegal pawning, and the pawning of stolen goods, would take place after daylight with greater facility?—I think the darkness is a facility for illegal pawning.

1420. And you would not at all advocate, as one witness from the country did, that the pawnshops should be open all day, and all night too?—I should think that would be very wrong, and very injurious.

1421. Mr. Plimsoll.] You have told the Committee that you estimate the number of pledges annually made in Glasgow, at five and a-half millions; how did you obtain that information?—I know the number of pledges during the month of May last.

1422. But how did you obtain the information?—From the pawnbrokers' books.

1423. Then it appears that the pawnbrokers' books, which the law gives the police power to search, with a view of recovering stolen goods, are searched for other purposes as well?—I knew that this inquiry was likely to arise.

1424. But the law gives the police power to inspect those books for the purpose of discovering stolen property; it would appear that those books are searched for other purposes as well?—I think it is quite a proper purpose. I do not know for any other purpose for which it is used, unless for this purpose, of which I am about to speak.

1425. Do you think it reasonable that pawnbrokers should be required to aid the police in the discovery of crime, and to attend before the magistrates, being unpaid for that attendance; and do you think that their being unpaid is likely to make them at all zealous in helping the police?—I think the fact of their not being paid tends the other way.

1426. They wish, I suppose, to avoid unpaid labour as much as other people?—They do, of course.

1427. You say that you think that the minimum pledge ought to be 5*s.*; supposing that a person had something to pledge, on which a pawnbroker would not advance more than 3*s.*, or 2*s.*, or 4*s.*, and that the owner of the property was perfectly honest and was reduced to straits, what would be his condition in that case?—He could go and sell the article.

1428. But would it not be much better that he should be able to obtain a temporary advance upon it?—No; I think the disadvantages arising from the fact of there being too much inducement to pledge more than counterbalances that.

1429. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You spoke at the commencement of your evidence of some disreputable practice on the part of some pawnbrokers in Glasgow; I suppose that you referred to a very small number of pawnbrokers, and not to the general body?—A very small number. My remarks, in fact, were confined to three pawnbrokers out of 109.

1430. You stated, did you not, that the brokers in Glasgow kept books open to the inspection of the police?—I did.

1431. But have you a right at any time to go into a broker's shop and inspect his books, unless you have reason to believe that he is possessed of some stolen propety?—At any time during business hours, the police are entitled to go into a broker's shop and examine the books, and examine the articles which are sold.

1432. Would you wish that the police should have such privilege in reference to the books of a pawnbroker?—They have that already in Glasgow.

1433. You said that you would restrict, or give the magistrates power to restrict, the number of pawnbrokers; have you considered what effect it might have upon the people who are obliged to pawn, if there was no competition whatever?—I think that the number of pawn offices, when it is excessive, holds out unnecessary inducements to the improvident to go to a pawn office.

1434. Do you not think that there are many improvident people who could very easily pawn something worth 1*l.* as well as something worth less than half-a-crown?—As a rule, I should say that the improvident are more likely to pledge things under 10*s.*

1435. But are there not many improvident people who would pledge articles above 10*s.*?—No doubt, in a population of half a million, as we have in Glasgow, there must be a number of improvident people who would have a number of things to pledge above 1*l.* in value.

1436. Have the pawnbrokers of Glasgow periodical sales of the goods which are not redeemed?—They have frequent sales; I see them advertised very frequently.

1437. Chairman.] Do the pawnbrokers in Glasgow generally carry on the business of dealers in commodities and sell goods?—They have sale rooms generally attached to their pawn offices, where they sell articles which have been bought at their sales, and articles the time for which has expired under 5*s.*

1438. Do they deal generally in commodities such as second-hand goods?—I do not think that, as a rule, they do.

1439. To a large extent they are prohibited from doing so under your Act, are they not?—They are not entitled to be either brokers or publicans, but that is the only restriction upon them.

1440. Colonel Beresford.] Is it not the case that the larger the number of pawnbrokers the greater would be the competition?—The greater would be the competition.

1441. Consequently would not inducements be held out to people to pawn owing to that competition?—It would.

1442. Do you suppose that if they were much restricted in number the pawnbrokers could be prevented from increasing their rates, or that they would not do so contrary to law?—I think you would be more likely to have a respectable class of pawnbrokers the fewer the number was, because the business would be more remunerative.

1443. It is the competition which reduces the profits, is it not?—The competition might induce the pawnbroker to resort to illegal means in carrying on his trade if it was not a paying trade.

1444. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you know as a fact that most of the pawns under half-a-crown are spent in drink, or is that an impression which you have?—I do not know it from having picked out a number of pledges of that sort from a pawnbroker's books, and followed the individuals who made those pledges, and seen how they spent the money; but I have a pretty good notion of the kind of people who make those pledges, and I have a pretty good notion of the way in which they spend the money.

1445. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you give that evidence from your own observation and knowledge of the people of Glasgow?—From an observation extending over 20 years.

1446. And you have no hesitation in stating it as your belief?—I have no hesitation in stating it as my belief.

1447. It is a thing which is almost impossible to come at positively, is it not?—I do not see how it could be done very easily.

1448. Mr. Montague Guest.] Are there a great many shops in Glasgow which are called "wee pawns"?—We have about 450 in Glasgow under licenses; those are the brokers which I have spoken of.

1449. Colonel Beresford.] Have you any of the places called "leaving shops" in Glasgow?—The "wee pawns" in Glasgow are something similar to the leaving shops in London, but they are under a license. As regards the affidavit, I think it would be desirable that the magistrate or the justice of the peace should be relieved in some way from that disagreeable duty. It is not done as pointed out by the Act in the meantime; that is to say, the people do not, as a rule, appear before the magistrate, and make an affirmation. The pawn ticket is very frequently indorsed by the magistrate without the presence of the individual. In Glasgow we have at least 500 affidavits every week. Now, it would a very irksome and a very disagreeable duty for an unpaid magistrate to attend to all that business, and to do it as is contemplated by the Act.

1450. Chairman.] How do you account for so many tickets being lost in Glasgow?—I think it is an indication of the drunken habits of the people who have pawn tickets, that they destroy them or lose them while they are in a drunken state.

1451. Did you ever hear of any questions subsequently arising as to the honesty of those affidavits?

avits?—I have known such things, but I do not member the particulars; I have known people and make an affidavit and get the goods, who ere really not the persons who should not have t them.

1452. Have you known many such cases, or e they rare?—I have known some such cases, t not many.

1453. Have you anything further to add to our evidence?—I think that there should be me officer appointed by the magistrates to at- d to such matters as affidavits, and perhaps at a fee of one penny, or something of that t, should be paid.

1454. Would that make them look more care- lly into the application to see that it was honest d proper?—I think so.

1455. Can you inform the Committee whether Glasgow there is a separate class of people who ceive stolen goods, and keep their melting pots ady, and so forth?—There are in Glasgow a mber of re-setters, who do nothing else than set stolen property.

1456. Is it your opinion that the stolen goods go chiefly into the hands of those people or into the pawnbrokers' hands?—With regard to such articles as watches, and watches which are well marked, and which the police have an opportunity of getting, those go into the hands of the re-setters, to the greatest extent; but as regards wearing apparel which is not so easily distinguished, I think a good deal of that goes to the pawnbroker. Mr. A. M'Call. 23 June 1870.

1457. Do you think that the pawnbrokers are able, when property is brought to them to tell whether it is stolen?—I think they very frequently have a difficulty in distinguishing whether it is an article that has been described by the police or not; and even the police in trying to trace an article, may have a difficulty in picking it out.

1458. Mr. T. Hughes.] Then is it your opinion that the present system of pawnbroking fosters petty theft in our great towns?—I have no doubt of it; its tendencies are very considerably in that direction.

Mr. WILLIAM MILLER, called in; and Examined.

1459. Chairman.] ARE you a Magistrate of e city of Glasgow?—I am.

1460. Have you taken an active part in the ministration of justice by the magistrates of lasgow?—I have for the last two or three ars.

1461. Has that afforded you any opportunity seeing the mode in which the business of pawnoking in Glasgow is conducted?—Yes; it has orded some opportunity of gaining an insight o the mode of pawnbroking in Glasgow.

1462. Is your experience confined to what you ve observed in Glasgow?—Not altogether; I ve acted as justice of the peace for the counties Renfrew and Lanark, for a much longer riod; and I have attended similar courts there both counties, and that has also given me ne insight into the subject.

1463. What is your opinion of the mode in hich the business of pawnbroking is carried on Glasgow; do you think that it is generally rried on with care and prudence, or in disrerd of the Acts?—I should scarcely consider yself competent to give an opinion upon that bject, because that is not one which comes bere me.

1464. Then what is your opinion of the effect the system of pawnbroking on the condition of e people of Glasgow?—My opinion is, that to very large extent, it contributes to demoralise e lower portions of the community, by affordg facilities for getting drink.

1465. In what way do you measure the lower rtions of the community with regard to the lue of the goods pledged, or how would you stinguish the one from the other?—By those ho have come under my own observation.

1466. But when you speak of the lower porons of the community, how do you measure em in regard to the pawnbrokers; is it by the nount that they obtain upon their pledges?—If understand your question aright, I measure them those who have come under my own observaon.

1467. But what I want to know is, where you aw the line as to the lower portions of the comunity?—The lower portions of the community, I would consider to be those who are not only poor, but who have fallen into bad habits, and are in a state of misery and wretchedness. Mr. W. Miller.

1468. But do you think that the fact of their being able to pledge their things brings about their bad habits and their misery, or that it is merely a consequence of those bad habits?—I think it must have very largely contributed towards the present result that we see.

1469. Do you think that the same people would not sell their goods or get money upon them from other means, if there were no pawnbrokers?—I do not think they would.

1470. Do you think that would be the result, supposing that the system of pawnbroking was altogether abolished?—I think they would be led to rely more upon their own resources, and to be more provident in their habits.

1471. Do you think that the mere fact of their not being able to go to a pawnbroker's shop would improve their habits?—I think that the fact of their having been so long able, so readily to raise money in that way, has contributed greatly to make them improvident in their habits.

1472. But supposing that there were no pawnbrokers' shops they would be at liberty to get money in any other way they liked, would they not?—I think it is very probable that if there were no pawnbrokers' shops great difficulty would be found for sometime; that is to say, that if you were suddenly to close all the pawnbrokers' establishments, you would create great difficulty; but had those establishments never existed, I think the habits of the people would have been very different now from what they are.

1473. Do you go the length of saying that poor people should not be at liberty to borrow money on their property?—I would say that it would be very much better if they had some other means of raising money in case of necessity.

1474. But would you propose that there should be a penal law to prevent some classes of the community (if they were capable of definition) from borrowing money upon their property?—I would not go so far as that.

1475. Then would you leave it open to them to borrow money in any way they could?—I would not leave it altogether open. I would not leave it open to them to reduce their families to a condition of wretchedness, as they do at the present time, and also to subject themselves to disease in cold weather by parting with those things that are necessary for their comfort and sustenance.

1476. Would you have a law to prevent people selling their clothes or other commodities?—I think it would be a most desirable thing to have a law even to prevent people from making themselves and their children so poor and miserable as they are at present. By parting with their clothing and those things that are necessaries of life, they throw the burden upon others, the well-doing portion of the community in a great measure.

1477. Until they become a burden upon the parish, who could interfere with a family to know how they were getting on, and what they were doing?—They may become a burden upon the community without being thrown upon the parish. For instance, if they part with their clothing so as to render themselves almost naked, they make themselves much more liable to disease. We are obliged to support a fever hospital for the relief of the poor, and no doubt those people are rendered more liable to fever for instance, through parting with the necessaries of life; I only state that as one instance.

1478. But what I am anxious to know is, how you would carry out your views of interfering with the condition of a family when they make no claim upon the public for relief?—In the way that I have indicated, by preventing them from stripping themselves and their children of those things that are necessaries of life.

1480. Then what would you do practically, so as to carry out your views?—I would prevent such facilities as are at present allowed for disposing of that clothing that is necessary.

1481. Then do you mean that you would put everybody in the position of a soldier, and make it illegal for him to sell his clothes, or for anybody to buy his clothes from him?—We are dealing with pawnbrokers at present, I understand.

1482. I know we are; but I want to understand your view as to the means by which you are to prevent a man who wishes to raise money upon his clothing from doing so. Do you go to the extent of a general prohibitory or penal law against a man obtaining money upon his clothes; because, if you abolished pawnbrokers, the whole thing would be free, would it not, for a man to get money in any way he liked upon his clothes, or would you make it a universal law that a man should not be allowed to get money upon his clothes?—I should certainly seek by legal measures, to prevent the poor from making themselves so wretched as they are often at the present time.

1483. Have you observed any inconvenience from the mode in which people make affidavits for the purpose of getting back their goods without tickets?—No; I cannot say that I have.

1484. Has that enabled you to see what is the character of the goods pledged of which the tickets are lost?—It has, to that extent.

1485. What do you generally find to be the character of the pledge when the tickets are lost?—I find it to be always what would be called a small pledge.

1486. And generally for what sort of commodities?—Generally bed or body clothing.

1487. Do you infer from that, then, that there is a great amount of pledging of bed and body clothing in Glasgow?—I do.

1488. For what particular object do you think the people make those small pledges of their bed and body clothing?—To obtain money to purchase drink very frequently.

1489. How do you know that the money goes in drink, and not in food?—It comes out in evidence very frequently.

1490. Is there much practice in Glasgow, as far as you know, of pledging the goods on Monday, and taking them out of pledge on Saturday, when the people get their wages?—I understand that to be the case; but I do not speak as to that from my own personal knowledge.

1491. But it would seem, would it not, if so many people have to make affidavits, that there is a disposition on their part to get back the articles pledged?—I have no idea for what purpose they want their tickets.

1492. But their coming to make those affidavits would show that the people take some trouble to get their goods out of pledge when they pledge them?—No doubt.

1493. Is there any charge for the affidavit?—None.

1494. How do you account for those improvident people, who not only make pledges but lose their tickets, being provident enough to go and make an affidavit to get their clothes back again?—I suppose they do so, because they want to get them back again.

1495. Have you any means of judging how far the advances are made up to the full sum that could be fairly lent upon the pledges?—I have had a good many opportunities of judging of that, and I have from that formed a general opinion that the amount advanced upon the articles was not at all equal to their value.

1496. When you speak of their value do you mean with regard to the cost of the goods to buy them, or what a man would get if he sold them by auction, for instance?—No; I mean what the article would bring if it were sold in a fair way. If sold by auction of course it would be a totally different thing.

1497. Then if a pawnbroker is to sell goods in a fair way, you mean that he is to keep a shop to sell them?—I mean in reference to the parties themselves if they come to sell them themselves and negotiate a sale of them.

1498. To a clothes dealer?—To anyone. It appears to me that they ought to get more money for them.

1499. In that case the man, to the extent of his particular clothing, is undertaking the business of a shopkeeper and selling the goods, is he not?—Yes, so far.

1500. If a pawnbroker has to estimate his goods in that way he would have to deduct all the expenses of keeping a shop to sell the goods would he not?—Yes, he ought to be allowed for his expenses.

1501. Therefore your estimate would hardly be an accurate one, would it, as to what he ought ught to take as the value of the goods?—If he ere obliged to sell them in detail there would e expense connected with that.

1502. His price is the price for which they ould all sell wholesale at once if thrown into me market and disposed of, because that is his ight, is it not?—Probably so.

1503. What do you think of the rate of in- erest charged by pawnbrokers?—I observe from eir table that the rate of interest, generally peaking, is founded upon 20 per cent. Now, onsidering that the pawnbroker has what we hould call good security for the money ad- anced, I cannot see why he should be allowed o charge 20 per cent. interest for it.

1504. You have not taken into account any- hing but the mere transaction of lending the oney and getting repayment, have you?—I hink the pawnbroker should have a fair allow- nce for the expenses connected with taking in he pledges, registering them, storing them, and iving them out again.

1505. In small transactions, at how much do ou think that might be estimated, say, in a tran- action under 5 s.?—Of course I do not know hat are the expenses of a pawnbroking establish- ent; but I find by calculation in Glasgow that halfpenny on each pledge, taking the average umber of pledges, is equal to 100 l. a year to he establishment; so that if the expenses of the stablishment are 100 l. a year, a halfpenny would e sufficient remuneration. That, of course, is small estimate for expenses.

1506. Therefore it would be necessary to have omething more than a halfpenny to pay the ex- enses incident to the transaction, apart from the nterest of the money, would it not?—If small pledges are to pay as much on that head as large nes, then they would require to pay more than halfpenny.

1507. Therefore in that case the 20 per cent. ould not be enough, would it?—I speak irre- pectively of the interest altogether; I look upon he interest as a separate thing.

1508. But when people speak of interest on oney, they mean return for capital without any abour, trouble, or expense connected with it, o they not?—Usually.

1509. Then everything else except that be- omes a charge in addition that has to be met, oes it not?

1510. Have you estimated at all what that ould come to upon this transaction of 5 s.?— should scarcely feel myself qualified to form an stimate of that.

1511. Supposing that I knew, as a fact, that he receipt of every small sum by the Post Office n the savings banks costs 6 d., would you think hat the Post Office was charging an extortionate ate for being bankers for 5 s., on deposit for a eek, if it charged 6 d.?—I would think that no ne would go into the transaction at all on such erms.

1512. Still would you think it wrong if the ost to the Post Office was 6 d., that they should harge that cost, and would you leave it to the erson who dealt with them to deal with them, r not, as he pleased upon those terms?—I sup- ose so.

1513. Would you apply the same rules to pawnbroking, and if you found that the cost of ach transaction was 3 d., would you, or would ou not, leave it to the public to pay it, if they pleased, and would you allow the pawnbroker to charge that?—I think a pawnbroker is en- titled to charge a fair remuneration for his ge- neral expenses.

Mr. W. Miller. 23 June 1870.

1514. And for his own labour?—That is in- cluded in general expenses.

1515. And for all the risk that he undertakes? —The risk that he undertakes ought to be covered, I should say, by the rate of interest.

1516. But ought he not to be allowed to charge for the risk incident to special legislation, and special responsibility, or the contingency incident to his business; such as the probability of having stolen goods imposed upon him, and otherwise? —I should say that that ought rather to be covered by the charge of interest.

1517. But I thought you defined interest to be the return for the use of capital, without any- thing else but the mere profit upon the capital? —I think interest is usually according to the risk that is run.

1518. Then you would allow a rate of interest sufficient to cover all the risks incident to the transaction?—Yes.

1519. However, you have not had any means of ascertaining what the proper rate would be, under any conditions?—Not further than I have already stated.

1520. Have you any alterations to suggest in the present law which would be, in your opinion, beneficial to the community?—Yes, I think it has been stated by the former witness, that pawn- brokers ought to be under the control of the magistrates of the city, and that the magistrates ought to have the power of granting those cer- tificates previous to their being licensed; in fact, that they ought to be put upon the same footing as publicans in that respect.

1521. Have you any other suggestions to make? —I would suggest also that better provision should be made for the reversion of those pledges coming to the owners, the pawners of the goods, and that that reversion, if there were any, if the pawners of the goods could not be found, should be paid over to some of the charities of the city.

1522. Would you propose that where a pawn- broker sustains a loss from goods not being re- deemed, and is obliged to sell them, the charities of the city should indemnify him?—No.

1523. Who would indemnify him then?—It is one of the risks that he runs, and is paid for.

1524. Then would you make him bear the losses, and give the profits to the charity?—No.

1525. Is it not an exact case of profit and loss, that he loses upon some pledges which are not redeemed, and gains upon others which are not redeemed?—He is paid for his risk in the interest that he charges. He has nothing further to do with the pledges than to get the amount which he has advanced repaid to him.

1526. But here are a number of pledges; some sell for less than the amount due, and some sell for more than the amount due; in the ordinary course of business that would represent what is called profit and loss, and people set their profit and loss off against one another, do they not, in business?—Yes.

1527. Is your proposal, that the loss should be borne by the pawnbroker, and the profit by the charitable institution?—No, I should say that there should be a balance of accounts.

1528. Should you say that if the sale on the whole realised a profit it should be paid over?— Yes.

1529. Then if, on the whole, there should be a loss, the person who receives the profit according to the ordinary law of the land, bears the loss, does he not?—Usually in matters of business, that is so; but this is a little different from a mere matter of business.

1530. Evidently; but the question which I am asking you is, whether the demand which you would make is a sound one, that somebody should receive the profit and not bear the loss?—I think the pawnbroker has taken his risk into consideration, and charged his rate of interest accordingly.

1531. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] When he gets more money on an article that is pledged to him, it does not belong to him, but it belongs to the party who has pledged the property, does it not?—Quite so.

1532. And you say, if he cannot find out who that party is, he ought to give it to charity, and not to put it in his own pocket?—Quite so.

1533. Chairman.] Is it not part of his system, that he deals with people without knowing that they are the right people, and that they come to him, and that he does not go to them?—Yes.

1534. Does he not take all the risks incident to conducting that sort of business one way and the other?—Yes; I have another suggestion to make, which has been made already; that there should be restrictions laid upon the pledging of articles that are necessaries of life; that I went into before.

1535. Mr. Hambro.] You advocate a reduction of interest, I think, do you not?—I do.

1536. But would you not suppose, that if the poor want to borrow money, they are more likely to borrow money if they can, at a cheaper rate of interest, than if they have to pay a dear rate; does not the high rate of interest which they have to pay for their money sometimes restrain them from borrowing?—I am afraid that it very seldom has that effect.

1537. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] You have taken a great interest all your lifetime in the social condition of the lower classes, have you not?—I have to a certain extent.

1538. And apart from the official positions which you have held in the city of Glasgow and in the neighbouring counties of Renfrew and Lanark, you have had ample opportunities of observing the habits of the lower classes of the population?—Yes, I have visited a good deal amongst the poorer classes for many years.

1539. For the purpose of raising them from their degraded position?—Yes.

1540. During those benevolent visitations of yours, have you observed the evil influences of the pawnbroking system?—Very frequently.

1541. In visiting their houses you have found, I suppose, very frequently, no furniture?—Very frequently; scarcely anything.

1542. Nothing to lie upon possibly but a heap of straw?—Very frequently.

1543. No bed clothing?—No.

1544. And hardly a rag to cover the nakedness of the heads of the family and the children?—I am sorry to say that I have very often seen that state of things.

1545. Have you traced out that those parties had furniture, and had clothing for their bodies, and bed clothing, and that it was in the possession of the pawnbrokers?—I have never traced it exactly to a pawnbroker's establishment.

1546. But have you been informed by the parties themselves that that was so?—Yes.

1547. Mr. T. Hughes.] I understood you to say, that the pawnbroking system gives great facilities for making away with stolen goods in Glasgow; is that the result of your personal experience as a magistrate?—Yes.

1548. We have it in evidence, that in England there are other shops which are used for receiving stolen goods, and that very rarely such articles as have been stolen came into pawnbrokers' hands; can you recollect in your experience as a magistrate, whether, for instance in a year, you would have had a dozen cases of pawnbrokers' shops being used as a method of getting rid of stolen goods?—I know that very frequently in the police courts pawnbrokers appear in cases in which the magistrates are obliged to say whose the article (a watch probably) is, and it has appeared in evidence, and it usually appears in evidence, that this watch has been stolen from the person of the party who lost it. That is quite a frequent occurrence.

1549. Do you think that petty theft is fostered by the pawnbroking system, so far as Glasgow is concerned?—I have not the slightest doubt of it.

1550. I understand you to hold that the pawnbroking system could not be done away with, but that you must have something of the kind?—I suppose as society exists at present, the system has become a kind of necessity, but it is a necessity of the peoples' own creation, I think; improvident habits have created this kind of necessity.

1551. Is it more extraordinary than the banking system for the richer classes of society, and must not the poor have some place where they can go and get advances upon easy terms?—It used not to be so in former days, and it is not so in many parts of the country still; I do not think that the really deserving poor are ever left to starve, or very seldom.

1552. But as matters stand at present in England, you do not see your way to the abolition of the system, but you think that those modifications would be improvements; is that your view?—I certainly do not see my way to the abolition of the system now.

1553. Have you ever considered the idea of making pawn shops public institutions, such as they have in some continental countries, where they are in some places connected with the government, and in others as private charities?—I have thought a little on that subject, and it has occurred to me that the Government of this country might very well take up the whole question.

1554. But you have not studied the foreign system, or thought the matter out, have you?—I have not; I do not know the foreign system.

1555. Mr. Ridley.] Nor the Irish system?—I know a little of it, but not very much.

1556. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you happen to know the quantity of blankets that are in pawn shops in Glasgow?—Of course I do not know positively, but from certain data I have been led to believe that the number is very large; although I have no means of knowing the quantity.

1557. Are you aware of blankets which have been given by benevolent persons to poor individuals having been pawned frequently?—No I would not say that that has come under my own observation.

1558. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you think it would be a crime for a poor person who has received ceived a blanket, or anything else in that way, o pawn it for a few days rather than either to low the family to suffer hunger, or than to pply to the relieving officer?—I would not call a crime.

1559. You said that no one would be allowed starve, and a person might be too proud and o independent to beg, and might take this ode of borrowing a small sum to help him rough a difficulty; would there be anything rong in that?—I think it would be much better they would take another mode of relieving emselves.

1560. What would that be?—Borrowing from me one of their neighbours. I know that the oor are generally kind to the poor.

1561. Chairman.] Do you think that a man is kely to get the best terms from a pawnbroker from a friend?—I think it is very probable at he might get the advance from a friend ithout having to pay for it at all.

1562. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] I suppose you have und in your experience that the frugal, well-to- tradesmen never deal at the pawn shops?—I o not think that they do.

1563. But that it is only the vicious, and the nprovident, and the dissipated?—Yes, it cer- inly is so. If an individual once gets into the abit of resorting to the pawn shop, it is neces- rily almost impossible for him to get delivered om that habit, because the interest that he pays onstantly weighs him down.

1564. Have you considered the amount of money that is yearly spent in the city of Glasgow by the lowest portion of the working classes in pawning?—I have tried to come at some sort of estimate of that, and the result has been that it appears to me that from 150,000 l. to 200,000 l. a year is spent in interest. Mr. W. Miller. 23 June 1870.

1565. Is not that more than is spent in all the religious observances and education of the city?—I should think a good deal more.

1566. And that is spent by the lowest portion of the community, is it not, people who never think of going to church, and who have no education?—Many of those people are, I believe, very regular in their attendance at church.

1567. Colonel Beresford.] In order to restrict the pledging of goods by the working classes, would you have a minimum that would shut out a good deal of pledging, such as that the pawnbrokers should not advance upon a less sum at a time than 5 s., or 4 s., or something of that sort?—Yes; the sum that I had thought of in my own mind, was 2 s. 6 d.; that no advance should be made under 2 s. 6 d.

1568. I suppose that, as is the case in London, many of those people keep constantly pledging a thing, taking it in on one day of the week, and taking it out six or seven days afterwards?—I believe that is the case. I would put on that restriction, as I said before, for the purpose of preventing them from pledging what were the mere necessaries of life.

Mr. FREDERICK WILLIAMSON, called in; and Examined.

1569. Chairman.] ARE you Superintendent f the Detective Police of the Metropolis?- - es.

1570. How long have you held that position? —I have been superintendent for some 12 months, ut I have been in the police over 20 years.

1571. Have you had much opportunity of see- ng how the business of pawnbrokers is carried n in London?—I have.

1572. Have you observed at all to what extent hey carry out the Act which requires them to ake some trouble in receiving pledges if they hink them suspicious?—I think, certainly, the espectable class carry out as far as they can the rovisions of the Act of Parliament, with this xception, that I do not think that they are uite so clear as they should be in giving their ickets. They do not write them clearly and egibly, and they do not carry out the Act of arliament in regard to householders and odgers.

1573. Do you think it is difficult or easy for a awnbroker to know whether a person who comes nto his shop is a householder or lodger?—That a very difficult thing, I think, for him to dis- inguish, but he should ask the question, I think.

1574. Do you see any mode by which a pawn- roker may inform himself more than he does of he name, address, and position of the person who comes to him to pawn?—I do not.

1575. Do you consider that the pawnbrokers o or do not afford facilities for the detection of tolen goods by the way in which they conduct heir business?—A large quantity of stolen goods nds its way into the hands of the pawnbrokers.

1576. To what do you ascribe that?—They ffer facilities in the mode of their business.

1577. In what way particularly?—The business itself of pawnbroking offers facilities for disposing of stolen goods. Mr. Williamson.

1578. Do you mean that the mere fact of their keeping an open shop to lend money upon goods brought to them under the Act affords a certain amount of facility to people who have stolen goods to make away with them?—Just so.

1579. But do you think a pawnbroker himself, by the way in which he conducts his business, affords facilities beyond what the circumstances naturally give?—I think not.

1580. Is it your opinion that, on the whole, they do or do not fairly carry out the provisions of the Act, which requires them to be careful in receiving pledges?—I think the majority of them among the respectable class do so.

1581. Do you think that there are many of the licensed pawnbrokers upon whom the police look with suspicion as affording any peculiar facilities for receiving stolen goods?—I am not aware of any.

1582. Do the police find, in attempting to trace stolen goods when they have notice of them, that there is much obstruction thrown in their way by the pawnbrokers?—They would offer no very great obstruction, but they give us very few facilities as a rule.

1583. In what respect do you find them wanting in giving facilities?—The probability is, that if I went with a ticket to a pawnbroker, and asked him if he had the thing in pledge, he would say, "Yes, but I will not show it to you except on condition that you pay me the interest." We have no power to force him to show it; we can only summon a pawnbroker before a magistrate, except some one is in custody.

1584. Then to see them without paying the fine, you must have a search warrant, must you not?—Yes, but I never knew of a search warrant being granted under such circumstances.

1585. But the pawnbroker in relation to the police is in quite the same position as everybody else, is he not, inasmuch as he must produce the goods to the police officer who has a search warrant?—Quite so.

1586. Do not the police sometimes exercise a discretion of their own, in looking at peoples' things, and run the risk, although they are not entitled to look at things without a search warrant?—Quite so.

1587. But you do not exercise that discretion in relation to pawnbrokers generally?—No.

1588. Do you think that any alteration might be made in the law for the purpose of facilitating the action of the police in tracing goods unlawfully pawned?—Yes, I think that the Glasgow Police Act, in a modified form, would do very well in London.

1589. Do you think that that would get over the difficulties?—To a great extent I have no doubt that it would.

1590. Have you known many cases in which the pawnbrokers have been fined for contravening the Acts which regulate their business?—I cannot say. That is a thing which would not come much under my observation.

1591. Have you had many means of observing whether the people among the poorer classes complain much of the treatment which they receive from pawnbrokers, in pledging their goods?—I think not; I think as a rule, from my experience, that the poorer classes are pretty well satisfied with their dealings with pawnbrokers.

1592. What is your opinion of the capacity of the poorer classes to transact business with the pawnbroker as to knowing the value of what they take?—I think the poorer classes who deal with pawnbrokers are generally pretty sharp and alive to their own interests.

1593. Do you think that they are quite capable of being trusted to enter into a transaction with a pawnbroker?—I think so.

1594. Mr. Hambro.] You recommended the extension of the Glasgow Act in a modified form to London; do you wish to confine the extension of that Act to London only, or would you apply it to the whole of England?—I mean to the whole of the United Kingdom.

1595. You think that there are clauses in the Glasgow Police Act which might be incorporated in a new Bill, supposing that one were brought in?—Yes, I think so 1596. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] I suppose you do not know much upon the general question?—No, only from what I have observed in visiting pawnbrokers' shops, and seeing how they carry on their business.

1597. But you cannot know much under the system which you have in London, seeing that you have no power of searching the premises?—Quite so; the knowledge which I have, has come to me not officially as regards pawnbrokers.

1598. A pawnbroker's establishment may be quite full of stolen goods, so far as you know, may it not?—Just so.

1599. And therefore the extent of stolen property which may be in the hands of pawnbrokers in London, or in any part of England, may be infinitely greater than we have any conception of, may it not?—Quite so, it may be more than we can conceive.

1600. And you would like to see an alteration in the law to prevent the possibility of that, I presume?—Yes, to make the pawnbroker render more assistance in bringing to justice people who have committed felonies.

1601. In Glasgow the pawnbroking system is under the inspection of the police, who can go in at any time to search the premises if they suspect that there is any stolen property there, should you like to have that power in England?—In a modified form. I do not think that any constable should have power to enter, but that that power should be retained in the hands of some responsible officer.

1602. Of course you would like to put it into the hands of the heads of the police only?—I should like to put it into the hands of the heads of the police only.

1603. But, with that exception, you would like to have the power, as I understand?—I think so.

1604. You seem to think that parties dealing with pawnbrokers are a very intelligent race of beings; is that your view?—I think they are very sharp, and alive to their own interests.

1605. Are they sharp because of their education?—I think that the lower class of people in London are generally very sharp where their own interests are concerned.

1606. Does that arise from their familiarity with crime?—I do not know that it does. When people get together in large masses, the necessity of living makes them sharp; they are obliged to be sharp to get their meat and drink.

1607. Should you consider their intelligence to be a vicious intelligence?—To a certain extent, perhaps, it might be a vicious intelligence.

1608. They are probably accustomed to deal with vice, and they are able to battle with pawnbrokers as to the value of the article which they are disposing of; is that the case?—Yes; I have no doubt that they know pretty well whether they are being charged the legal interest, and are getting the fair value of the article.

1609. Are they so intelligent that they might have freedom of contract?—I do not go so far as that; I think that there should be some legislative power to regulate the contract, because, possibly the one man would trade on the other man's necessities. I do not mean to say that it would be done, but probably some would take advantage of it.

1610. You think that they are not in so independent a position as to be able to deal with pawnbrokers, without their being some restriction by law?—I think there ought to be a restriction of law.

1611. Do you think that there should be some legal restriction as to the interest to be paid upon the advance upon the article, and as to its being retained for a certain time in the interest of the person who pawns it?—Yes; I think that there should be a distinction made as regards retaining articles. Wearing apparel and many other things which deteriorate in value, perhaps. I do not think it ought to be kept so long as jewellery, and such things as do not deteriorate.

1612. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Did you hear my question to Mr. M'Call, about the number of doors to a pawnshop?—I did.

1613. Do you agree with him?—Most of the pawnbrokers awnbrokers in London have two doors; they ave generally, a side door, where people go in o deposit their pledges, and a front door to their hops, because most of them deal in other articles, esides absolutely carrying on a pawnbroker's usiness.

1614. Do you think that there is an adequate ecessity for more than one entrance?—I do not now that there is an adequate necessity, but robably the pawnbroking business would interere with their other business, supposing that ae shops had only one door. Many pawnrokers' in London carry on a large jeweller's usiness.

1615. Mr. T. Hughes.] With regard to roberies of jewellery, for how long do the police vatch sales; I suppose you watch the pawnrokers' sales, do you not?—No, we do not watch hem.

1616. If you do not watch the pawnbrokers' ales, it would seem to be inferable, that so far s your experience goes, very little stolen proerty goes through their hands?—I think a very arge amount of stolen property goes through heir hands.

1617. Then why do you not watch the sales?—The sales are very difficult things to watch..

1618. Are they not advertised?—They are dvertised, but it would entail a very great mount of labour, and it would be a very difficult hing to undertake.

1619. You send a list of all jewel robberies, I uppose, to the pawnbrokers?—We send a list very morning to all the pawnbrokers in the netropolis, of all roberies of jewels during the receding 24 hours.

1620. Do the pawnbrokers often communicate vith you upon the subject?—Not very often; and think that those notices are very often treated is a dead letter; they merely take them, and hey never look at them.

1621. Colonel Beresford.] In the event of this Bill which is now before the House, being passed nto law, if it should result in an increase of pawnbrokers' shops, do you think that would he i desirable thing to accomplish; do you think hat we want more pawnbrokers' shops in Lonlon than there are at the present time?—No, probably we have enough for our wants at the present moment; but I question whether if you estricted it, you would not probably be doing nore harm than good.

1622. In what way?—You would, in the first place, create a monopoly, and in the small neighbourhoods a class of men who keep "leaving shops," or "dolly shops," would spring up, and the poorer classes would go to them instead of going to men who have some standing, and who are so far respectable.

1623. Those leaving shops carry on their business illegally, do they not?—Yes, they carry on their businesses illegally.

1624. Why do you not stop them?—That is a question for the Inland Revenue, and not for us.

1625. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Are there many of those unlicensed pawnbrokers' shops in London?—There are a great many in the poorer neighbourhoods, no doubt.

1626. Are they apt to receive stolen goods?—I cannot say that; I have no doubt that they deal principally in the smaller class of pledges, because at those leaving shops men can deposit pledges on Sundays and at various other times, when the licensed pawnbrokers cannot take them in.

1627. You mentioned that there were two doors generally to the pawnbroking establishments; is one door more public than the other?—One is more public than the other.

1628. Is the one by which the pawners enter the more private one?—The one by which they enter is the more private one. A pawnbroker's shop is generally divided into boxes.

1629. That is to prevent people from seeing the pawners going in, I suppose?—Quite so, for the sake of privacy.

1630. Colonel Beresford.] Are you aware that, in order to avoid the law at those leaving shops, they sell the articles, but on the understanding that, if the pawners pay so much by a certain day they have them back again?—I believe that they evade the law in that way.

1631. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Those unlicensed pawn shops are against the law, are they not?—Yes.

1632. Why do you not put them down?—A pawnbroker is licensed by the Inland Revenue, and it is a quastion for the Inland Revenue, and not for the police.

1633. Do you think that those unlicensed pawnbrokers do not properly come under your department, but under the Inland Revenue?—Quite so.

1634. Ought it not to be your duty to see that the law is carried out in every way?—Probably; if we had sufficient evidence in a case, notice would be sent to the Board of Inland Revenue, but they would be the persons to prosecute.

1635. So that you wink at the breaking of the law?—We do not quite wink at it.

1636. Have you a class of dealers in London, such as we have in Glasgow, called licensed brokers; people who purchase property, and are obliged to keep books registering what they have paid for it, and at what hour of the day it was taken in; and who are obliged to keep the property for seven days, and if it is not taken out at the end of seven days they have a right to sell it?—I think we have no exact class of that kind in London; marine store dealers are not quite in the same category.

1637. Pawnbrokers, to a certain extent, in London do that trade, because they are allowed to purchase articles above 10 l., and they are not obliged to record their dealings with parties in sums above that figure, are they?—I believe that is so, as far as purchase goes.

1638. Do you not think that it would be a protection to society if pawnbrokers were looked upon in all their business as pawnbrokers, and were obliged to record every transaction they had at whatever sum?—I believe that they do record it, but it is only for their own information.

1639. Is it not the case, that they may or may not record it?—They may or may not record it.

1640. If, for instance, diamonds had come to them, it might be to their interest, knowing that they were stolen, not to record the fact, might it not?—Yes; but if a man took them in, he might render himself liable to be prosecuted for receiving stolen property.

1641. But as a general rule, would it not be a protection to society if they were obliged to record all their transactions, and at the same time no hardship to the honest dealer?—Quite so.

1642. Mr. Hambro.] Would you recommend any

any alteration as regards the hours of closing in the evening and opening in the morning?—No, I think the present Act does not require any alteration in that respect.

1643. Under the present Act the same hours are observed by all the trade, are they not?—I think the hours are from September to March from eight o'clock to eight o'clock, and from March to September, from seven o'clock to nine o'clock, and on Saturday nights, I think they go as far as 11 o'clock.

1644. Would you be in favour of the hours being from eight o'clock till seven o'clock all the year round, except on Saturdays?—I do not know that there would be any special advantage in that. Many pawnbrokers close earlier. I do not think that any mischief is done by the later hours.

1645. Colonel Beresford.] Do they not give facilities for getting rid of stolen goods after dark?—Yes, but I do not think that as regards the class of thieves who dispose of property to pawnbrokers, it matters much whether they go in the day time or in the evening.

1646. Mr. Ridley.] You do not consider it desirable to confine the pawnbroking business to the hours of daylight?—No; I think that now, with the exception of two or three months of the year it is so confined.

1647. Chairman.] Practically, do you think that the restriction of the hours neither facilitates nor prevents the disposal of stolen goods?—That is my opinion.

1648. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do the provident and respectable part of the poor make much use of the pawnbroker from time to time?—I think they do. I do not intend to draw any distinction. A provident man, when he is out of work, probably as often goes to the pawnbrokers as another.

1649. Do you think that he is as often in a condition in which it may be to his advantage to apply to the pawnbroker?—Unquestionably.

1650. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Do you know that for a fact?—From my observation that is the conclusion to which I have come.

Mr. Benjamin Blackwood, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Blackwood.

1651. Chairman.] Do you carry on business at Bradford as a Pawnbroker?—I do.

1652. How long have you done so?—Twelve years.

1653. Is your business extensive?—It is.

1654. Are there many pawnbrokers in Bradford?—There are 23 pawnbrokers in Bradford.

1655. Do you carry on a business as large as that of any other pawnbroker in the town?—I believe I am doing the largest trade in point of numbers of any one in the town.

1656. What capital do you employ in your business?—In the pawnbroking alone 2,997 l. is what I had the last time I took stock.

1657. You hold also some official position in the association of pawnbrokers, do you not?—I am secretary for the present year for the Pawnbrokers' Association.

1658. Is that association both provincial and metropolitan?—It is only for our own town.

1659. Do you also carry on a sale business?—I do.

1660. Is that a business of a very considerable extent?—It is not very large.

1661. Is pawnbroking a very profitable business in Bradford?—Not very profitable.

1662. How much do you think you made in the last year upon your capital, after paying all your expenses?—On both the sale and the pawnbroking I made 258 l., that is after calculating five per cent. for the interest upon capital. I may say that I have not charged anything for my own services, but have only dealt with cash payments.

1663. The expenses include only your outgoings, and not any allowrnce for yourself; is that so?—Just so.

1664. Are there any other members of your family engaged in the business?—My son is engaged in the business.

1665. Is he charged for in the expenses?—He is charged for.

1666. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is he your assistant?—He is.

1667. Chairman.] Of that profit how much has been derived from the pawnbroking exclusively?—The interest received was 647 l. 14 s. 3 d., from ticket fees 138 l. 15 s. 6 d., and for profit on retail sales 143 l. 3 s. 6 d.

1668. Is that for the sale of goods independently of the pawnbroking business?—It is.

1669. Then would you deduct that from the net profit of the 258 l., to show the profit of the pawnbroking business?—I should.

1670. That would give you a profit of 116 l. on your capital of nearly 3,000 l., would it not?—Yes, besides my five per cent.

1671. What is the number of the pledges taken in a year to earn this profit?—Last year I took in 58,601 pledges.

1672. And what was the amount advanced?—£. 16,821. 6 s. 3 d.

1673. What would that make as the average sum lent on each pledge?—Five shillings and a fraction; something under a farthing.

1674. What would that make as the average cost of your pledges, not allowing anything for your own labour?—Three halfpence and three tenths.

1675. Do you think that that fairly represents the sort of profit that is made in Bradford by this business?—I believe it does.

1676. How is it that people are induced to enter into this business, if the profits are so small?—They do not find that out until they have gone into it.

1677. And pawnbrokers, like other people, find a difficulty in shifting their position when they have reached a certain time of life, I presume?—They do when it is once established.

1678. It is probably easier to get into than out of a bad business?—It is.

1680. Are your assistants of a better class than those that are employed in ordinary retail businesses as shopmen?—Yes.

1681. Do they get better pay?—Of course they advance, as they get further on in the business, and have been longer in it, and get more experience xperience; and then their services are worth nore, and of course you must give them more, or hey will look after another situation where they vill meet with more money for their services.

1682. In this statement, you do not bring to ccount any gain on the sale of unredeemed ledges, do you?—I do not keep that separate. With regard to any unredeemed pledges which I ave, I perhaps adopt rather a different form rom most pawnbrokers. I debit my sale stock vith the full amount lent on them. My assist-nts enter on the left hand side of the column he cost price, and the selling price on the other ide, and that is carried on into the general yearly ccount.

1683. So that you set off the profits against he losses upon the sale of unredeemed pledges?—Yes, with regard to my sale stock, I should hink that three-fourths of it is new stock which buy.

1684. Do you make much profit upon the sale f unredeemed pledges?—No.

1685. Are the pledges largely redeemed, or re they more generally unredeemed?—I have ot more than two or three per cent. which re-nain unredeemed.

1686. Then you look rather to the redemption f the pledge than to the sale of it?—Entirely.

1687. Do you think that it is generally the iew of the pawnbroker that it is better for him o have a pledge redeemed than to have it for-eited?—Most undoubtedly it is; he is always ure of his interest then, and if they are left with im, he is not sure of his own even.

1688. Do you put in force, to a large extent, ale by auction in Bradford?—We do every uarter. We do it in rather a different way; ve all join together in a sale, and of course some nay have considerably more than others.

1689. Then all the pawnbrokers in Bradford nake up a general sale of the unredeemed pledges, s that so?—Yes, we do.

1690. Does that embrace all the unredeemed ledges, or only those that come within the Par-iamentary limit?—Generally speaking, only hose within the Parliamentary limit; but we generally say, perhaps a month before the sale, ow many lots each will have; and if one should ay rather more than he has, of course he has to make it up with his sale stock, so that his number nay not fall short.

1691. How often do those sales take place in Bradford?—Every three months.

1692. Is there much inquiry by persons pawn-ng, for the balance of their pledges?—No, I ave never had a case yet; in addition to those dvertisements which are published for about hree weeks on market days in our own town, nd in the "Leeds Mercury" as well, we put p large handbills, a copy of the advertisement, nd every morning about an hour before the sale, ve send round the bellman as well, to make it as ublic as possible.

1693. Is it your opinion that the present law s satisfactory, or do you think that changes hould be made in it?—I think we ought to be llowed more profit.

1694. Do you mean throughout generally, or n any particular cases?—I think we ought to ave the Irish rate adopted; charging 1*d.* for all ickets under 10*s.*

1695. Then would you go on increasing from he 1*d.* upwards for the ticket, as at present?—Yes.

1696. Do you find any difficulties with reference to the fixed nature of the charge for all classes of goods?—Yes, we often labour under a difficulty; people will come in to pledge an article, and will ask how much they will have to pay a month for it, and if it is not one of the exact sums, we cannot give them a definite answer.

1697. You find a great difficulty in applying the fractional charges?—We find difficulty in telling them what they will have to pay.

1698. Do you think that the Irish rate would simplify that?—It would. I would then endorse on the ticket at the time of pledging what they would have to pay.

1699. Would you have the duplicate always state the rate of charge and the amount that would be payable?—Yes, I would; that (producing a ticket) is the kind of ticket that I use.

1700. Is it the opinion generally of the trade in Bradford that some change should be made?—It is.

1701. What is your view and their view with reference to advancing upon goods of a particular character that are expensive to hold?—It will not pay us now at all, and we decline those kind of goods altogether.

1702. How would you propose to deal with that difficulty?—So that we could make a private arrangement or a special agreement with the party pledging.

1703. Do you wish to have the power of making a special agreement with persons pledging particular goods?—Yes.

1704. Do you mean within any particular limits, or generally?—I believe the opinion in our trade is generally that above 40*s.* there should be the power to make a special agreement, and instead of the restriction being 10*l.*, as at present, it should be only 40*s.*

1705. Would you have a statutory rate above 40*s.*, if parties did not make a special contract?—Undoubtedly, if there was no special contract, we should have a statutory rate.

1706. To take effect if no special contract was made?—Yes.

1707. What precaution would you take to insure the person pledging having full knowledge of and understanding the special contract when one was made?—I should explain to him fully that he would have to redeem it, or to come and renew it, within a certain time, at so much in the pound or so much per cent., as the agreement might be.

1708. Would it be necessary that the pawnbroker should be compelled to give that to the parties in printing or in writing?—Yes, or in printing and writing together, the same as we do now on our tickets.

1709. And that if he did not do that, he could not set it up?—Of course.

1710. You propose to keep a counterfoil of the special contract, in the same way as you now keep the original ticket of the duplicate, do you not?—In the same way as we enter it in our books.

1711. And in the same way as you keep the duplicate?—Yes.

1712. Is the Act found to be so difficult of application and comprehension in Bradford in some of the details that the pawnbrokers do not carry it out?—I believe they do not as respects farthings. No farthings are reckoned at all. They are not a coin that is recognised by any class of shopkeepers in the town.

Mr. Blackwood.

1713. Do you find also in keeping the books that you have any difficulty in complying with the strict provisions of the Act?—With that exception, I do not.

1714. Have you any opinion as to the practice, for instance, of the people of Bradford, respecting the time for which you are compelled to hold pledges?—I believe the opinion of the pawnbrokers in Bradford, is in the proportion of about four out of five that we should have a twelve-months' absolute forfeiture, with no power to extend the three months; that is to say, one in five is for six months, and four is for the twelve-months' absolute forfeiture without the three months.

1715. What is their opinion with regard to the days of grace on the monthly rate?—That they should give seven or 10 days, whichever might be thought desirable, and have a month's interest after the expiration of that time; doing away entirely with the half-months, because if we came to have a halfpenny rise in the 2 s., the farthing would be complicated in the same way, and they could not be paid still.

1716. Are there any other alterations in the Act that you wish to suggest?—I believe not.

1717. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] You seem in the catalogue which you have produced, to have a great many silver and gold watches, marriage rings and family bibles; have you any idea whether those properly belonged to the parties who pawned them, or whether they have been pledged by parties who have stolen them?—We generally find that they belong to parties who pledge them.

1718. Is it not possible that they may be perhaps stolen in London or some other place, and sent down to Bradford to get money upon them?—Of course, it is possible that that might occur.

1719. There is no power given to the police in England to inspect your premises, is there?—There is not.

1720. And therefore even a respectable pawnbroker may hold in his possession a great deal of property that has been stolen, may he not?—He might hold some, but I do not think he would hold a great deal from the amount that is redeemed.

1721. But you have a sale every three months, have you not?—Yes.

1722. And that is a very important sale, is it not, as far as the value of the articles is concerned?—I dare say some of the pawnbrokers do take in a good number of watches, and of course they lend largely upon them.

1723. But does it not strike you that the kind of property that is sold at those sales is just the very kind of property that is most likely to be stolen?—If it is, it must come from a long way, for we have our police lists regularly.

1724. The articles redeemed, which are the great bulk of the articles pledged, are generally articles of wearing apparel, bed clothing, and for domestic purposes, are they not?—Yes of all kinds.

1725. And the articles that are not redeemed are the valuable articles, are they not?—Oh, no.

1726. According to the catalogue you have put before this Committee, that would appear to be so?—Yes, but they would not bear anything like a proportion to the amount pledged.

1727. But of the articles not redeemed the great proportion are valuable articles, are they not?—Yes, a good many of them are, I dare say.

1728. Therefore, do you not think that it is fair to infer that the articles which were for common wear, being the articles that are redeemed, and the articles of value being the articles that are not redeemed, it is possible and likely that they have been stolen?—No, because I do not think these kind of goods are generally pledged by strangers.

1729. But is it not possible to have a connexion between thieves in London and parties resident in Bradford?—Yes, it is.

1730. You do not always know the parties whom you are dealing with, do you?—We do not always, but generally speaking, I believe that if they are strangers they are questioned very closely as to the property, and how they obtained it.

1731. Do you ever refuse to take property because it is pledged by a stranger?—If a man did not give me a good account of the article, and how he came by it; I should refuse it if he was a stranger.

1732. You would refuse it if there was any suspicion?—Yes, I should. I should look, in the first place, at my police notices, to see if I had a notice of anything of the kind being stolen.

1733. But otherwise you would not refuse it?—If he gave a good account, I should not refuse.

1734. But you do not receive a notice of all articles stolen in London, do you?—No.

1735. And therefore if an article was sent down from London to Bradford, you would have no reason to refuse it?—Certainly not.

1736. Therefore would you object to the police in England having the same power with regard to pawnbrokers as they have in Glasgow?—I should decidedly object to the whole body of the police having that power.

1737. But you would have no objection to a superintendent, who holds a higher position than an ordinary policeman, having that power, and you think the trade would be quite agreeable that the police in England should have the same power as they have in Glasgow?—I do not think there is a pawnbroker in our town who would object; because, I think, when a policeman comes round he gets all the information that we can give him; I mean one of the heads of the police; one of the detective department.

1738. Mr. T. Hughes.] What is the population of Bradford?—According to the last account that I saw was last week, in one of our local papers, stating the death rate; it was supposed to be rather more than 147,900.

1739. And your 23 brokers are sufficient for the whole of that population, you think?—Yes.

1740. They could take a few more pledges, perhaps?—Yes; but I think the competition is quite sufficient at present; there are as many as can live, and almost more.

1741. Mr. Ridley.] You spoke of absolute forfeiture at the end of 12 months; I suppose you mean that the pledges should become the property of the pawnbroker at the end of 12 months, and that any overplus should belong to him exclusively, and should not be payable to the pledger?—I would leave that as it is now.

1742. But what do you mean, then, by "absolute forfeiture"?—That in all cases of pledges under 10 s. there should be absolute forfeiture, and not the power that parties now have to come and extend the time for three months longer; that is to say, I would knock off the three months entirely.

1743. Do you write upon your duplicate the nount of interest payable for the money ad- nced?—No, I could not do that.

1744. Would you have any objection to doing ?—If it was in aliquot parts, I should be very ad to do it.

1745. Do you conceive that there would be y advantage attaching to showing what the nount of interest was?—I do not think there ould be any difficulty in doing that.

1746. Would there be any object in putting on the ticket a notice that the pawner could certain at the pawn office the place and day of e of his goods, supposing that he did not deem them?—I should not see any objection to at.

1747. Would you see any advantage in that? I do not think there would be any.

1748. I ask you that question because it was recommendation of a Committee of this House at sat some years ago, that that should be uni rsally the rule with regard to all duplicates; ould you attach any value to such a course being ken?—The only thing would be that it would ake the duplicate rather larger.

1749. You would not see any objection to that, owever, would you?—No.

1750. Rather the contrary, perhaps, as render- g it less liable to loss?—Probably so.

1751. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What is your ason for wishing to limit pawns by special con- act to sums above 40 s.?—Speaking for myself, e great majority of the pledges is under that nount. My proportion is very small above at, only being 99 last year.

1752. Most of your pledges are in fact below 0 s.; why should you limit the pawns by greement to sums above 40 s.?—Because you ust have a limit of some amount, or else you ust throw it entirely open to free trade.

1753. Why should you not throw it entirely en?—I have no objection to that; but I do not ppose that we should get it.

1754. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you think that our customers of the lowest kind ought fairly be protected as between man and man?—There re some customers who come to pledge who can- ot read or write, and if there was no limit at all think that parties might be imposed upon if ey got among unprincipled men. There are lack sheep in every business, and I admit that e must have some amongst us, and by having is limit, and by having the amount stated upon e duplicate, both the pawnbroker and the awner would be compelled to work honestly.

1755. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] I suppose that most f the parties coming to you, can neither read nor rite?—Not most of them.

1756. Do they belong to the poorest class of e community?—Not the very poorest; I have, f course, some of them, but not as a rule.

1757. Chairman.] But all those persons are llowed by law to buy those goods, and to sell ose goods, are they not, without anybody under- aking to protect them?—Undoubtedly.

1758. Why cannot they exercise the same in- elligence when they want to pledge the goods as ey can when they buy or sell the goods?—hey can exercise the same intelligence.

1759. Is there any mystery in getting money n the goods different from that of buying or elling the goods?—Not the least.

1760. Mr. T. Hughes.] Surely the fact of ledging shows that the pledger is more or less in a difficulty, does it not?—Of course, more or less it is so.

1761. Then there is that distinction between pledging and ordinary buying and selling, is there not?—Yes, the pledger wants money for his pre- sent purposes.

1762. Chairman.] He may want money when he sells the goods, may he not?—He may.

1763. Or he may want to pledge his goods, for the purpose of improving his condition by turning the money to a more useful account, may he not?—Yes.

1764. Supposing, for instance, that a man has a thing that he does not require, and that he wants to buy tools to enable him to work; he is a man who is rather improving himself in the world, is he not, and displaying great intelligence in the proceeding?—He is.

1765. Therefore he is showing in every way the utmost providence and intelligence in the transaction, knowing that by pledging he will be able to make a better transaction than if he sold his goods?—Yes, he would pledge them for nearly as much as he could sell them for.

1766. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Do you know many cases in which a workman would pledge an article to buy a tool?—No, not many.

1767. Did you ever know any such cases?—I have known a few.

1768. How had the man lost his tools?—Per- haps he wants some new ones, the old ones being worn out, but the majority of people who pledge in that way for that, are men of the trading com- munity who see a bargain, and come to raise money to buy it.

1769. Chairman.] Have you ever heard of people pledging goods to emigrate?—I have not.

1770. They are too well off in Bradford to emigrate, I suppose?—No, but they generally sell them right off to emigrate.

1771. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Is it not generally the improvident who deal with you?—I do not think so.

1772. Can you tell me who purchases those articles at your sales?—In a great measure the dealers.

1773. Do not pawnbrokers buy of each other at those sales?—Very rarely.

1774. They do so, do they not?—If I saw an article which I was in want of, I should try to purchase it at a reasonable price, but it is not a rule.

1775. I think we have it in evidence, that in London, where gentlemen carry on both branches of the trade, both retail sales and pawnbroking, they buy at the auctions, and sell again the same articles in their sale shops?—Yes; we have one gentleman in the town, who deals pretty largely in jewellery, and he often buys watches and Albert guards, and that sort of thing, to retail them in his shop again.

1776. Do you not think that the practice of which I have spoken, may tend to injure the party who pledges the article, by collusion exist- ing between the auctioneer and the pawnbroker? —Oh, no; the auctioneer whom we employ would not sanction anything of the sort.

1777. Is he too honourable?—Yes.

1778. Is it not against the law in other kinds of property, for the party selling to bid at the auction as a buyer?—No.

1779. Is it the law of England, that you can sell an estate by auction, and go to that auction and and bid for your own property?—I can scarcely answer that question.

Mr. Blackwood.

23 June 1870.

1780. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not the usual law of sales, that the party selling should have a reserved bid?—It is.

1781. Chairman.] A landlord who puts in a distress for rent, can buy the goods, can he not, when the broker sells them?—I believe he can.

1782. I understand your view of the matter to be, that the man who pledges the goods, is more provident than the man who sells them, because the man who pledges them looks to the future; but the man who sells them, looks to no future?—Yes.

1783. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] When you send those goods for sale, do you give the auctioneer a reserved price?—I do.

1784. When they do not bring that price, what becomes of them?—I leave it to him very much.

1785. But as to those that are not sold, but are bought in at a reserved price, do you keep them yourself?—I have to take them back, and sell them in my retail shop.

1786. Where the articles are under 10*s.*, you just take them in, I suppose, without any sale?—Yes, I do.

1787. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you not feel it necessary to have some person present at all those sales to look after your own interest, for fear the goods should go below their value?—Every pawnbroker attends on his own behalf.

1788. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you attend, and take care that they do not go at too low a price?—If I have lent too much on an article, I let it go for what it will bring, and get over the loss at once; I should take one of those catalogues, and put down a reserved price on one side, and then leave it entirely in the auctioneer's hands as to whether it realised the amount or not.

1789. Mr. Montague Guest.] I see three rather curious items in this list; 12 pairs of stays, three times; what kind of shops would pledge those articles?—I have not the least doubt that those would have been pledged by some retail shopkeeper, who had pledged them, being in difficulties.

1790. Chairman.] You do not think that they were pledged by ladies who had outgrown their stays, but by some small shopkeeper?—Probably so.

1791. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you not often find a shoemaker, for instance, pledging goods to purchase leather to go on with his business?—Yes.

1792. Chairman.] In fact, it would seem that the pawnbroker is a kind of banker for people in a small sort of way?—Certainly.

1793. Then we ought not to condemn people as being improvident for going to a pawnbroker for money, without we condemn everybody who goes to a banker for money?—I should think not.

1794. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you seriously think that the view suggested by the right honourable Chairman, that your customers as a rule come for provident purposes, is a true one?—Yes, I do.

1795. You do not think that it is chiefly the improvident among the working classes who are your customers?—I have no doubt that I have a few of that kind, but not the majority of them.

1796. Are not the majority persons in temporary difficulties, from which they know they must extricate themselves at any cost?—They do not come for drink or anything of that kind.

1797. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Do you think that it is evidence of a man being provident that he does not save any money, but he comes to you and borrows it at 20 per cent.?—I do not say that it is evidence of his providence.

1798. That is the interest which you get, is it not?—It is.

1799. Do you think that it is an indication of a provident man to pay such an extortionate interest for a loan of money?—I believe it is lower than he can get it at anywhere else. If he goes to leaving-shops he will have to pay double the money.

1800. Is it not because he is an improvident man, that he comes to you at all?—I do not think it is; I have had men to borrow money on pledge from me, who are worth more money than I am myself.

1801. Is it men worth more money than you who come and pledge articles with you and pay 20 per cent.?—That man does not come regularly to me, but he does come occasionally.

1802. Mr. T. Hughes.] It must be from a benevolent wish to make your fortune?—I should be very glad indeed if I could do so.

1803. Chairman.] It results from his desire to have money in a sudden emergency, secretly, I presume?—It does so; he would not let his own friends know that he was in want.

1804. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I know that some pawnbrokers discount pretty largely; do you do anything in that line?—No, I never discounted a bill in my life.

1805. Mr. Plimsoll.] Is it not the case that in many of the larger towns in Yorkshire there are numerous small shopkeepers and hucksters and others who have no banking accounts whatever, and who find it very greatly to their advantage occasionally to pledge goods with pawnbrokers to meet an emergency?—Yes, no doubt.

1806. Especially in towns like Sheffield; a workman who makes scissors or other small things at his own home will frequently pledge something, will he not, to buy a rod or two of steel, depending upon the sale of the finished goods to redeem his goods, and reserve the profit to himself?—I have no doubt that they do it in Sheffield, the same as they do it with us.

1807. You do not consider that man an improvident man?—No. I have a neighbour, a grocer, who tells me that the principal part of the money which he takes on a Monday comes from my shop; and since he told me that he has opened another shop, about a mile away, and he says he wishes I would open a branch shop there, because he would be sure of plenty of ready money then.

1808. Mr. Orr Ewing.] In your experience of the world, have you not generally found that a person who borrowed money at 20 per cent. on an emergency, very soon got into the black list of bankruptcy?—I have not seen it so.

1809. Do you think that people can afford to borrow money from time to time at 20 per cent. and still continue solvent?—I do not think that a tradesman can afford to borrow at that price; but he may do so occasionally when it will be worth more to him than that amount.

1810. Chairman.] How much do you suppose a tradesman makes on the resale of his goods; does he not make more than 20 per cent.?—Yes, some some of them make more than twice or three imes that.

1811. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] What trades do you refer to?—A greengrocer.

1812. What is a greengrocer?—A man who sells cabbages, and so on.

1813. I suppose he gets his name because the people are green who deal with him?—Perhaps so.

1814. Chairman.] There is no reason why he should not mortgage a sack of potatoes, I suppose, if he needs money?—Not the least.

1815. Colonel Beresford.] You said in your evidence, a little while ago, that you would not have special contracts below 40 s., and afterwards you rather contradicted yourself by saying that you did not suppose that you would get many pledges above that amount; do you mean to say that you would positively advocate throwing it open altogether?—I should have no objection to that at all.

1816. Would it not be tantamount to raising up in your own district a lot of those shops which are called leaving shops and dolly shops, which are entirely shut out by having that 40 s. limit?—I would not care about it; the keener the competition, the more you have to look after your business.

23 June 1870.

1817. Chairman.] There is no monopoly in your business, is there?—No, not the least.

1818. Anybody who wants a license can have it by paying for it, can he not?—Yes.

1819. A man who lends money as a banker would, of course, have no difficulty about the money for the license?—No.

1820. Mr. Ridley.] Do you carry out section 18 with regard to the sale of pictures, prints, books, and so on?—We have never anything of that kind; people that have that kind of goods keep them, and do not require to pledge them.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM HECTOR, called in; and Examined.

27 June 1870.

1821. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] ARE you Procurator Fiscal for the Eastern District of Renfrewshire, and Sheriff Clerk Depute for the same district?—Yes.

1822. Are you also treasurer and collector for the poor's rate for the parishes of Eastwood and Cathcart?—I am at present treasurer and collector for the parish of Eastwood, and I held for several years the same position in the parish of Cathcart.

1823. And I think that you are Provost of Pollockshaws?—I was for several years.

1824. Have you had every opportunity of becoming acquainted with the district?—The very best.

1825. Over how many years did that extend?—Upwards of 40 years.

1826. Having been resident in Pollockshaws, I suppose you speak more particularly with reference to that burgh?—I can speak to the whole district, but more particularly to that portion of the district in which I have resided for the last 46 years.

1827. What is the population of that district?—The population of the whole district is as nearly as possible 25,000.

1828. What is the population of the burgh of Pollockshaws?—The population by the last census was 7,444; but it is now about 9,000.

1829. Has crime been on the increase in the district?—Very much so.

1830. Can you give us the number of cases of petty crime, thefts, assaults, and so on, which have been committed in successive years among the population of the eastern district of Renfrewshire?—I can as regards the crime of the district: the number of cases reported to me as procurator fiscal in 1840 was 113; in 1845, it was 169; in 1855, it was 192; in 1860, it was 266; in 1865, it was 289; in 1869, it was 318; and for the first five months of this year, it was 242.

1831. How do you account for such a great addition in those five months in the year 1870?—I can only account for it by the entire change in the habits of the people.

1832. Can you state what was the population in 1840?—The population of 1840 I cannot give exactly. The population has been increasing, but not to any considerable extent, and by no means in proportion to the crime.

1833. What is the nature of those crimes?—The cases cognisable by me as procurator fiscal are such cases as are within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, the justices of the peace. They comprehend all cases of petty theft, assaults, breaches of the peace, malicious mischief, and cases such as arise from intemperance.

1834. Perhaps, as the other Members of the Committee are English Members, you will be good enough to explain the duties of the procurator fiscal?—The duty of the procurator fiscal is to prosecute in all cases of crime committed within the district. Information as to those cases is communicated to him, and it is his duty to investigate those cases, either by himself or through the police of the district, and then to prosecute the parties to conviction.

1835. Mr. Alderman Carter.] He is the public prosecutor for the district, is he not?—He is the public prosecutor for the district.

1836. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Can you give us the poor rates from the year 1835?—There has been a very large increase in the poor's rate in the parish of Eastwood; the assessment for the poor in 1835 was 304 l., in 1845 it was 1,336 l., in 1855 it was 2,146 l., in 1865 it was 2,829 l., and in 1869 it was 3,095 l.

1837. Mr. Whitwell.] Do any other causes of expenditure besides the support of the poor now fall upon the poor's rate?—None, except the expense of registration, which is a mere trifle.

1838. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is the police rate included?—The police rate is not included, nor any of the local rates.

1839. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you think that the increase of the population has corresponded to the increase of the poor's rates?—There has been no corresponding increase of population, and there has been no depression in trade, or any other reason that I can assign of that kind, to cause this increase of pauperism or of crime.

1840. Has the number of paupers increased?—Proportionally it has, although the expense now under the new Poor Law Act is greater per head in proportion than it was formerly; but the increase has been by no means such as in any degree to account for the enormous increase in the amount of the assessment.

1841. Have you remarked any change in the habits habits of the inhabitants?—Yes, I have remarked a very decided change. There has been a very marked, distinct, and progressive change in the habits of the inhabitants of that part of the district, particularly of Pollockshaws, since 1835.

1842. Were there any pawnbrokers in Pollockshaws previously to 1835?—There were no pawnbrokers, but in about 1835 we had that description of pawnbrokers established amongst us called "wee pawns." There were two of them.

1843. Previously to that, will you give us an account of the friendly societies which were in existence in Eastwood?—There were four friendly societies in the parish of Eastwood previously to 835; they struggled on for a number of years after 1835, and at last they could only preserve their existence by amalgamation. One of the societies went down altogether, and three of them were amalgamated. I am clerk to the feritors, and I was instrumental in bringing about that amalgamation for the purpose of preserving the friendly societies if possible. One of the societies possessed a little property, and that was an inducement to the other societies to join with them, and the whole three societies amalgamated, and by the help of that small property, which produces to them about 60*l.* or 70*l.* a year, the amalgamated society has continued to exist, but the members have greatly diminished in number, and now there are not above 100 members altogether.

1844. Have you many complaints made to you by married men of their wives going to the pawn shops and pawning bed and body clothing, and household furniture?—As procurator fiscal, I have had many complaints of that kind; I have had many complaints from working men in Pollockshaws, that their wives were putting away their effects, and especially their bed and body clothes and household articles, in pawn; and I had complaints, on the other hand, from wives that their husbands were taking the same course, and bringing misery on their families.

1845. I suppose that you do not attribute the change in the habits of the people of Pollockshaws altogether to pawnshops?—No, I do not think it would be just to the pawnbrokers to attribute all the change which has taken place to them; I do not think that the change in the habits of the people, for instance, as regards the increase of improvidence, and drunkenness, and pauperism, and crime, which is so very great and so very strongly marked, as I have just said, can be entirely ascribed to the pawnbroking system, but that system has undoubtedly been one of the principal causes of the change. I think that the increase of the population, the operation of the Poor Law Act 1845, and the influx of Irish into the parish, have all had a considerable influence in this direction, so that it is not altogether ascribable to the pawnbrokers nor to the pawn system.

1846. I think you were instructed by the justice of the district to prepare a Bill to be brought into Parliament for the regulation of brokers and dealers in second-hand articles, were you not?—I was, and I did prepare such a Bill. In 1855, in consequence of the increase of crime, pauperism, and other matters of that kind, I took occasion to call the attention of the county magistrates of the district to the change which was going on; I was then instructed, after considerable inquiry had been made, to prepare a Bill for regulating the brokers and the "wee pawns." The Bill, of which I have a copy here, was prepared and it was put into the hands of the Lord Advocate, at the time Mr. Moncrieff, by a deputation from magistrates of burghs in the west of Scotland, the justices and commissioners of supply of Renfrewshire, and the officials of Renfrewshire, headed by the late Sir John Maxwell of Pollock.

1847. What happened in Pollockshaws after that; the result of that agitation was the passing of an Act, was it not?—The result of the agitation, which originated with the magistrates of my district, was the passing of the Act of 1856, the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27, intituled, "An Act to amend the Acts relating to Pawnbrokers." The effect of that Act was to bring the "wee pawns" within the provisions of the Pawnbrokers' Act.

1848. Had that Act the effect of bringing your two wee pawnbrokers under the Licensed Pawnbrokers' Act?—It transferred our two wee pawnbrokers into licensed pawnbrokers, but it made no other change.

1849. Is the system of pledging with pawnbrokers carried on to a great extent in Pollockshaws?—To a very large extent.

1850. Can you state to what extent it is carried on?—Yes; I directed the police to make an inquiry regarding the number of pawns. They took the number in March last, and they also took the number in May.

1851. Can you give us the number?—The numbers were found to be as nearly as possible 4,000 monthly in each establishment. The average number for the two was 8,000 each, or 96,000 pledges in our population of 9,000, within 12 months.

1852. Can you give us the number of pairs of blankets pledged in Pollockshaws in March?—The number of pairs of blankets pledged in March was 30, and in May 46.

1853. Of what did the number of 96,000 pledges consist?—Mostly of bed and body clothing, and small articles of household effects.

1854. Were they articles essential, in fact, to the comfort of the people?—Perfectly necessary for their comfort, and to preserve their health essentially necessary.

1855. Is there much business done by the people in Pollockshaws with the Glasgow pawnbrokers?—I have had very frequent occasion to see pawn tickets in the possession of the inhabitants of Pollockshaws, which were in addition, of course, to the number pawned in our own establishments.

1856. What do you think has been the effect upon the people who frequent pawnshops?—It has had a most injurious effect; it has increased intemperance to a very great degree; it has increased crime, as I have stated in detail, to a large extent, and it cannot be otherwise. The number of pledges for every individual in our population is 10½, and for every family of five persons 50; supposing that only one-half of the population were to go to pawnshops, we should have every creature of this half in Pollockshaws pledging 21 pledges, and every family 100 pledges in a year; there can be no doubt whatever of the demoralising effect of pledging and pawning; and if that effect is going on, it is easy to conceive that there must be a very great change for the worse in the social condition of the inhabitants of the place.

1857. I believe that the people have been very much employed for a number of years in that district?

district?—They have been remarkably well employed at times when the people at other places were without employment. They have invariably been in constant employment so far as I have known, and they have been in receipt of good wages.

1858. Have you observed whether the money which is raised by those persons, is raised by a class who are addicted to drinking?—The money which is raised by the pawns finds its way to a very great extent, in my opinion, to the whisky shop; of course, no one can follow the money which poor people get into their hands from the pawnbroker, so as to tell exactly the amount which goes in any one direction, but it is perfectly evident from the condition of the people, and from what I learn as public prosecutor, and from what transpires at our numerous courts in the district, that a very large proportion of the money which is raised by pawning, goes to the whisky shop.

1859. The system of pawnbroking is comparatively of recent origin in Scotland, is it not?—It is a comparative novelty in Scotland; within my own lifetime, there was not a pawnbroker in Scotland.

1860. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But there were those "wee pawn" shops, as you call them, were there not?—There were no "wee pawns" at that time either; there might possibly be some small brokers in different parts of Scotland, but they were not known as "wee pawns," and certainly there were no licensed pawnbrokers until 1806, until six years after the passing of the Act under which the pawnbroking trade is regulated.

1861. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] How many pawnbrokers were there in 1833 in Scotland?—In 1833 there were 52 pawnbrokers; they had increased from one in 1806 to 52 in 1833. In 1838 they had increased to 88. In 1865 they had increased to 312. The number now must be considerably larger than it was in 1865, when a Return was made to the House of Commons of the number of pawnbrokers in Great Britain, for I find that in Glasgow alone, the number has increased since 1861 from 79 to 115. That number 115 I took from the "Glasgow Directory" two days ago.

1862. Can you give us the total number of pledges in the United Kingdom?—In order to get at the total number of pledges you are obliged to assume a certain number for each establishment. It is difficult to make that calculation, because all parties are not agreed about it. Many think, and I think, that the average number will be 60,000 for each establishment in Great Britain and Ireland. However, we will say that it will only be about 40,000. Keyson, in his work on pawnbroking, admits that the metropolitan pawnbrokers have each 60,000 pledges, and he says that the provincial pawnbrokers will have 40,000 each; and he remarks that no establishment can well be kept up unless they have 40,000. In that case, the number of pledges in Scotland (and it is to Scotland that I have given my attention more particularly) would be 18,720,000; and in the United Kingdom, taking the same rate, the number of pledges would be 207,780,000.

1863. Have you observed that the increase of the system of pawnbroking has been identified with the increase of crime in Scotland?—Yes, so far as my own observation goes, it has, very materially; and I may state that I have been in communication with all parts of Scotland on this subject with gentlemen who take a very great interest in the social improvement of the people of Scotland, with the heads of the police, for instance, and other persons, and they all concur in the opinion that pawnbroking has been one great source of crime, and is the means not only of creating crime, but of fostering and encouraging crime.

1864. You have taken some means to ascertain the number of witnesses connected with pawnbroking establishments who have been examined in a certain number of cases connected with theft and embezzlement, have you not?—I have; in my own experience for the last 40 years I have had comparatively few cases of theft under my cognizance which have not had some connection either direct or indirect with the pawnshop; and I have gone over all the indictments in the Sheriff Court in Glasgow in cases tried by the sheriff and a jury in two different years, and I have ascertained by an examination of the lists of those witnesses appended to the indictments, that in 119 cases of housebreaking, theft, reset, and embezzlement tried at Glasgow by the sheriff of Lanarkshire and a jury in 1860, 106 of the witnesses were pawnbrokers or brokers.

1865. Chairman.] How many were pawnbrokers?—I cannot say exactly; I certainly took the number at the time, but I cannot tell now: but I can tell the exact number in regard to last year; I also examined the indictment for the rest of last year a few days ago, and I found that in 1869, that in 229 cases 145 witnesses were pawnbrokers or their assistants, and only 45 were brokers; taking the same proportion in 1861, a large proportion of the witnesses in that year must have been pawnbrokers also; the increase both in the number of cases and of the witnesses is very remarkable.

1866. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Does that include the summary trials which took place before the sheriff?—It does not, and those comprise a very large number of cases. They are tried summarily under a Statute giving summary jurisdiction in criminal matters to the sheriff, and in those cases there is a corresponding number of pawnbrokers as witnesses; but the list of witnesses is not appended to indictments, and it is therefore very difficult to ascertain; I inquired of the procurator fiscal if he could give me the exact information as to the number, and it is very difficult to ascertan the number, but I have no hesitation whatever in giving it as my opinion, founded upon long experience and knowledge of these matters, that the number would be probably greater than it was in cases tried by the sheriff and a jury.

1867. Do many of the licensed brokers in your district, or as far as you know in Glasgow, pursue the trade of the "wee pawn" system?—We have no "wee pawn" brokers in Pollackshaws at all we have nothing but the licensed pawnbrokers but the number of brokers in Glasgow is very large, and I have heard the police say, that a very considerable number of those carry on the old "wee pawn" system, which the Act of 1857 was intended to put down. This has happened in consequence of the Act not being enforced, as I think it ought to be and might be.

1868. Do you approve of the plan which is adopted in Glasgow, of the police furnishing every day to the brokers and pawnbrokers a list of articles stolen?—I certainly think that it is right, in order to protect the pawnbroker as well as to protect the public, that such lists should be furnished, and I know that those lists are furnished to the pawnbrokers; I only regret that they are not furnished beyond the bounds of the city, because it is very notorious that a large quantity of the plunder in Glasgow finds its way to Pollockshaws, and other places, to be pawned; and yet they do not send to Pollockshaws any of their lists. I find, on looking over the list of witnesses in the jury court list in Glasgow, that the pawnbrokers' assistants there are witnesses, showing that the articles stolen in Glasgow, as well as those stolen amongst ourselves, are pawned at Pollockshaws. There are instances from Paisley, and from other places in the same way, and I think that a large portion of the plunder in Glasgow is distributed amongst the pawnbrokers, not in the city, but around the city, within a reasonable distance.

1869. Can you give us a note of the articles which are so advertised?—I thought it might be interesting to the Committee to see those lists; I observe by the evidence in the newspapers that a good deal has been said about them, and I have brought the police lists for the month of March (handing in the same), and I will give you an analysis of those lists.

1870. Will you state the analysis of those lists?—It consists altogether of 3,841 articles within the month, and it comprises bed clothes 92 articles; body clothes, 614; gold and silver watches, 188; silver plate and jewellery, 2,836; miscellaneous, 647; workmen's tools, 225; making in all 3,841 in one month. That may be taken as a fair average month, being neither in winter nor summer. The total number of articles reported to the police, supposing that to be the average, would in the year be 46,452. I do not believe that the police get information of half the articles that are stolen, and it is easy to suppose so. There are certain classes of cases, such as plunder in brothels by prostitutes for instance, or by prostitutes in the streets, or by shopmen and workers in factories and shops, and places of that kind, which never find their way to the police, and are very little known. In that way the number must be immensely greater than are ever reported there.

1871. Do you suppose that those articles which you have now named can be easily pledged?—It is very difficult to understand how such an immense amount of plunder can be disposed of unless it be through pawnbrokers and brokers.

1872. Do you think that the registration by pawnbrokers affords protection against that?—I do not know that it does; I do not think that the police, although they have access to the pawnbrokers' books, can possibly efficiently detect this immense amount of crime which is going on in Glasgow. I find, from a return made by the chief constable for last year, that the number of detective officers who give their attention specially to the detection of crime is only 18, and two sub-inspectors. Now, though the whole of those detectives were employed from the 1st day of January to the 31st day of December in visiting the 115 pawnbrokers' shops, and turning over the articles which were there received, to detect the 46,000 articles which were reported to them, they would be constantly employed in turning over those articles, and doing nothing else, yet they had 10,000 other cases of crime of one kind and another to attend to.

1873. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Have you not in Glasgow and in Scotland receivers as well as pawnbrokers?—I am not aware, within my experience, of any such classes; I have no doubt whatever but that the police in Glasgow are cognisant of such persons, and that there are such persons; but I am not aware, and I do not think that it is the general opinion of those who have given any attention to these matters, that there are any receivers to swallow up the 46,000 articles reported to the police, and probably twice as many more stolen in Glasgow, about which the police know nothing.

1874. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] A respectable pawnbroker would never be supposed to do anything of that kind, I presume?—Respectable pawnbrokers will not receive stolen articles if they know them to be stolen; and I have myself been assisted by pawnbrokers in several cases where articles were offered to them, to detect and secure the punishment of the parties who were offering the stolen property to them. But while that is undoubtedly the case, and while within my own experience, I have never found that the pawnbrokers ever interposed any obstacles to the detection of stolen property in their possession (I have never seen the least attempt at anything of that kind on the part of the pawnbrokers in my own district), yet the number of stolen articles reported to the police, which are recovered, is so very infinitesimal, that it does not at all show that the articles stolen, and getting into the hands of the pawnbrokers and brokers, are accounted for.

1875. What do you suppose are the inducements, to the less respectable pawnbrokers, to deal with thieves?—I suppose that in all trades and professions there are unprincipled persons; there are many men, I believe, in the pawnbroking trade who are quite above that; but to those who are less conscientious, there are various inducements, I think, to accept pledges from thieves. I am assuming however, that in the generality of cases pawnbrokers knew their customers. They have a very shrewd perception and tact in knowing their customers, and I think that if a pawnbroker who received stolen property knew that the person offering it was a thief, or if there was anything in the nature of the article, or in the nature of the transaction at all to show that the pawnbroker was dealing with a thief, he would offer a very small sum for the article offered to him; for a thief will accept a much smaller sum for pledged articles than a person who goes there in an honest way, and knows the value of the article, and who will not accept less than the value of the article, or at least as much as he can possibly get upon it if he requires it. In the second place, the risk of detection is exceedingly small; and, in the next place, stolen property, in my opinion, is generally forfeited, so that the pawnbroker gets it at his own price. I think that the thief has every disadvantage in dealing with the pawnbroker.

1876. Then you do not think that the registration by the police would be a complete safeguard?—I do not think that the registration is a protection at all. Pawnbrokers themselves admit that their registrations are entirely fictitious, and I have seen a great many pawn tickets, the names on which were fictitious; and I am sorry to say also that the descriptions of the articles inscribed on the face of the pawn ticket might be called fictitious too, because they were not legible. You could not make out what was the subject pawned, so indistinctly was it written on the pawnticket. I do not think that the searching of the register is any protection to the public at all. As I have just stated it is perfectly impracticable, with the means at all events at the disposal of the Glasgow police, to recover more than a very small proportion of the articles which are reported as stolen.

1877. It has been stated by some of the witnesses, that the pawnbroking business is not at all a lucrative one, and that it affords a very small remuneration for the amount of capital invested in it and of labour bestowed upon it; from your observation of pawnbrokers and their social position, what would you think as to that?—So far as means are concerned, the pawnbrokers are a very well-to-do set of people, I think; I have never known a pawnbroker get into the Gazette, in Scotland; and any of them whom I do know personally are getting rich very fast; I know that those two parties in my own neighbourhood, have got on most wonderfully well. They do their business as respectably, I think, as most pawnbrokers. Those two men commenced their business in a very small way indeed. One of them was a working man. I do not know what the other was, or whether he was anything at all; but they both commenced business in a very small way with bundle shops, or "wee pawns," in about 1835, or somewhere thereabouts. Now, they are very considerable proprietors in the neighbourhood with a large rental; one of them has heritable property, I see, from the valuation roll, yielding 132 l., annually; and the other along with his brother, has property yielding about as much; and they are well understood, especially one of the pawnbrokers, to have very considerable means beyond that.

1878. Do you think that a system of annual licensing by the local magistrates, such as prevails in the spirit trade, would be proper?—I have been long of opinion that some control beyond what we have over the pawnbrokers ought to be given to the public by legislation; and I think that were the pawnbrokers obliged to come before the local magistrates once a year and ask for a renewal of their licenses, it would have a very good effect in causing the trade to be very much better conducted than it is at present.

1879. Have you anything to say upon the sale department of the forfeited or unredeemed pledges?—I should be disposed entirely to separate the sale department from the pawning business. I think it is open to unfair trading, I would not like to say fraud, on the part of the pawnbroker, that would probably be a strong term, but it is open to very unfair trading, and I will give you my reasons for thinking so. I hold in my hand a letter from one of the most respectable merchants in Glasgow, who is connected with a large firm in Glasgow, and he says in relation to that sale trade by pawnbrokers, about which I was speaking to him, and asking him if he knew anything about it, "Yes, I know a great deal about it. I was waited upon to-day by a party who travels among pawnbrokers, selling goods for a pushing drapery establishment in Glasgow. He told me he sold yesterday upwards of 100 l. worth of slops (that is, men's ready-made clothing), his daily sales averaging 50 l., principally in slops, blankets, bedding, table-covers, and towelling. Those goods are sold by the pawnbrokers as unredeemed pledges." Now, I heard of another case where a merchant in Glasgow sold to a pawnbroker in Greenock 50 l. worth of stuffs, and those were to be retailed also in the sale shops; but before being retailed they were to be cut into lengths and made into unredeemed pledges, and in that form to be presented to a gullible public, who fancy they are going to those shops to buy cheap goods, they being unredeemed pledges, when they, in point of fact, are paying as much, at all events, if not more, for goods actually bought by the pawnbrokers and carried into their sale shops only to add to the already very large stock of stuffs which they had got by forfeiture into their hands. Now that is not fair trade, and I think that in order to let every trade hang by itself, the pawnbroking should be kept by itself, if it is useful, and if it is necessary. If it is necessary at all, and it is very generally maintained that it is so, then it ought to be a separate trade, and it ought to be well controlled; and I have no doubt that in that way it might be conducted so as to prevent the necessity for such an inquiry as is going on here to-day.

1880. In the case of the articles which are sold by public auction, is any auctioneer employed?—In Glasgow invariably, so far as I have observed the numerous pawnbrokers' advertisements, they employ only one man, and in that way he must be a pawnbrokers' auctioneer, and there is no way of preventing collusion between the pawnbroker and the auctioneer for the purpose of getting those articles into the hands of the pawnbroker.

1881. Chairman.] What do you call collusion?—I noticed in the report of the evidence given by one of the witnesses who was examined here the other day, that the pawnbrokers in a district of England (I do not know whether it is the practice altogether in Scotland) keep within the Act of Parliament by putting their articles into the hands of an auctioneer pro formâ, and they are knocked down, but to whom are they knocked down? why, to the pawnbrokers; the Act of Parliament allows the pawnbroker to purchase them.

1882. How is that collusion?—There is an understanding between the pawnbroker and the auctioneer, that the pawnbroker is simply to get back the articles that belong to other people.

1883. Do you mean that the public are not allowed to bid?—The public have no opportunity of bidding; this same pawnbroker, in giving his evidence says, that there is nobody there to bid.

1884. But are they not allowed to bid?—I do not know, he does not say; but he says, in point of fact, that they do not.

1885. If they were allowed to bid, there would be no collusion, would there?—Then the statement of the pawnbrokers, that thay make nothing by those sales, would go for nothing, because they would never think of putting up articles, except at a price which would remunerate themselves, that is to say, which would repay them for their advances and for the interest due to them, and if they did not go up to that price, they would purchase them back.

1886. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But are they not obliged to sell by auction?—They are obliged, by Act of Parliament, to sell by auction.

1887. Did not that pawnbroker whose evidence you ou read say that it was the fault of the public they did not come, because the pawnbrokers dvertised their sales, and kept the doors open l the time the sales were going on?—I do not now whether he exactly said that; he said, how-ver, that those sales were advertised in a sort of ay, and that they were conducted by auction-rs, who knocked down the articles to pawn-okers.

1888. Chairman.] Now you are only speculat-ng upon evidence which you did not hear, are ou not?—To a great extent. That it is not the ost reliable evidence, I am perfectly sensible; nd I do not pretend to know very thoroughly e manner in which pawnbroking is carried on, s so far as it is managed to yield a profit to the awnbroker. My attention has been chiefly di-ected to pawnbroking in so far as regards its fluence upon crime.

1889. You know nothing about the mode in hich the auctions are conducted in Scotland, presume?—Very little. I have heard a great eal, but I should not like to give hearsay evi-ence, because I do not think it is reliable.

1890. Mr. Whitwell.] Did you ever attend one those sales?—I was never present at such a le. A reference to particular cases will per-aps best illustrate the effect of pawnbroking. ou get a better idea by two or three cases, pro-ably, than by general statements. Now I ould just like to read one or two cases to the ommittee, and my information is perfectly re-able. In the first place, I have a letter in my nds from a clergyman in Glasgow, a gentle-an who takes great interest in social questions, well-known gentleman, and well known to the onourable Member for Paisley. He says to me, answer to a letter of mine, dated the 9th of lay, "A decent, respectable man has just called great distress about his wife, who has, in his sence, pawned everything in his once happy me." That is one case. I have another case ere, where a gentleman states to me that a per-n, the wife of a man in a tolerably respectable sition (I understand him to mean by that, pro-ably, a grade above the mere working man) me to his shop and contracted a debt for arti-es of clothing, of one kind and another, to the mount of 80 l. The shopkeeper getting uneasy out the amount of the debt, applied to the hus-nd for payment. He says that the husband as perfectly horrified when he heard of the 0 l. debt, and he immediately made inquiries out it. On inquiry he found that the whole of e articles which had been purchased at this op had gone to the pawnshop, and the husband me, with tears in his eyes, to let it be known the shopkeeper, and begged him that he would dulge him with time to pay for them. There another case, which is of older date, but it is a ry striking case, and it came under my own mediate observation as procurator fiscal for the strict. The gentleman who writes this letter me held a good position in my own neigh-ourhood as proprietor of public works, but he as reduced through misfortune in trade, and he rites to me thus: "The house is emptied of very article which can be carried away of any due. My children cannot go to school for the ant of clothes. Drunk or sober, this woman" hat is his wife) "will not be satisfied until I and y family are ruined, and in the poorhouse. For odness sake, arrest this downward progress to ggary."

1891. Chairman.] How are we to make this man's wife a good woman?—I do not know that he has succeeded in doing that yet.

1892. If he cannot do it, how can we do it?—I am not asking how the Legislature are to do it, but I am asking how this trade is to be restrained, if it be at all within the bounds of possibility, so as to prevent cases of this kind occurring. I have already suggested a system of licensing which would enable the magistrates of a district to say, in the first place, whether there should be a pawn shop there at all. There are several burghs and towns in Renfrewshire which have no pawn shop. The magistrates resist the granting of a license to even a broker, and it has a most salutary influence. Now if pawnbrokers were obliged to come to the magistrates once a year, and if they were obliged to stand upon their characters, I think that that would have a very material effect in putting down such a case as this. In this very case to which I have just referred, amongst 120 or 130 pawn tickets which I had in my hand and examined, I found that 12 of them were of one date. Now no magistrate would grant a license to a pawnbroker who took in 12 pledges in one day from any person, knowing that the person pledging was notorious for her dissipated habits, and he would be perfectly able to judge; he must have known what he was doing in taking those articles.

1893. It seems in this case that those goods were the goods of the husband, and were taken out of the house?—They were the goods of the husband, and were taken out of the house.

1894. Why did the husband allow the wife to take them away?—He was away from home during the whole day, being employed in Glasgow, and he came home at night to a desolate hearth, found his wife drunk, his goods in the pawn shop, his children in the street, and himself locked out of the house.

1895. But the law, to do any good, would have to remedy all those things, would it not?—It is very difficult to remedy such a state of things.

1896. Did it not strike you that that was rather an exceptional case?—It is not so exceptional a case as might be supposed. There are very many cases (and I could state some more that I have in my hand) which are just about as bad.

1897. Mr. Whitwell.] Do you mean to say that this woman pawned her twelve articles of clothing or furniture, or whatever they were, successively, she being in a state of intoxication?—What I say is simply this: that the tickets came into my hands having been found in the house by the police after the whole house had been gutted, and twelve of the tickets bore the same date.

1898. Chairman.] Were they from the same pawnbroker?—Yes.

1899. Mr. Whitwell.] Can you do more than control the pawning of goods by a woman or by a person who is in a state of intoxication?—Yes; I think you will observe that in that Bill which I prepared for the justices, I inserted a provision that in the case of a married woman no pawnbroker should knowingly take in any goods belonging to her husband without authority from her husband. I know that there is very great difficulty in carrying on the pawnbroking trade under such circumstances, because they might send another person, but then the pawnbroker is bound to make an inquiry as to the owner.

Mr. W. Hector. 27 June 1870.

1900. Chairman.] Did the husband in the last case which you mentioned raise the question of his legal rights?—He, by the law of Scotland, could do nothing. There is a joint ownership in household goods in the husband and wife; on a wife putting away any article of that kind, the husband would have no redress from the pawnbroker.

1901. The law of Scotland is different from the law of England?—The law of Scotland is different from the law of England.

1902. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you not think that in those cases which you have mentioned whisky rather than the pawnbroker is the cause of the evil of which you speak?—I think that pawnbroking is necessary to the gratification of the taste for whisky. If this woman had not had that means of raising money to procure liquor, her husband would not have given her money, and she would not have made such a beast of herself.

1903. Chairman.] If I understand you rightly, your view of the matter is this, that because there is a pawnbroker, a person has a disposition to borrow money; and that then, having that disposition to borrow money, he has the disposition to spend it in getting drunk?—It very often happens.

1904. Or do you think that the reverse is the more accurate mode of reasoning; that a person has a disposition to get drink, and therefore desires to get money, and therefore pawns his goods?—There is a desire to get drink in the first place undoubtedly, but I may state a case which has just come into my mind now, to show the operation of the pawnshops upon the desire for drinking.

1905. But I want to ask you first, whether your general view of the matter is, that because a person can pledge goods, therefore he has a disposition to borrow, and that having a disposition to borrow, he then gets a disposition to spend the money in drink?—It is not by any means a necessary consequence that a man who has a disposition to borrow should wish to borrow to purchase drink.

1906. Is it not a more correct view, that a man has a disposition to drink, and that, therefore, he has a disposition to get money for drinking?—Everything has a beginning, sometimes it begins through pawnbroking, and sometimes it begins through a man's own vicious nature.

1907. Is it your view, that the Scotch habit in this respect begins with a disposition to drink, or that a man, seeing a pawnshop in the street, gets a disposition to borrow money, or seeing a ginshop in the street, gets a disposition to drink?—I should say that if there were no pawnshops, there would be much less disposition to drink, because, if a man has not the means of gratifying a wish, the wish is not likely to rise in his mind.

1908. But if a man begins with a disposition to drink, and has to get money for it, he will get money by any means whether or not, will he not?—He might possibly get drink, but the pawnshops give him the means.

1909. Therefore, if he had no money, he would sell his goods would he not?—I do not think that one article would be sold for a thousand which are pawned.

1910. Not even if there was an equal disposition to drink?—Even though there was an equal disposition to drink.

1911. Do you think that if there were no pawnshops, there would not be shops dealing in second-hand goods, and so on?—My own experience shows exactly the contrary in my own neighbourhood.

1912. Does it not appear, that before there were any pawnbrokers at all, there were people who dealt without licenses in the buying of goods, in what you call the "wee pawning"?—The existence of the "wee pawn" shops themselves commenced at a comparatively recent date.

1913. But as I understand you, in Scotland they began first without licenses?—No, there were licensed pawnbrokers before there were "wee pawns," I think that the "wee pawns" merely imitated the licensed pawnbrokers; I am not aware that there were "wee pawns" in 1806.

1914. I understood from you that there were such a number of persons buying goods instead of taking pledges, that you desired to have an Act passed to prevent it?—That was in 1856.

1915. Therefore, there was this facility being afforded to the community to sell the goods, and pledge them to such an extent that you applied for a prohibitory Act, was that so?—Yes, we applied for an Act to prevent pawning with brokers.

1916. Are you aware that that pawning was in point of fact a selling in the legal nature of the transaction?—It was not at that time a selling: there was a perfectly distinct legal understanding that the goods were held to be redeemed, and there was a fixed sum of interest agreed upon between the parties.

1917. But that was not a contract, was it?—There was a verbal contract.

1918. I thought it was a contract to sell the goods with a sort of honourable understanding that they were redeemable?—Not at that time: there was a distinct understanding on the part of "wee pawnbrokers" and their customers, that the goods were pledged; I am speaking of from 1835 to 1857.

1919. You tell us also that there are a great many brokers, those brokers are people who deal in second hand goods, are they not?—Yes.

1920. Then is it not reasonable to assume that just in proportion as the facilities for pledging were taken away, so would the business of the brokers take its place?—There is no doubt that to some extent it would, but I think that would arise very much from the change which has been created in the habits of the people by the system which has existed since 1806.

1921. But has the change in the habits of the people been created by their love of finery and of drink, as compared with their more simple habits formerly?—I do not think that the love of finery has anything to do with it. I think it is more with the desire of the gratification of the love for drink that the goods go to pawnshops; I have never seen any instance of persons pawning for the purpose of decorating themselves better.

1922. Is it not because they live beyond their means?—They exhaust their means; they have got habits of improvidence. They exhaust their money, and they resort to the pawnshops to gratify the desires which are a necessary consequence of the change in their habits.

1923. Do you contemplate that desire as being simply a desire for drink, or is it a desire for pleasure, and for idleness, and for various other things?—I think that in Scotland it is more the desire for drink; and I believe that, in so far as have

have ever been able to learn from any communications which I have had, either written or verbal, throughout the whole of Scotland, intemperance in fact is the great cause of the resort to pawnshops.

1924. Or that it follows the disposition to be improvident?—Yes; of course there must be a desire for drink before they go to the pawnshop, but how that desire has been originally created, it is very difficult to say.

1925. There must be a desire to spend more money than they have to spend for some purpose or other, must there not?—Yes.

1926. Can you find any other cause for that desire to spend more than they have, than the desire to get drink?—I speak from my own knowledge and observation of what is done with the money got in the pawnshops, and I find that that money is spent in procuring drink. With regard to that, I may state that the inspector of the poor has informed me within a very few days, that of five cases of parties claiming to get upon the poor's rate in the parish of Eastwood, four had been brought to that condition through intemperance and improvidence, the result of their visits to the pawnshops.

1927. Mr. Montague Guest.] I do not quite understand you with regard to the Act; did you say that there is a different Act in Scotland from what there is in England?—No; the Pawnbrokers' Act of 1800 existed at the same time. It is a British Act, and it is under the Pawnbrokers' Act of 1800 that the pawnbroking is conducted. The Glasgow Police Act so far regulates pawnbrokers. It was originally proposed by the magistrates of Glasgow to include the licensing of pawnbrokers in the Police Act as well as of brokers; but the pawnbroking interest used their influence to get themselves excluded upon the ground that they were a superior class to the brokers, and in many respects certainly they are superior, and the magistrates confine their licensing system to brokers.

1928. What do you mean by brokers?—Dealers in second-hand goods, and "wee pawns."

1929. Do you mean to say that they remitted the license which might have been put by the Act upon pawnbrokers?—Those people (the brokers) are annually licensed, and a very considerable number of them are refused annually by the magistrates. Whenever they are discovered to be acting against the public interest the magistrates withhold the license.

1930. At the same time the pawnbrokers are licensed too, are they not?—Yes; but it is a Government license which any man can get, whatever may be his character, if he chooses to pay 7 l. 10 s.; but he cannot become a broker in Glasgow now without a license from the magistrates.

1931. That only applies to Glasgow itself, I believe?—It only applies to Glasgow itself. By the general Police Act of Scotland in 1862, it applies also to burghs accepting the provisions of that Act; but there are very few burghs in Scotland which have accepted the general provisions of that general Police Act. They have taken such provisions as included watching, cleansing, and lighting, and so forth, rejecting others; and in that way the brokers are not brought within the operation of the Act, or under the jurisdiction of the magistrates of those burghs.

1932. What do the "wee pawn" shops pay for a license?—They pay nothing, except a small fee, I think.

1933. In your Bill, you recommend that a small fee should be paid for licenses for "wee pawns," do you not?—I recommend that they should pay a license duty to Government, which would have the effect of diminishing the number, and that taken in connection with the control over them by the magistrates through the annual application for a license, might have some beneficial effect upon the trade.

1934. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] You do not expect to make people virtuous by Act of Parliament, I presume?—It is very difficult to make people virtuous by Act of Parliament.

1935. But do you think that Parliament can enact laws which will restrain the vicious?—Yes; and they have very considerable control over classes who carry on businesses which are injurious to the public interest.

1936. Do you think that it is principally the intemperate and improvident, and vicious, who deal with those traders known as pawnbrokers?—In Scotland, to a very great extent, it is so. That is the result not only of my own personal observation, but the result of inquiries throughout every part of Scotland.

1937. Do you think that pawnbroking gives facilities to the vicious to get money readily to spend in drink?—It gives facilities which they otherwise could not have.

1938. I suppose from your observation that it is the lowest class of the population which deals with the pawnbrokers?—Almost exclusively; but it is working up into other classes, and causing ruin there as it has done amongst an immense number of the working classes.

1939. Have you found it to be demoralising to the population?—It is demoralising the population, and it has been and is increasing in its effect in that way to a very great extent.

1940. Do you think it is of any advantage to the frugal and well-conducted working man to have the opportunity of getting money for purchasing tools, or anything which he may require in his trade?—I do not think that a man of character requires to go to a pawnshop to buy his tools; any man would get sufficient from his employer to purchase tools.

1941. Can you give us any statistics as to the amount of money which is generally given upon pledges?—I can form no idea; I would not like to give an estimate, it would be only a guess.

1942. Could you state how many there are at 6 d. or at 1 s.?—I could not at all; but I believe that from 80 to 90 per cent. of the pledges in the two pawnshops in our own place are low pledges, below 10 s., and that they have a very small trade in high pledges, and therefore the greater part of the pledges must be very small; and any of the pawntickets which I have seen are really for very small sums, such as 1 s., 1 s. 6 d., and 2 s., and so forth.

1943. Not such amounts as would be of any consequence for maintaining a family?—Not the least.

1944. You mentioned a very hard case where a dissipated, worthless wife, sold everything in the house, and you mentioned that 12 pledges were put into a pawnshop in one day by that woman; had you an opportunity of seeing what the amount obtained on each of those tickets was?—Yes, I saw the amounts at the time; but this was 10 years back, and therefore I do not recollect. The sums were necessarily small, because the articles were given in detail. A Family Bible was one of them, for instance, then there were a child's shoes, and its stockings, and the frocks of one or two of the children, and the woman's gown, and the husband's coat, and so forth. They were all given out in detail in that way, and the sums advanced upon them must have been exceedingly small.

1945. Do you remember how much was got on the Family Bible?—It was a very small sum; I believe that pawnbrokers do not like Bibles in their traffic.

1946. Was it a very large Bible?—Yes.

1947. What would it cost to the family?—I have no idea at all.

1948. What is your opinion about restricting the amount that should be allowed to be given in pledge; how low would you go if there were any restriction, in order to restrain such practices as you have described?—If pawnbroking is a necessity, the necessity generally exists amongst the very lowest classes, and in that way, the lowest sum that can be got from a pawnbroker would probably be the sum that was most required; so that I could scarcely say that it ought to be limited.

1949. But if it is required for a vicious purpose, would it not be better to stop it altogether?—If it is for a vicious purpose, it matters not whether the sum be high or low; a person that goes to a pawnbroker to raise money for vicious purposes, will just take as much as he can possibly get upon an article according to its value.

1950. And you would not restrict the amount?—If pawnbroking is to be tolerated at all (and I presume that it has now worked itself so much into our social system, that it cannot be put down), I do not see what advantage it would be to restrict the sum.

1951. Would you be prepared to put it down altogether?—I think we could do very well without it; we existed before we had pawnbroking, and we have never been so well since.

1952. Would you put a clause into any law which might be enacted, preventing bed and body linen from being pledged by any party?—You might just as well put down pawnbroking altogether as do that; I think that in the cases of which I have been speaking the greater proportion of the pledges are bed and body clothing.

1953. Do you think that, as regards an article which is for the comfort and the well-being, and perhaps the safety of health of the owner, there should be such facilities for pledging it as are now given?—It would be a very desirable thing that there should not be such facilities; but if poor people are to be allowed to pledge at all, they can only carry such articles as they have to the pawnshop, and they have really nothing else except those sort of articles.

1954. In your opinion would it be any hardship that they should not have the facilities to pledge them?—I do not think it would be any hardship.

1955. You would approve of it then?—In the abstract I would.

1956. Perhaps you fancy that the people are so demoralised in your neighbourhood that they might feel it a hardship in the beginning?—I do not know why a man in my neighbourhood with good wages, should be in a position to have to resort to a pawnshop at all; if he has good wages and can only get a few shillings in hand which is all that is necessary, he does not require to be obliged to any person, and why he should be in this position so that his funds should be forestalled, and that he should go to the pawnbroker to enable him to subsist, or to gratify his desire for drink, is to me perfectly incomprehensible. There is no necessity for it whatever, in my opinion, and I think that he might do a great deal better were he to have no opportunity of pawning and pledging.

1957. Then you think that if the system of pawnbroking were done away with altogether it would elevate the character and condition of the working classes in Scotland?—I think it would, although I am afraid that it is now an impossibility.

1958. Mr. R. Arkwright.] You have stated that a large proportion of the witnesses in certain criminal trials are people connected with pawnbroking; they gave evidence for the prosecution, I suppose, did they not?—Yes, invariably.

1959. Do you not think that that assists in bringing criminals to justice?—I do not think so at all, because the articles are generally found in their possession after the thieves have been apprehended with the pawntickets in their possession, and in that way the pawnbrokers are only produced to identify the thieves.

1960. You stated that most of the pawnbrokers whom you knew, were doing a good business; is it not the case that most of them have a saleshop as well as a pawnbroking establishment?—They have shops generally.

1961. Do you know as a fact that it is from the pawnbroking that they get their income, and not from the shop?—They made money when they were keeping small pawnshops.

1962. But you are not able to say whether the profits came from the pawnbroking establishment or from the sale business?—I think that they could exist perfectly well without the saleshops.

1963. But still you do not know of your own knowledge that those people gain their profits from the pawnbroking part of their establishments?—I do not know minutely, because I never attempted to inquire into the profits of pawnbroking so as to be able to speak to the profits of the trade; but I have formed an idea of the expense of the pawn establishments in my own neighbourhood, and I have taken from the valuation roll the rent of their establishments, and I know the number of people that they employ and the burthens and taxes to which they are subject. I will take one case as an example. A pawnbroker pays a rent of 12 l., he has an assistant at 75 l., he has two boys at 20 l. each; he has taxes, probably 4 l. or 5 l., and 7 l. 10 s. for a license; insurance, stationery, and printing, 12 l., that is altogether 151 l. Now, I cannot conceive that carrying on a business with 40,000 pledges a year should not yield a sufficient livelihood to that man without resorting to a sale shop to eke it out, and I think, in regard to the saleshop, that it is a great inducement to the pawnbroker to conduct his business so as to secure forfeits of the low pledges, particularly those over which he has the entire control. I recollect that in the year 1868, a pawnbroker in Edinburgh published a pamphlet in answer to some statements that were published in the Edinburgh newspapers, I think, by Mr. Thomas Knox, nox, a gentleman well known in Edinburgh, id who takes a great interest in social questions ere, and that pawnbroker admitted that 12 per nt. of all those small pledges were forfeited to the awnbroker. If that be so, he would, probably, ave a difficulty in disposing of those 12 per nt. of forfeited pledges, unless he had a shop; ut at the same time you can easily see that it a great inducement to the pawnbroker to conict his trade so as to have those forfeitures, ith which to furnish his saleshop; whereas, if e two businesses were separated, he would onduct his business solely for the purpose of aking out his income by the interest upon his edges. It would be a legitimate and proper ade for him to lend the money upon a certain te of interest, and he would make sufficient, nder the existing law, to enable him to live, and, live well, by the interest and profits of his siness, without the sale. If sales are conucted so as merely to transfer the forfeited edges, large as well as small, to the pawnoker's saleshop, I can easily see that that stem might be liable to very great abuse. In der to obviate that, I think that it would be tremely desirable that, instead of the pawnokers appointing the auctioneer to conduct those les, the auctioneer should be appointed by the agistrates, as well as that the pawnbrokers ould be licensed. I believe that that is the actice in Ireland. I think that there the auconeer is a party appointed by the magistrates. t all events, if that auctioneer were appointed the magistrates, the public would have confince that he would do justice to the interests oth of the party forfeiting the pledge and to the awnbroker; and if the auctioneer were to keep r 12 months an account of those sales, each ansaction could then be very easily followed; nd if notice were given either by him or by the awnbroker of any surplus, there is little doubt at, if there was a surplus, it would be claimed; hereas I believe that, at present, little or none the surplus funds, if there be any (but I susct they are very small), are claimed at all.

1964. Mr. Montague Guest.] Does the pawnoker keep that surplus himself?—Yes; he is bliged to keep the surplus on the articles forfeited nd sold, under the Act, for three years, and account for it to the pledgers; but at the nd of three years it goes to the pawnbroker nless claimed.

1965. Colonel Beresford.] Are not three days' otice usually given of the sales by auction?—I bserve a very large number of notices of sales one particular Glasgow newspaper.

1966. But they give a certain notice of so any days, do they not?—Yes, before the day of le.

1967. Do you think that the non-attendance the public arises from an impression that if the ublic were to attend they would get no benefit, nd would not buy the things cheaper?—That is y impression.

1968. Have you read the Bill which is now efore the House?—Yes.

1969. Do you know what rate of interest is enerally charged in Scotland?—I believe that, far as possible, the pawnbrokers in Scotland mply with the Act. Of course there are fracons which they cannot very well calculate, and ey may in some cases exceed the sum that they e legally entitled to charge.

1970. Are you aware that in London the rate interest ranges from 20 to 35 per cent.?—Yes, the pawnbroking in London is conducted under the same Act of Parliament, and under the same conditions and terms as pawnbrokers in Scotland.

1971. Your evidence goes to show that a very enormous per-centage of the people who pawn are of the working classes; do you think that they are in a position to pay a higher rate of interest than is already charged?—I do not think they are; I think the rate of interest is amply sufficient to remunerate a pawnbroker who properly conducts his business.

1972. Are you aware that under the present Act 12 months, with three months' grace if notice be given, is the period which must elapse before the pledge can be parted with?—Yes.

1973. Do you think it desirable or otherwise, that the time should be reduced to six months?—I cannot see any advantage to the pledger, at all events in the time being reduced. It might be of great advantage to the pawnbroker, to get the article forfeited, and to get it into his saleshop sooner.

1974. Do you not think that it would be an advantage that they would have to pay the interest half-yearly, which would be probably less inconvenient than running the interest up for 12 months?—The interest is a small matter. When a person pledging an article for a small sum, has the ability to relieve the article a penny or twopence, or threepence interest, will be no obstacle to his relieving the article. If he has not the money to relieve it at all, and it is forfeited, it matters not what the interest is.

1975. In fact, you think that anybody who wanted to redeem an article would redeem it when he required it?—Yes; I think that those who are legitimately transacting with the pawnbroker, that is to say, those who are pledging from necessity and are desirous to preserve the articles they are pledging for the use of themselves and their families, will redeem them as soon as they possibly can; but the wretched class of people who frequent the pawnshops are miserably poor, and they have no help for themselves but to allow their pledges to be forfeited. The number of articles that are forfeited is very large, and the loss to the poor through forfeiture is very great; and I think that it would be much better for those poor people if they had no opportunity of losing their goods in that way through the pawnshops at all.

1976. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You say that the number of goods forfeited, is very large; do you know the proportion?—I stated a short time ago, that a pawnbroker in Edinburgh, himself admitted that of the small pawns 12 per cent. were forfeited.

1977. Do you think that that is a large proportion?—Yes; I think it is a large proportion of the pledges to be lost.

1978. Have you gone into any calculations to enable you to say positively that small pawns are profitable to the pawnbroker?—No, I have never gone into the question of profit to the pawnbroker at all.

1979. Then, is it merely an opinion that you have formed?—I have formed no opinion upon the subject, except that I see that the pawnbrokers flourish, and I see that the business is quite sufficient to maintain them, and to enable them to amass large sums.

1980. What business is principally carried on at Pollockshaws?—Bleaching, dyeing, steam-loom weaving, cotton spinning, pottery and coal mining all in Pollockshaws, and its immediate neighbourhood; so that we have an entirely manufacturing and working population; and that brings to my recollection, a fact which I will take the liberty of mentioning to the Committee, in regard to the poor's rate. It shows how, through some means or other, the population is reduced to a very miserable condition. There are 2,008 householders in Pollockshaws now, our population being a manufacturing population; and out of those 2,008 householders in Pollockshaws not less than 1,101 were last year exempted from payment of the poor rates on account of their poverty.

1981. May not that to, a very great extent, account for their pledging their goods?—No, I think it is just the effect of their pledging; I think that the pledging accounts for the fact of their poverty.

1982. You gave the Committee a terrible account at the commencement of your evidence of the drunkenness and improvidence of the people in your town; is your town an exception to the rule, or may we take that as being the general condition of Scotland?—I am not aware why it should be an exception; there is no speciality in the population except the fact of the excessive pledging and pawning.

1983. Would you take it, that the description which you have given to the Committee of the town of Pollockshaws, would be a description of most of the manufacturing towns, at all events, in Scotland?—I have learnt from other quarters that they have just the same complaint to make of pawnbroking as we have.

1984. Chairman.] Will you inform the Committee how many chargeable poor there are in that district?—I cannot specify the exact number. The number of people in the parish is 11,000.

1985. Is it chiefly out-door relief that is given?—It is almost entirely out-door relief; there is very little in-door relief, and that is applied in very few cases.

1986. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Has not drunkenness very much decreased in Scotland in the last few years?—I am very sorry that my experience of it, judging from the amount of crime, and the number of cases arising out of drunkenness which passes through my hands every day of the year, gives me a very different opinion.

1986*. Then do you doubt those returns which have been put forward?—I speak from my own observation and knowledge.

1987. You say that pawnbroking has very extensively increased; have chapels and schools increased in the same proportion?—Not at all.

1988. Then, while there has been an increase of population, there has not been an increase of schools and chapels in your town?—There has not been in proportion.

1989. Mr. Whitwell.] You stated that you had inquired into the number of pledges taken in March and in May; do you know whether those pledges remained for many days or a month, or have you any knowledge at all upon the subject?—I have no knowledge at all upon the subject.

1990. Are the pledges handed in and put in pawn on one day of the week, and redeemed on another day of the following week?—I suspect that is the case with very few of them.

1991. Then the pledges are necessarily forfeited, are they not?—They are not necessarily forfeited. I am disposed to think that the average struck by these Edinburgh pawnbrokers of 12 per cent. on the whole of those small pledges is the fair average.

1992. Can you inform the Committee how many of those 90,000 pledges are redeemed?—I cannot tell.

1993. You stated to the Committee that crime has increased 150 per cent.; that the expenditure upon the poor has increased 1,000 per cent.; and you have come to tell the Committee that the cause of all this is the establishment of two pawn shops, is that so?—No; I have stated very distinctly that there are several other causes for that increase as well as the two pawn shops; but I look upon the two pawn shops as the great cause of the increase, and I have so stated.

1994. How are the wages to the manufacturing population paid?—Mostly weekly and fortnightly.

1995. Are the colliers paid fortnightly or monthly?—I am not quite sure about the colliers; very probably they are paid monthly.

1996. You have stated to the Committee, have you not, that the population was a well-employed population at large wages?—Generally speaking the whole population are well employed at large wages.

1997. Then how do you account for all the poverty of which you have told the Committee?—I have been endeavouring to account for it. The whole scope of my evidence has been accounting for it.

1998. Will the poor relief be given to persons who are well employed at large wages?—In Scotland we do not give any relief at all to people unless they are in indigent circumstances, or are quite unable to support themselves.

1999. Then do they refuse to work?—They do not refuse to work, but whether they work or not we do not give them any relief in Scotland if they are able-bodied.

2000. Then what entitles them to receive relief?—Their being "indigent and impotent persons;" to use an expression in Scotch law.

2001. Then that is not the class of persons who are caused by the pawn shops to require relief?—I have told you that the inspector of the poor has stated to me (and he is quite willing to come here to prove that statement by his evidence), that in four out of five cases of application of persons in Pollockshaws and the vicinity, to be put upon the permanent poor roll, they have been reduced to the position of paupers, by improvidence and intemperance through connection with the pawn shops.

2002. Chairman.] May we presume that they have got rid of all their property before they came to the parish?—Yes; every particle of it.

2003. Mr. Whitwell.] Then after all, the cause of all this distress and crime is intemperance, but you think that the pawnshops afford facilities for indulging in that intemperance?—Yes; and it arises from the general habits of improvidence of the people.

2004. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you know the two pawnbrokers in your town well?—Yes.

2005. Are they respectable, honest, and decent people?—Yes; they are men who have risen by close attention to their business, to the very good position that they occupy as pawnbrokers; they are as respectable as men in their position can be.

2006. Chairman.] You have spoken of the great number of pawnings that take place in this neighbourhood; do you think that many of the pawn pawns come from beyond the district?—I do not think so; some must come, and many must go; I think that they both come and go. There is a matter which I have suggested for inquiry, and which I have brought under the notice of Government, that pawn tickets ought to pay a duty, that they ought to be stamped; I think that a stamp of one halfpenny upon the 278 millions of pledges in a year, would produce a sum of nearly a quarter of a million, which might be very well applied to remedying the evils caused by pawnbroking; now, I find that the pawnbrokers are very anxious to have an additional burden put upon the pledgers for pawn tickets; the pawnbrokers say that the pledgers do not pay enough for pawn tickets, and that they can afford to pay more; I would be of the same opinion; I would like another halfpenny to be put upon the pledges too, but I would have that halfpenny put upon the ticket in the shape of a stamp, which would yield a large revenue to the Government, and be no hardship to the pledger, because I hold that nearly the whole of the funds that they get from the pawnbrokers, go for improper purposes. It would be a very small contribution by the pawnbroker in the case of forfeited pledges out of their receipts to Government, and that stamp would be one means, although a small means probably, of discouraging pawnbroking to some extent, while it would yield a very large revenue to the Government, which might be applied to very many beneficial purposes, either police purposes, or for education.

Mr. Archibald McKay, called in; and Examined.

2007. Chairman.] Are you a Pawnbroker at Glasgow?—Yes.

2008. Have you been long in business?—I have been a manager and employer for 26 years.

2009. Are you connected with any local association of pawnbrokers?—I am secretary to the Glasgow Pawnbrokers' Association.

2010. Have you made yourself acquainted, generally, with the business of the pawnbrokers in Glasgow?—I think so.

2011. Can you tell us what is about the amount of capital which is lent yearly in pledges?—I take it to be in money 1,392,000 l.

2012. How many pledges are made annually?—I take it to be 6,960,000.

2013. What would that give as an average on each pledge?—I average them at 4 s.

2014. Can you give us now the experience of your own shop; what is your capital?—The amount of capital lent on pledges is 3,500 l. The amount of total capital in my business is 4,482 l.

2015. How many pledges do you take in in the course of the year?—The number of pledges is 53,884.

2016. What is the amount of loans on those pledges?—£. 8,372.

2017. What would that give as an average for each pledge?—In my individual case it is 3 s. 1 d.

2018. What do you make out to be the whole cost of carrying on your business?—The cost of each pledge for carrying on the business is $1\frac{1}{8}\frac{1}{6}$ d. But there is nothing charged in that for my own labour, and for the labour of my two sons who assist me in the business.

2019. Then what is the amount of interest in the year?—The gross amount is 613 l. 13 s. $6\frac{1}{2}$ d. including everything from every source.

2021. After deducting five per cent. interest upon your capital, what is the net profit?—After deducting five per cent. interest upon the capital, I have left 162 l. 9 s. 4 d.

2022. That would be how much per cent. upon the capital?—Leaving five per cent. for capital, there is 1·9 per cent. on the turn over.

2023. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Why do you divide the capital between the profit and the turn-over?—It is to show the amount as divided between the two. It shows a gross profit over all of 13·6 per cent. on the capital.

2024. Chairman.] You put it on the assumption that you borrow the capital wholesale at five per cent., and that the operation of retailing gives you a profit of 162 l. 9 s. 4 d.; is that the assumption?—Yes; I may say that I surrendered a sum equal to my lease in the way of selling property to a railway company. I am out of the money, and consequently I consider that I am entitled to a per-centage for it.

2025. Your rent, if you had not the money invested in the house, would be so much greater, I presume?—Clearly so.

2026. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] But you have not that money in your business, have you?—I have not, for the simple reason that I have surrendered it.

2027. Is your accumulated interest upon your pledges put in as capital?—That is put in as capital; I should receive that amount if I were winding up my business.

2028. Still it is not really capital; it is anticipated profit, is it not?—It is anticipated profit. I consider I have a right to put it in as such.

2029. Is not the capital in the business that which you have free to turn over?—I may be in error, but I consider that I was perfectly entitled to put in this item.

2030. Chairman.] Can you tell us whether the goods pledged with you are generally redeemed, or whether they are forfeited?—I may state that, as nearly as is practicable, I average them at about $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. unredeemed.

2031. Do you make a profit on the unredeemed goods?—For the last four years I certainly made a loss, but for the last year I consider that the one set off the other as nearly as possible.

2032. Do you sell by auction your goods which are unredeemed?—I do.

2033. The whole of them, or only those over 10 s.?—I sell all by auction with the exception of perhaps an individual article which is asked for by the pledger.

2034. Are the unredeemed pledges sold by an auctioneer?—Yes, both under and above.

2035. How did it happen that you did not lose in the last year as compared with other years?—The one just about brought round the other. There is neither loss or profit upon the last year, it just about fairly balances.

2036. Mr. Hambro.] Did you buy a lot of those things and take them home and sell them for more money than you bought them for?—Never, it is not my practice to do so.

2037. Chairman.] Do you find that many persons come to you and ask if their goods sold for more than was lent upon them?—I have only had two applications during 20 years, and in one case when the party called for an explanation as to overplus, in showing him the result of the sale it happened to be a 12 s. pledge, and 12 s. 6 d. was realised at the sale of it; the sale expenses amounted to something like 3 s., or thereabouts, which they would have had to pay me, and the moment I said that they left the premises, and I never heard of them more; they ought to have paid me that amount, I having lost that upon the transaction.

2038. Mr. Montague Guest.] Must it not have shown a great want of judgment on your part to have lent so much money upon the article?—I think that it will rather go to show that we are rather generous on our loans, unfortunately too often.

2040. In what way?—I consider that it would be a mutual advantage. In the first place mine would probably average 7½, it might be rather over the English proportion, and the reason is, that we are very subject, in the way in which we sell our goods by public auction, to their being bought under value and re-pledged with the pawnbroker, and consequently they must become forfeitures. Those pledges are never redeemed, for there is as much got for them as was paid for them, and the consequence is that they are left on our hands by the re-sale; I think that the state of matters would be very much improved if the time were shortened; I think again that it would give a decided advantage to the pledgers, inasmuch as they could very often pay six months' interest if the time were reduced to six months, whereas they could not pay 12 months' interest. It would, in my notion of the thing, be a very great inducement to run the risk; the goods would be very much fresher, and with regard to wearing apparel they would be more in fashion. As a rule I find when they leave them for 12 months, that interest and fashion together, are matters of consideration, and they will not lift them.

2041. Can you state how far goods not redeemed at the end of six months are generally abandoned altogether by the pledger?—Very often that is the case.

2042. Are there many goods redeemed after six months?—I think as near as my own knowledge goes, there will not be more than 15 per cent. remaining after the six months.

2044. Do you know whether it is the practice generally of the pawnbrokers in Glasgow to buy in their pledges at the sale by auction or to let them go to the general public?—Unless it be in some very rare case indeed where the article is not by any means bringing the value, it may be bought in, but not as a rule. The sales are very largely attended by those brokers who have been spoken of as dealing in second-hand pledges. As a rule, there are no shops attached to our pawning places; I do not think that you will find six out of the 116 pawnbrokers in Glasgow, who are exclusively sellers of pawnbrokers' goods bought at those public auctions.

2045. Do you mean that pawnbrokers in Scotland do not sell second-hand goods at all?—Not as a rule.

2046. Do they sell goods of any sort?—There may be an exception; I do not think that there can be more than six out of 116.

2047. The pawnbrokers confine themselves exclusively to pledging?—Yes, I do so myself in the place I speak of.

2048. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You have no retail shops at all?—No retail shop.

2049. Chairman.] Do you know whether the brokers of whom you have spoken, transact much business in buying second-hand things of small value?—As to that, I have no knowledge; that does not come under my observation.

2050. Have you much intercourse with the police in the execution of your business?—I think I have more than any pawnbroker in Glasgow.

2051. What is the general character of that intercourse; do the police come to you for the purpose of knowing whether the goods are pledged?—They do. I may state that we are the principal main-spring of the detection of goods that are in the hands of pawnbrokers; it is done by the information which we give to the police that such-and-such articles have been offered, and by delivering over to them both the goods and the party offering them.

2052. Is it your own practice, and that of other pawnbrokers to make much inquiry upon the tender of goods?—Generally it is.

2053. Upon what principle do you proceed in making inquiries?—It has been already shown to you to-day that notices come round. Whenever we get those notices in the morning we post them into a book. We have a book for the special purpose, and we do it alphabetically and numerically, so that we can at once trace them. If a customer comes in, and it is a party whom we know, we know where to find him if anything is wrong, but if we have reasonable ground for suspicion, and the person is a stranger, we refer to the book which I have mentioned, and, if we find that the article offered is described there, we do not give any intimation to the party, but we should detain him while we sent for an officer. If goods come in for which we have no report, but merely a suspicion in the mind that there is something wrong, we do the same with them.

2055. But I suppose that you get to know parties who repeat their pledges constantly?—By-and-bye if we should discover the proper name, we would not have any but their proper names; but there is a delicacy on the part of the pledgers which causes them to assume a fictitious name.

2056. Then, do people who pledge repeatedly still adhere to their pledging names?—They do, unless we have discovered to the contrary, and endeavoured to correct it. Still, they would prefer the other for privacy, so that their neighbours should not know.

2058. Has it been brought to your notice that he men complain of the women pledging the hings?—I never had an instance of it.

2060. Do you find that when the women ledge they redeem also, or do the husbands come o redeem?—Both of them. It is quite a com-non practice for the husband to redeem on the Saturday evening.

2061. Has there been a great increase in the usiness of pledging in Glasgow within recent imes?—There has been a considerable increase. may state, as a reason, that the population has ncreased to a very considerable extent, and that he passing of what was called the Halfpenny Act, which was passed, as I understand, by the Government for the purpose of getting rid of hose little pawnshops, and inducing the large awnbrokers to undertake those small pledges, as had this effect: that it cut off, to a large xtent, those small pawn shops, which were bliged to take out large licenses.

2063. On what terms did they do business?—bout 30 years ago the rate was 1 d. per 1 s. for week. It came down until, at the time the Act as passed, it was a halfpenny for 1 s. for a week; r 2 s. it was a penny; and for a month it was d. for 1 s.

2065. Is it your opinion, that previous to the Halfpenny Act being passed, there was a large usiness done in Glasgow with those irregular ealers?—Very large; I have known some of hose men make more money in a twelvemonth han a pawnbroker would make in five years, in roportion to the capital employed.

2067. Did they make a formal bargain to buy he goods with an understanding that they were o give them back?—The distinct understanding n purchasing the goods was, that they should be re-sold in one month. They were not bound by ny law whatever, but there was a sort of tacit nderstanding between the two, that the dealer hould keep the article for a month for the ledger; but that if he should take it into his ead to sell it previously to the expiration of the onth, there was no fault.

2069. But it was in the nature of a purchase f the goods, was it not?—No; it was given in he way of a loan, but it was understood that the oods should not be sold under a month.

2070. But how could that be a legal transac-ion?—I do not say that it was a legal transaction. t was a transaction, but there was nothing to ind the party; there was no ticket issued.

2071. But still the Act itself, as you are probably aware, states that the practice was to purchase the goods?—At the time I speak of, before the passing of the Halfpenny Act, there was no Act regulating those matters at all.

2072. But I am speaking of the Act to suppress those irregular transactions; are you not aware that that Act recites that it was the practice to purchase goods with an understanding that they should be given back again?—Yes.

2073. Was that the nature of the transaction in Glasgow?—Yes; it was the nature of the transaction.

2074. The man with whom the goods were deposited, might sell them, or he might do what he liked with the goods legally, but there was a sort of understanding that he should keep them a certain time; was that so?—Quite so.

2075. Then the effect of preventing small pledges by not allowing you to make a reasonable charge for them, was to drive the poor people into selling their goods when they wanted money, was it not?—Clearly.

2076. Since you have been allowed to charge a better rate, instead of selling their goods, they pledge them, I presume?—I may state that so far as my own knowledge goes, since the passing of the Halfpenny Act, the number of pledges with the pawnbrokers has been very greatly increased; but I may also state, that the booking expenses have increased with them. The pawnbroker could do with a lesser number of hands, and his pledges paid him very much better, previous to that than they have done since. Although the Halfpenny Act appeared to benefit the pawnbroker, it was only in appearance, The cast of working those small pledges of 2 s. 6 d. and under, exceeds anything which can be got for them, unless they lie for a length of time.

2077. What is the inducement now to a pawnbroker to transact business if he does not make a profit by it?—The answer is simply this: that if you will not take that pledge from a customer he passes your door, and goes to another who will take it; and when he takes that, the customer will go to him with a larger parcel, which would pay you if you got it; that is the real and tangible reason which I can give for taking those pledges; that is my own experience; if I were confined to that small class of pledges I would shut up shop; supposing that I got for 6 d. the same amount that I get for 2 s. 6 d., I might shut up shop, because I should be working at a loss.

2078. What rate would remunerate you for small pledges?—I get one halfpenny for 2 s. 6 d., and one halfpenny for the ticket, which is 1 d., while it costs me, not including my own service or that of my boys, 186 l. to work it. I have been met by the argument before I left Glasgow by some who I understood were to make an appearance here, and who I believe have done so, that they did not think that I was telling the truth with regard to that; I put figures before him, and I said, "Name any amount of pledges that I have taken in at 2 s. 6 d., or under it, and I will give you credit for it." In the statement which I have handed to the Committee I give credit for all those 6 d. articles; it was endeavoured to be shown that it was 200 per cent. that I received for them, but I show, as I said, that it has cost me $1\frac{1}{86}$ d. to take even that 6 d. article, so that I give them the full benefit of that statement.

2079. Then what rate of remuneration for small pledges would be sufficient?—I think that if we had the Irish rate of interest it would suffice.

27 June 1870.

2080. That is if the minimum charge was 1½ d. for the smallest pledge?—I think so.

2081. Have you been called upon to return many goods to parties as stolen goods, or as goods dishonestly obtained, which had been pledged with you?—£. 3. 19 s., I think, represents the loss from that cause during the 12 months in Glasgow in that business, which I have laid before you; and I have this to complain of, that while they were alleged to be stolen, I do not believe that they were, and I will give my reasons for it. It is the system, according to the Glasgow Act, that if a man or woman comes and alleges to the police that they have lost an article, they lift the article from the pawnbroker who is alleged to have it, or they go round the pawnbrokers and search for it; having uplifted it, I am safe to say, that in three out of every four cases, there is no thief to try. I am served with a notice to attend the court, and show cause why I shall not deliver over the article to the party claiming. I think that is a very hard case; the onus is thrown upon me to prove that this article was not stolen. I can state cases where I know that young men (and I am sorry to say married men) have gone out of a night and lost a watch, and rather than go home to tell the tale how they had lost it, they went to the police office and reported that they had got it picked out of their pocket in the street. I have been under the necessity of sifting out a number of cases, and proving them to have been taken in a brothel, or, as we are in habit of saying, "up a close."

2082. But that would be equally stolen, would it not?—In that case it would be stolen, but they had no thief in this case, and I am obliged to show cause why I should not give the watch to the man claiming. The man has told the tale, but he only said that he had it taken out of his pocket, and unless I have some proof to bring forward, the watch is ordered to be given over to him; and therefore I think there ought to be a witness to corroborate this man's statement. There is one thing of which I take advantage whenever I can, it is this: there is what we call in Scotland a multiplepoinding, and upon the multiplepoinding I bring it before the sheriff, and the sheriff will not decide until the theft is proved satisfactorily to him. I have, in my possession at this moment a watch which lasted five weeks in trial before the sheriff, and the sheriff and the police contending for jurisdiction, I have it at this moment lying in my safe by the sheriff's order.

2083. But in those cases which you mention as a grievance it seems, does it not, that the watch was stolen, though the attendant circumstances were not very clearly stated?—I allege that it may have been given, or that it may have been left for a pledge with the party, and that the party has pledged it to raise the money. This is often the case, because there is a facility given to get goods by the police, and therefore it is resorted to.

2084. Then do you mean that it was not a case of stealing, because the man parted voluntarily with his watch for some reason or other, and then being afraid to own it, he alleged it to be stolen?—Clearly. I can give you a case in point, where it was arranged at New Year's time, which is our festival time, that two neighbours should have a tea party. One lady instructed another to go into her house and she would simply leave the key in her door and go out. The other went in and carried off a silk dress, and she went to the pawnbrokers with it. The pawnbroker had some suspicion that the thing was not correct, from her statement in answer to a question which is invariably asked if they are strangers, "Are these your goods? where do you live? what is your name?" and if there is anything to excite suspicion, of course more is asked. The woman gave her statement, and the pawnbroker was not satisfied with it, and he sent for a police officer and took her to the police office. While they were at the police office, the party who had arranged the matter, came in to state the loss she had met with. The other party seeing her at the bar making the statement, burst out upon her, and accused her of having done this thing. That is another method of doing it, and those facilities are given through this police operation.

2085. Then you do not recognise the propriety of the police arrangements in Glasgow as to pawnbrokers?—For my own part, I should have no great objection to the police arrangements, if we had a different system of disposing of the goods. Where there is a clear case of theft, I have nothing to say; but where it is a disputed thing, I would like another arrangement.

2086. You object to orders being made to restore the goods, unless the party accused is prosecuted to conviction?—Clearly, or unless there is sufficient proof.

2087. Do the local regulations work well in other respects?—Yes; unless advantage is taken of the privilege given to make other uses of it. The Committee had an instance given the other day of a use being made of the privilege given to the police which was clearly never intended. I have known cases of policemen doing it to obtain information for private individuals.

2088. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] What was the case to which you alluded just now?—The case to which I have referred was that of a policeman whose son actually steals a saw. He did not want that it should be known that it was his son that did it, and he went to another policeman and he said, "Go up and examine the book and see if it is there, and if it is there turn it out. I think it is there, or at least the boy at least tell me so." The other policeman comes to me and says, "That saw I know was stolen, and I am instructed to get it." I said, "You cannot get it, if it is to be got I will give it over to the police in the proper way, but not to you;" and my reason for acting on that plan is, that there are certain men set apart for that duty in Glasgow and no other policeman has the right to do that unless he is deputed by the lieutenant to do so.

2089. Chairman.] You conceive that the police generally, ought not to have that authority, but that the authority ought to be vested in some one person, is that your view?—Those are rather the exceptions, I think, which I have given you but still I think it would be as well if they were confined to the special thing, that of searching for stolen goods alone, and were not allowed to make any other use of the books.

2091. Are there any alterations of the law that the pawnbrokers in Glasgow particularly desire desire beyond those which you have mentioned?—I should like, for my own part, to see the hours shortened a little. I may state that in Glasgow we have made a rule to close earlier, that is to say, at 10 o'clock on Saturday night all the year round. As a rule we close at 7 o'clock on the other five days of the week, but on Saturday we close at 10 o'clock for the purpose of giving the young men rest. It is rather late, I think, to be carrying on business till 11 o'clock. It is found to work very well to alter it to 10 o'clock. When I first moved in the matter several pawnbrokers found fault with me, but I think that it is a step in the right direction.

2092. Do you think that the law is made to assist you in the arrangement of your business, or to protect the public by closing the shops against pledges being received at night?—I think what was meant by this law was to do away with the risk of receiving stolen property at night; we should like to frustrate that by shortening the hours.

2093. Do you think there is any difference as to the period of the day at which stolen property is offered for pledge?—I do not think so; I think it is offered as readily in the morning as in the evening; there is no particular time of the day that I could fix for it. As a general rule, stolen property does not find its way to a pawnbroker at all; pawnbrokers are the last parties to whom the stolen goods go, if the goods can be at all identified.

2094. Is that on account of the pawnbrokers keeping a register of them, and keeping them for 12 months?—Clearly; and it is not only the duty, but the interest, of the pawnbrokers not to receive stolen property.

2096. The Committee have been informed to-day, that in the majority of cases before the criminal court, pawnbrokers or their assistants, appear as witnesses, how do you explain that?—I think I can explain that; in each pawnbroker's case, there will be probably three pawnbrokers in one case, as against one broker; the broker carries on his business by himself in a shop, and he can attend to it; a pawnbroker has generally from three to four assistants, and the police will take everybody out of the warehouse that is necessary to prove their case; consequently, that multiplies the number of pawnbrokers that appear.

2097. But supposing that you diminished the number of cases in that proportion, there would seem to be a large number of cases in which pawnbrokers appear out of the whole of the criminal cases in Glasgow?—I think that if the number of cases is put against the number of pledges, it does not seem very excessive.

2098. But as regards the number of criminal cases that are prosecuted, would it not seem to be considerable?—I do not see it in that light.

2099. As to the habits of the people who come to make small pledges, to what class do they belong?—They are a very fair class of the community; they are not as I have heard stated here, of the very lowest class.

2100. Are they workmen?—They are workmen, and in receipt of very fair wages.

2101. Then to what do you ascribe this practice of pawning their clothes and other necessaries of life?—My own pawnbroking business is pretty near the locality where the ship-building goes on, and ship-building in Glasgow has been so very prosperous for some time past, that people from this neighbourhood, round about where ship-building has gone on, have come to Glasgow; in coming here, they have incurred very great expense, and never a week goes over my head, but I send, I should say, for from 5*l.* to 10*l.* worth of goods to England, to be brought down to them; this, of course, keeps them down at the beginning, with the expenses which they have incurred in going down; they have been out of employment for a certain time, and they necessarily get into those little difficulties, but the moment they can overcome them and work it off by degrees, that is done; there is a very large class of that kind.

2102 Previously to the particular migration of which you are speaking, to what do you ascribe the tendency of the people of Glasgow to pawn their clothes?—There are a large class of fish dealers and fruit dealers in Glasgow, and this will account to a certain extent for the fearful number of blankets pledged, of which the Committee have heard. A party has, perhaps, nothing else but a pair of blankets, and he or she will raise so much money, say, 5 s. on those blankets, in order to purchase fruit or fish. In many cases they will return to me in the evening, and if I put the question, as I have repeatedly done, to them, "Now, how much have you made in the day on the transaction?" they have said that they have cleared from 2 s. to 2 s. 6 d. on the day's transaction, while but for those blankets they could not have done it, and consequently they would have placed themselves in a worse position.

2103. You are describing a class which is very much of the artisan class as being interested in small pawning, are you not?—Yes. Then I have the bootmakers and shoemakers, who get orders for, say, a dozen pairs of boots and shoes. They have probably only such an amount of money as will purchase one-half of the material. They purchase that, and having got this material, with the cost of the workmanship and the material, they probably realise two-thirds of the whole from me, and then they finish the dozen pairs, and they go to market with them on the Saturday, and derive their profit in that way.

2104. To what extent do you think that the classes who pawn, pawn for the sake of dissipation or mere improvident expenditure?—It is undeniable that that is the case here and there, but these cases only come before the magistrates, and those who have been speaking of them. Such cases are by no means the rule.

2105. What proportion do you think the cases of persons pawning goods to gratify their taste for sinfulness and other depraved habits would bear to the rest of the community?—I do not think I could give you more than one in a hundred who pawn for the sake of drink.

2106. What do you think is the proportion who pawn generally through improvidence; that is to say, for holiday making and mere idleness?—I would not attempt to say that because I do not believe in it. It occurs only to a very limited extent.

2107. Is it your opinion that the chief business of small pawning is for the purpose of meeting the reasonable requirements of the working classes, classes; the humbler classes of society?—It is indeed; and that class of pledges generally takes place on the Friday or Saturday, for the reason that the week's amount for sustenance is nearly gone, unless so far as enough is left to carry them over to the following day.

2108. Would it not seem to indicate rather fast living if a man has spent his wages by Thursday, when they are intended to last till Saturday?—We all know that it takes nearly all a man has to keep him going, and if he needs an extra pair of shoes, or anything of that kind, it must be had.

2111. But this enormous number of small pledges is hardly accounted for by the causes that you have given to the Committee; out of the 6,900,000 pledges, how many do you suppose are under 2 s. 6 d.?—I may state that that is an approximate statement which I have given to the Committee; there are 116 pawnbrokers in Glasgow, and I may assume that that is correct information, as I take that from the Excise books.

2112. But of the 6,900,000 pledges, how many do you suppose are under 2 s. 6 d.?—I could scarcely give you an answer to that question; in my own case, I think there might be about one-tenth under 2 s. 6 d.; but I know cases where there are not 100 pledges under 2 s. 6 d. in the whole year. There are certain offices that do a larger kind of business; it depends very much upon the locality.

2113. Then, looking to the fact that your average loan is only 3 s. 1 d., you must have a very considerable number between 2 s. 6 d. and 5 s., I presume?—I have a good number that are about 3 s. and 4 s.; but I have not made those calculations, and I cannot give you them very correctly.

2114. Then do you think that the reasons which you have given for pledging, would sufficiently account for the very large number of small pledges which are made in Glasgow?—I think so.

2115. Is there a large number of pledges which are made for the purpose of gratifying the propensity for drinking?—I do not think so.

2116. Mr. Montague Guest.] I think you stated that you carried on no sale business at all?—I do not.

2117. You carry on no business, except the pawnbroking business then?—I have not what they call a private sale business, other than the sale by public auction; I only carry on one business, which is the pawnbroking business.

2118. Then I think you stated that the cost of working the small pledges in that business exceeded anything that you got for them?—Yes; if you confine them to 2 s. 6*d.*

2119. You stated also, did you not, that your business was one of the principal channels through which stolen things were found by the police in Glasgow?—Yes; I consider that we aid the police very much in that matter.

2120. You have put down no losses for that, have you?—I have lost 3 l. 19 s. I think, upon the last 12 months. It is all included in the business expenses.

2121. You lent upon that saw, which you have mentioned, did you not?—Yes; that was a considerable time ago.

2122. And you lost upon the saw?—I did not lose on that transaction, for this reason: that when it was inquired into, the officer was made to pay for it.

2123. As a rule, how much do you lose by the goods which you have to return to the police?—During the last 12 months, I have lost 3 l. 19 s. in that way.

2124. I do not see exactly where you make your profit out of the trade?—Out of the interest and ticket fees. It is the pledges above the smaller amounts that make the profit, if they are left. In the first transaction, they pay nothing, but if they are allowed to lie with me they pay.

2125. Chairman.] If a small pledge is deposited with you for a month only, do you gain by it?—No; in the second and third months, they begin to pay, as you will find if you divide by the number of pledges taken.

2126. Mr. Montague Guest.] Do you have a regular sale of your pledges over 10 s.?—Yes; and under 10 s.

2127. You carry out the Act in that respect?—Yes, regularly.

2128. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Do you include the loss which you sustain by the sales in the business expenses?—No. It was about 15 per cent.; but this last year things are improving, and the one has just balanced the other. Therefore, I sustained no loss upon that occasion.

2129. What is the lowest amount of pledge that pays?—The half-crown pledges begin to pay after lying two months. That all relates to the first transaction.

2130. Will not a half-crown pledge pay under two months?—It will not pay at the rate allowed for it just now. It is the frequency of the transaction which creates the expenses by rendering it necessary to keep up a staff to work it.

2131. You stated, did you not, that you thought that the shortening of the time for forfeiture, if it were carried out, would be in favour of the person pawning?—It would be much easier, I think.

2132. But if he has the money at the end of the six months, he can come and redeem the things then, can he not, and he need not wait the twelve months?—Clearly; we do not desire that he should wait the twelve months.

2133. But he has that power now, has he not?—He has that power now, but it is depriving him of that power that forces him to do it. In the case of a 2 s. 6 d. pledge, for instance, the pledger may have 3 d. when he has not 6 d., and if it goes on to the year's end for 6 d., with a depreciation of the goods in pledge, he will not care about lifting them.

2134. But is he obliged to wait until the end of the year?—No. But there are a great many things which we will do if we must do them. The goods are of more value to the pledger if he will lift them at the end of six months, and they would be of more value to the pawnbroker.

2135. You think that, not being obliged to come to redeem the pledge, he does not redeem it?—Clearly. He knows that the law gives him that power.

2136. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] The pawnbrokers in Glasgow are under a local Act, the Police Act, are they not?—Yes.

2137. Has not every constable, or police officer, the power of inspecting your premises?—No.

2138. Are you acquainted with the Act?—Yes.

2139. Is not that the case?—It is not; there are officers set apart for that duty by the chief constable in Glasgow, and no other officer is allowed to inspect the premises, and even that is not the law; it is a detective officer's duty, but the detective officer can only come into my box and see my books, and he dare not come into my warehouse; that is another proceeding altogether, and he requires a search warrant for that purpose.

2140. You record everything that is pledged in your book, and he sees by that book whether the article of which he is in pursuit is there, does he not?—Yes; and advantage accrues to the public from that; the officer set apart for that duty understands the thing so thoroughly that he knows how to examine the book when a stranger does not.

2141. Are you very careful as to the property offered to you, in endeavouring to ascertain whether it is stolen or not?—I have made it a special duty.

2142. I suppose that you are more careful in doing so because of the power which the Glasgow police have?—I am very careful, and I believe every pawnbroker in Glasgow is careful, knowing the risk which he runs, the books being patent during 12 months to anybody who comes to examine them with an authority.

2144. Do you think that it checks stolen property being pledged?—I believe so.

2145. You seem to think that it is a very great hardship that a watch which is stolen by a woman under peculiar circumstances, and pledged with you, should be treated as stolen property, is not that your view?—I do not think it is a hardship if it is stolen, but I want to know that it is stolen.

2146. Had you any evidence in the case of which you have spoken of the watch being parted with voluntarily?—I had in that particular case no evidence, but the man had none to produce beyond his own statement, which would not satisfy the sheriff.

2148. Do you know it of your own knowledge?—Yes, I know it of my own knowledge; and the reason why I give you the information in that way is that I defend all cases for our association where it can be shown to me that there is very good ground for it; if any fault can be found with the pawnbroker, I send him about his business at once, and have nothing to do with his case.

2149. Have you a great many stolen watches pledged with you under those circumstances?—The parties offering them to me must be in ignorance of how to dispose of them altogether, for a thief will know that the watch is liable to be picked up in a moment from a pawn office.

2150. How does the receiver of stolen property dispose of such property?—By immediately getting hold of it, and, if it is a watch, disconnecting the plate of it, and sending it off from the place altogether to be altered.

2151. Where does he send it to?—I could not tell you where they send them to, but they know where to send them to.

2152. I suppose they send them out of Glasgow?—They do; cases have been known of their being altered by men in Glasgow of that class; but no respectable man in the trade would do it.

2153. Is there a special trade of re-setters?—Clearly.

2155. In those other towns may such stolen property be pledged?—Not pledged; it would go from Glasgow to Liverpool, and vice versâ.

2158. Are they sent every week?—I will not say that they are sent every week; but I think that probably they may be gathered up for a week and then sent; or any special case is sent down; I think it is a general thing. I may state that I find in our police notices that it is included from beyond bounds, so that that shows that it is included in our notices and sent to us.

2160. You think that the pawnbrokers conduct their business so straightforwardly?—I am positive of it; for I may state that I, as an individual, together with the association, would prosecute a man if he were found doing such a thing as is suggested.

2161. But do you not think that it is possible that if you had a black sheep in the trade he might do it?—I cannot speak as to what a black sheep might do; I am speaking of the honest men of the trade.

pledging a portion of his winter stock in the summer time, and vice versâ, might get a temporary loan to enable him to go and purchase a certain thing that he needed in his trade, whereas if he went and bought that thing on credit, he would have to pay a much larger amount than he has to pay to us.

2163. Have you much of that kind of business?—I have repeatedly had a considerable quantity of it.

2164. And still, notwithstanding that, you have not 10 per cent. of your trade below 2 s. 6 d., and that your average is 3 s. 1 d.; you have a considerable trade in advancing money upon traders' stock?—The statement which the Committee have before them confines itself to this last year. The statement which I give now goes beyond that; I could not point you to any transactions of this kind within the last year, but I know it is the case in other pawn offices.

2165. You have told us an interesting story about costermongers who are in the habit of getting 5 s. for a day, and who come in with a profit of 2 s. or 2 s. 6 d., what do you charge for that 5 s. for that one day?—One penny; that is the rule.

2166. What per-centage is that in a year?—In the year, in the working of the transaction, as I have already shown, that is included in the same category as the 6 d. parcel.

2167. Does it not amount to 30 s. 5 d. in the year?—Yes; but if you will suppose that there was one pledge taken in every day of the year, that transaction costs me a penny to take it.

2168. I am not speaking of the profit to you, but of the effect it has upon the person borrowing; do you think it is a healthy state of matters that people borrow money to carry on their business at an interest of 700 per cent.?—It clearly is, if they can make such a large amount as I have shown to you on a particular day.

2169. Would it not be much better that those poor women, by a little frugality and temperate conduct, should earn a capital of 5 s., rather than trust to this false system?—I am sure I should have no objection to it.

2170. You seem to do business with a very respectable class of people, who do not use the money that you give them for drink at all; is that so?—So far as my own knowledge goes, that is so.

2171. I suppose that you have good reason to bewail the intemperate habits of the lower portion of the working classes of Scotland?—That there is intemperance in Scotland is undeniable; but I should be ashamed to make the statements which I have heard made here with regard to the intemperance of Scotland.

2172. You would rather like to uphold the character of your countrymen, I suppose?—I would not like to give it any false colouring.

2172*. But, notwithstanding the fact that the habits of the lower classes of Scotland are rather dissipated, you have the good fortune to deal with people whose habits are not so?—If a party offered me a pledge, the money for which I knew would be spent in drink, I would put him out of the house at once, and say, "I will have nothing to do with you."

2173. Instead of agreeing with the evidence which we have before us, you rather look upon your trade as of an elevating nature?—I would not like to have it so fearfully depressed as I have heard. I would like to have some charity in the matter.

2173*. Do you think that your business is of that description that it tends to improve the people who deal with you?—I can remember people who dealt with me a number of years ago, but who do not require to do so now at all. I do not know from what cause.

2177. If you could lay aside your position as a pawnbroker, and speak now as a member of society, do you think that that is a state of matters which really tends to the healthy existence of the people who so conduct their business?—I do think that it materially helps them on in the world to render them temporary assistance.

2178. Do you seriously think that that is a good system?—I do, indeed.

2179. You seem to think that business at half-a-crown is really an unprofitable part of the business if it only be continued for one month?—Very.

2180. What is the per-centage of all your pledges which are redeemed within one month?—With regard to the per-centage redeemed within one month, or sooner, I have not made up any statement.

2181. Is it not a fact that most of your articles are redeemed within one week?—It is not.

2183. Have you prepared statistics of your business for one week, two weeks, three weeks, and four weeks?—I have not.

2184. Is not a very large per-centage of your business redeemed within a month?—Yes.

2185. Seeing that this business is so unprofitable, instead of raising the rate upon those poor people, would you have any objection that the law should so provide that nothing should be pledged upon which a less sum than 2 s. 6 d. should be advanced?—For my own part I should have no objection; but I think it would be a hardship on the poor people to say that because they could not bring anything for a loan above that amount they should be deprived of a loan altogether. I think that would be driving them either to the poorhouse or to theft.

2186. Then is it in the interest of the poor people that you carry on your business?—No, I do not profess such a thing.

2187. Colonel Beresford.] I do not understand how you make out that it would be an advantage to the people who pledge, to have the time limited six months; there is nothing to prevent a rson redeeming a pledge in six months, or at y period before the 12 months expires, is ere?—Certainly not.

2189. You spoke, did you not, about a different stem which went on previously to the estabhment of pawnbrokers' shops, where money is borrowed for a month, and then the person ho lent the money had the right to sell out and it, and to take whatever he got?—Clearly.

2190. You say that now a great deal less ofit is obtained in the trade than heretofore; to hat is that owing?—It is owing to the increase the staff required to work those very low edges.

2192. I presume that a very large per-centage the tickets will come under that category, will ey not?—Yes.

2193. Do you yourself advocate the Irish rate, hich would be three halfpence a ticket?—I ink it would be advantageous; and I think that giving a little more remuneration to the pawnoker, you make the thing respectable, and you ithdraw from him the temptation of resorting to ything to increase his profits other than his gitimate trade.

2194. That would increase your income from e tickets, from 136 l. to very nearly the whole m which you got for interest, would it not?—would not make any difference upon the cket, but it would in the interest; I do not ask y advance upon the ticket; it is bringing in e florin where the difference comes in.

2195. Mr. Plimsoll.] It has been assumed by me (I think, very erroneously), that the money ised by pawning, is all for the most part spent drink. In regard to this, do you suppose that e mere pawning increases a person's income?—Not unless in those special cases which I have iven you of people raising temporary loans to se them in the way of trade,

2198. Supposing that they did not sell them, n that case they would have to keep them, and ey would simply have, instead of the money redeem the pledge, more money to spend in e purposes which they proposed. If we must ssume that pawners, as a class, spend all they aise by pawning in drink, and if drink is bad, hen pawnbrokers are conservators of public orality, because they diminish by the amount f their charges the funds which would be otherise available for spending and drinking; is not hat a logical statement?—I do not agree with hat in the way in which it is put.

2199. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Are you not a magistrate of Glasgow?—Not of Glasgow.

2200. You are a county magistrate, are you not?—Yes.

2201. Do you agree with the witnesses that were examined from Glasgow, that the great majority of the pawnbrokers at Glasgow are respectable, decent men, and that with the exception of three or four, they are a respectable body of men?—I could not name four of whom I would say anything else than that they are respectable, decent men.

2202. Do you know how many pawnbrokers there are in Glasgow?—There are 116.

2204. Are you frequently applied to by parties who have pledged with you for the balance between the amount of their pledge and the amount which you have got on public sale?—During my 26 years of experience that has only occurred twice; and in one of the cases I ought to have got a compensation from the person applying, there being a loss upon the pledge.

2205. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] You stated, did you not, that women generally pledged the articles, and that men redeemed them?—I did not say that that was generally the case, but that at times that was the case.

2206. Do you not think that it is peculiar that women should pledge the articles, and that men should redeem them?—No; I think I gave the reason as being that the men were at their employment, and had often deputed their wives to do so; and, indeed, it is a custom which is perfectly well known between husband and wife.

2207. Do you think that it was not likely that the man did not know that the articles were pledged, and that on coming home on the Saturday night he found his Sunday clothes in pledge and wanted to get them out in order to go to church on the Sunday?—It may be the case, but I am not aware of it.

2208. Are you in favour of freedom of contract?—I am in favour of freedom of contract in regard to bulky articles. For instance, a chest of drawers may be offered to me, and supposing that 1 l. is asked from me upon it, I only get 2 d. for the ticket, and 4 d. interest for the entire month; and I have known a porter to be paid 1 s. for bringing it to the door.

2209. You do not pay that, do you?—No; I have in some cases obliged the party by taking such things in if I have had room, but if I have not room I cannot take them.

2210. But, as a general rule, would you approve of freedom of contract?—Only for bulky articles, such as a chest of drawers or a feather bed.

2211. Is it because of the expense of storage that you would approve of freedom of contract in such cases?—Storage runs away with all that could be got from such pledges.

2212. From the nature of your evidence as to the "wee pawns," before the Halfpenny Act came in, when you stated that the working classes were so much swindled by parties charging whatever they liked, I thought that you were decidedly against freedom of contract?—I have only said that I approve of it for bulky articles; I did not go any further.

2213. Would you state the number of cubic feet which you would put into an Act of Parliament?—I could not attempt to do so.

2214. Mr. Plimsoll.] You would include perishable articles as well as bulky articles, I presume?—Certainly.

2215. Mr. Alderman Carter.] If I understand you correctly, you would have an ordinary rate as you have now, but for all articles which you could not take in the ordinary way you would wish to have power to make special contracts; is that your view?—Yes.

2216. You would not limit that in amount, or according to thebulk of the article, but things not taken in the ordinary way by pawnbrokers you would wish to be able to take by special contract?—Yes.

2217. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Are you obliged to take every article which is proffered to you?—We are not obliged to do so; and I refuse sometimes.

2218. Therefore you do not suffer by the Act as it is?—But it is a very great hardship to both parties.

2219. Would you have any objection to obtain your license from the magistrates of Glasgow, or from the justices of the peace for the county, rather than from the Inland Revenue?—From my own experience as a magistrate, I should be decidedly against it.

2220. Have you been long a magistrate?—I have been for the last three years a bailie, and for about nine months I have been a justice of the peace in the county.

2221. A justice of the peace ex officio?—A justice of the peace ex officio for the last three years, and a county magistrate since the month of July last.

2222. In what county?—In the county of Bute.

2223. Have you no confidence in your brother justices?—No; I really think that the less to be done by that class of magistrates, as regards licensing publicans and the like, the better; such power should be taken from them; I have no confidence in them.

2224. Do you think that every one should get his license as a pawnbroker by applying to the Inland Revenue, if he pays the duty for it?—Yes; because the police have power over pawnbrokers if they offend against the Act; the only magistrate to whom I would confide in would be the stipendiary magistrate, which I think we ought to have in Glasgow, but would not give the power of granting licenses even to him.

2225. You would not leave it in the hands of the magistrates of Glasgow?—No.

2227. And it is an error to infer that the wife is doing it without the husband's knowledge?—Clearly.

2228. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You have made some reference to special contracts; would you require that in all cases of special contracts the parties should be of age, say, 21 years of age?—Clearly.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

WILLIAM NEILSON HANCOCK, Esq., LL.D., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Hancock. 30 June 1870

2229. WHAT is your vocation?—I am a Barter-at-Law and a Government official in Ireland.

2230. Have you directed your attention to the stem of pawnbroking in Ireland and England? Yes; I had occasion to do so at first in conction with a scientific inquiry many years ago, 1849, and I read a Paper on the subject at the itish Association for the Advancement of ience. In 1866 I was appointed by the Lord eutenant of Ireland to inquire into the pawnking laws in Ireland, and I made a Report n the subject, which has been presented to rliament.

2231. Can you refer the Committee to that port?—It was presented to Parliament in 1868.

2233. Do they remain in force?—They have ver been altered since that time.

2234. What do you consider is the proper ation to be preserved in pawnbroking as gards the general law of the land with refere to the charge for the use of money?—The wnbroking laws originally arose from an exption to the usury laws. At the time when usury laws were fully in force there was an ception made in favour of pawnbrokers. All usury laws have been repealed, and now wnbroking is the only remnant of the usury ws. I can explain that to the Committee in a y simple way by the two Acts of Parliament, Irish and the English Acts. If those Acts l happened to be differently worded the wnbrokers' trade would be perfectly free at s moment. In the 17th section of the 26th o. 3, c. 43, the Irish Pawnbroking Act ets this: "Provided that nothing contained this Act shall extend, or be construed to exd, to any person or persons whomsoever, who ll lend money to any person or persons upon vn or pledge, at the rate of 6 l. sterling per num interest, without taking any further or ater profit for the loan, or forbearance of such ney lent on any pretence whatever." That that time was the lawful rate of interest in land, and if the draftsman had only happened to insert, "shall lend at the lawful rate of interest of money and no further," then when the usury laws were repealed the pawnbroker's trade would have been perfectly free. There is an exactly similar provision in the English Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, s. 30, "that nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any person or persons whomsoever, who shall lend money to any person or persons whomsoever, upon pawn or pledge, at the rate of 5 l. per centum per annum interest, without taking any further or greater profit for the loan or forbearance of such money lent on any pretence whatsoever." Five per cent. was the English lawful rate of interest for money at that time, and if the equivalent words, "shall lend at the lawful rate of interest of money and no further" had happened to have been introduced, when the usury laws were repealed in 1850, the trade would have been perfectly free.

2236. Have you, in the inquiries which you have made, formed any opinion as to the expediency of continuing the restriction or rate of charge upon pawnbroking?—I have formed a very strong opinion that the repeal of the usury laws ought to be made complete, and that the 4th section of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 90, ought to be repealed, which exempts the trade of pawnbrokers; it is the only trade now subject to restriction as to the rate of interest of money.

2237. Then would you have no compulsory rate upon the pawnbroker at all?—No; but whilst I would have no compulsory rate, I would have an implied rate. Just as if money is lent without anything being said about it, there is in law an implied rate of interest, so I would have by Statute an implied remuneration for the pawnbroker if there was no actual contract; but I would would leave them free, just as other people are free, to vary the rate of interest by contract.

2238. You would have a statutory rate with liberty to the parties to make any contract they pleased?—Yes, just as in the case of the ordinary interest of money.

2240. In what way do you think that it would work to their advantage in the end?—I think that the poorer people, on the whole, would get fairer terms, and more money and more convenient arrangements, and that the contracts, if worked out under a perfectly free system, would be better suited to both parties.

2241. Then would you rely upon competition to enable the parties to get the most they could and at the lowest rate of interest?—Yes, certainly.

2242. As if they were selling their commodities instead of pawning them?—Yes.

2243. Mr. Alderman Carter.] In fact, you would have no special rate of interest for pawnbrokers?—I would have an implied rate.

2244. Chairman.] Do you think that it would be necessary to make any further provision by law than to fix an implied rate?—I would have, as regards the time for which the pledge was received, an implied arrangement, subject again to be varied by contract between the parties.

2245. Do you think that the present statutory time works well, or that it would be desirable to alter it?—My inquiries led me to the conclusion that it would be desirable to alter it, and I recommended an alteration in it.

2246. Do you generally adhere to the views expressed by you in your report, or have you seen any reason to modify any of the opinions which you have expressed in that report?—No; I have obtained considerable further information in a private way since, by communicating with parties, and any information which I have had since has confirmed the opinions expressed in that report.

2249. Chairman.] Is there anything which you would wish to add upon the subject of this report?—There is one fact which I might state in corroboration of the views which I put forward in 1850. I recommended the repeal of the usury laws for the benefit of the poorer classes in Ireland. At that time the usury laws were very strict, and there were charitable loan funds started for lending money, and I recommended that the usury laws should be repealed, in the conviction that the result would be that the poor would get money upon easier terms. The usury laws were repealed in 1850; in 1854 there were 115 charitable loan funds, and in 1868, they had diminished to 90; in 1854, the sum lent was 870,000 l.; in 1859 it had increased to 936,000 l.; and in 1868 it had fallen off to 581,000 l.; so that the result of the repeal of the usury laws has been that the necessity of those charitable institutions to lend to the poor has very much diminished. I infer from that, that money is supplied on easier terms by ordinary parties, and therefore that the repeal of the usury laws so far has been beneficial to the poor.

2250. Were those charitable loan fund institutions exempt from the usury laws, and were they regulated by Statute in Ireland?—They were; they were allowed to lend on certain terms different from the usury laws. It was supposed that it was necessary to have those charitable arrangements for the benefit of the poor, and I recommended that instead of having any charitable arrangements, the trade should be set free

2252. Now, having repealed that law, do you think that private persons come into competition and really lend upon easier terms than the charitable societies did?—Yes; and therefore the result has been beneficial to the poor. I would mention one other circumstance which, I think, is corroborative of that. There was a Committee of the House of Commons in 1838, which recommended some regulation of the charges of pawnbrokers in Ireland. They recommended that the rate of charge which they now charge by statute, which is higher than the English rate, should be reduced. They did that upon the evidence of the supposed success of a charitable pawn establishment, called the Mont de Piété, conducted in Limerick, under the patronage of Sir Matthew Barrington. There ultimately came to be eight of those monts de piété in Ireland; and this Committee of the House of Commons recommended that the rate of interest should be reduced to about the scale of the English rate. However, in the result, it turned out that, after the Report was made, those monts de piété all failed so rapidly, that there was only one of them in existence in 1850, and that has long since ceased to exist; so that the grounds upon which the Committee of the House of Commons recommended that the Irish scale should be reduced turned out to be totally mistaken, because the institution was carried on by charitable gentlemen for that object, and at that rate, and it turned out wholly unsuccessful. The conclusion which I draw from that is, that it is unwise for Parliament to attempt to regulate any matter of this kind; and that all that Parliament can do is to prescribe an implied contract between the parties, the only safe guide being really the actual state of affairs.

2254. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Have you any suggestion to offer as to what the implied rate of interest should be?—In Ireland I would recommend that you should start with the implied rate there, and in England at the existing rate as the implied rate, and then after a few years, when free contract had been established, some different rate which had been ascertained by experience to be the usual rate, it might be adopted as the new implied rate; it would be safer to start with the existing rate as the implied rate, and then at the end of a few years, when the new rate een established generally in the trade, you ight take that new rate as the implied rate.

2255. What would be your suggestion as to e implied time during which pledges should be deemable?—In a general way the same course ight be taken; I myself suggested that the ne should be reduced on the notion that Par- iment would go on regulating the matter, but e wisest plan would be to leave the time under e existing law as the implied time, and then at e end of four or five years when new contracts ere made, to a considerable extent it would be ry easily ascertained from what actually had ppened what was the most convenient arrange- nt, and then that might be taken as the im- ied time.

2257. Mr. Whitwell.] Can you inform the ommittee why it was that no change in the law ok place upon your report being presented to e executive?—I believe that it arose from the ct, that a great deal of Irish Legislation has en for the present stopped by the great im- rtance of the Church question of the last ession, and of the land question in this; the ect of those very large questions has been to op all small detailed legislation, because the ne of Parliament, and of everybody connected th the Government, has been so much taken with these large Irish questions.

2259. Do you see any reason why the law ould not be uniform, both in England and eland?—I think it is quite right, that as a strictive law it should be uniform, but as an plied law it might be different; for instance, e ordinary rate of interest in Ireland is 6 per nt., and it is 5 per cent. in England; in back- rd districts, or poorer districts, the implied ntracts may vary; the arrangement which ould cause the least disturbance in the trade in th countries, would be to start the Irish trade an implied contract, and to leave them to vary for themselves, and to start the English trade an implied contract, and not to force equality; en if it was found after some time that the con- acts were established under similar conditions, ere might be a uniform implied contract for the nited Kingdom.

2260. But seeing that if contracts were made ee, the market rate varies so much upon the te of interest actually obtained, is it worth hile making any difference between the English d the Irish trade?—I think it would be less sturbance to the trade to take as the basis in ch case the existing rate.

2261. But are you aware that the English wnbrokers wish to have the Irish rate intro- uced into England?—The English rate is clearly objectionable; if parties carrying on a trade allege that they are prevented from profitably carrying on their trade by a restriction, similar to the policy of the usury laws, they have a right to have that restriction repealed.

2262. Do you not think that the Irish rate is a better one for the pledgers?—The Irish rate suits Ireland, but I think that the best plan is not to prescribe a rate for England.

2263. In your report you recommend that there should be a difference in the time of keeping pledges to this extent, that jewellery should be kept for nine months, and other pledges for six months only; do you retain that opinion?—I was directed to inquire into the matter, and I examined the most skilled persons upon the subject, and I merely formed the best opinion I could upon it; but I think it would be the least disturbance, and the wisest plan for all parties, to start both the existing time and the rate of interest as an implied time and rate, and then to leave it to be gradually modified.

2265. Then, would you make a difference between jewellery and articles of clothing?—I think that the most experienced persons in the trade satisfied me that that was a wise arrangement. It is the one which most generally would be adopted if you left it free.

2266. You went very fully in your report into the question of who should sell the unredeemed pledges; in Ireland there is a person appointed to sell, is there not?—I found in Ireland that the plan of having officials appointed to sell, had wholly broken down; there are only four counties out of the 32 in Ireland wherein the office of appraiser is fully and completely carried out, and there are 11 counties without any appraisers at all; in Dublin the only effect of having officials to sell is, that the office is made a monopoly and a sinecure; there are deputies appointed, and they do not exercise any judgment or discretion in selling; so that I recommended that the system be abolished, and the English system adopted.

2268. Chairman.] You recommend, do you not, "that the pawnbroker should be bound to give notice to the parties desiring it, by registered letter, specifying the day and the place of sale, and that the pawnbroker have power to charge for the cost of the letter"?—I made that recommendation only for the cases where the parties so desired it; there is an enactment in force in Ireland, where pledges are above a certain value, requiring that a notice shall be served in every case at the address given by the parties; the effect of that is to prevent people giving their address, and so the Act of Parliament breaks down. I suggest that a very simple plan would be, that, if the person pledging an article, the pawnbroker should not sell that article without giving notice.

2269. Do you think that it would be worth while to embody in a Statute, that a party pledging goods above a certain value should have power to require from the pawnbroker notice when he was about to sell?—I think it would, if notice at parties own expense, as it would meet a class of cases of persons being forced by distress to pledge articles they had a strong feeling about.

2270. Do you recommend also "that the power of searching pawnbrokers' shops without warrant, now exercised by detectives under general authority from the Commissioners of Police, be confirmed to them by statute"?—Yes. The way in which that question stands is this: in England there is no public prosecutor; in Scotland there is a complete public prosecutor; and in Ireland we have an intermediate system, which is partly under the English law and partly superseded by a special Irish law. The result is, that from the part of English law which prevails in Ireland there cannot be a search without a warrant from the magistrates. Nevertheless, the City of Dublin is under a very efficient Govern ment police, and the police do not wait for a war rant, but they make a contract with the pawn brokers that they shall carry on business beyon the hours prescribed by the law if they will giv the police a right to search. In Scotland th police have a right to search without a warran the police being recognised as public prosecuto If the system of public prosecutors is introduce into England it will follow, as a logical conse quence, that the officers of the public prosecuto will search without a magistrate's warrant.

2271. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I suppose th you understand the two rates charged, the En lish and the Irish rate; do you not think that th Irish rate is much easier to work?—I really d not go into that question. My notion is to leav it free, and the trade will find the rate whic works best for itself.

2272. The trade generally wish for the Iri rate, and I thought you might have consider that question, and might have been prepared give that opinion?—There has been no com plaint in answer to my inquiries of the Irish ra not working satisfactory in Ireland.

Mr Alfred Keeson, called in; and Examined.

2273. Chairman.] Have you directed your attention much to the business and practice of pawnbroking?—In some measure I have done so, but I cannot pretend to answer any questions in reference to the practical details of pawnbroking, as I have never had any experience of the business.

2274. You are the editor of a newspaper, I think, in which articles are written upon the subject of pawnbroking?—I am.

2275. Have you directed your attention to the institutions called "Monts de Piété" in France?—Yes; I have had occasion to do so both through official documents, and from actual observation.

2276. Can you state to the Committee what are the characteristic differences between the system of monts de piété as compared with the English system of pawnbroking?—The mont de piété treats lending upon pawns as a measure of public charity, and seems to repress rather than to encourage it. Perhaps "repress" is too strong a term; but it does not seek business. The private dealer in England regards it as a simple trading operation, and, as such, admitting of every legitimate development. Besides that, I may say that the mont de piété is a monopoly; a charitable one, but still a monopoly; while in England the trade is left free to the enterprise of individuals.

2277. Do you mean that there is a law in France which prevents a private person advancing on small pledges?—Private persons have no right to deal in pledges. The mont de piété in Paris was reorganised in the time of the first Napoleon, and others in different towns of France have been established by the local municipal governments. Pledging is not open to private enterprise; the municipal government makes the necessary regulations.

2278. Do the municipal government undertake the whole of the responsibilities arising from carrying on the business?—No; they only give to a kind of committee, or body of directors, the power of making laws for carrying out the deta of the business. It authorises them to set up mont de piété, but leaves them to organise t details.

2279. Then does the municipality, after it h once sanctioned the establishment of a mont piété, exercise any supervision over it?—I belie it does.

2280. Then the committee is regarded as charitable committee?—It is.

2281. Will you state how the mont de pié carries on its business first as to the mode pledging and redemption?—It carries it on several ways; you may deal either directly wi the central establishment itself, or its two "su cursales" or principal subordinate offices, or y may deal with its licensed agents or commissio naires, or you may deal now of recent years wi what are called bureaux auxiliaires, which t mont de piété has itself opened in Paris. Orig nally, I fancy that there was but one centr establishment, but Paris being a large place, was, of course, very inconvenient to go to t central establishment, and consequently a numb of commissionnaires came into existence. I not think they were ever authorised by the mo de piété itself, but I think they set up on the own account in some way, and became legi mised by length of time and custom.

2282. Then, were they a species of agents? They were a species of agents, and they receiv pledges from the public, and conveyed them the mont de piété, where, in fact, they we through a curious process. You first of all pled the article with the commissionnaire, and he bound by the terms of his agreement to conv the pledge within 24 hours to the central esta lishment, where, he in fact, repledges it. I makes the advance himself out of his own till the borrower in the first instance; he takes t pledge to the mont de piété the next day and pledges it there; he gives, first of all, a pr visional ticket to the borrower, and then t pled lge goes to the mont de piété; they, after re-ging it, give a fresh ticket; that the commis-naire takes back to his office, and the pledger within 10 days afterwards and exchanges provisional ticket for the official one.

283. I suppose those commissionnaires accept the responsibility of valuing the goods taken ledge?—Yes; the commissionnaire values the le first according to his own judgment, and etween him and the pledger that valuation ds; but when he goes to the mont de piété e is a fresh valuation, and if the mont de values the pledge at a lower sum than he lent, then it only readvances to him the ller amount; but the excess which he has ad-ed to the pledger still remains as between and the pledger, and he is allowed to charge half per cent. per month interest for it. In way I believe the commissionnaires lend out large capitals of their own, over and above what get from the central institution; and in that there is a kind of competition created, some-g like what exists among the English pawn-ers. The total excess lent by the commis-aires, in 1869, over the loans of the mont de é, was 629,586 francs. The commissionnaires l to lend much more on a pledge than the ral establishment would do, and consequently got a great deal of custom. But they are doing only about one-fourth of the business used to do before the bureaux auxiliares n to be established.

284. How would the commissionnaire secure surplus advanced; was there anything to ent the borrower from going direct to the t de piété and redeeming his pledge?—There nothing to prevent the borrower going to the t de piété direct and redeeming his pledge, a record of that excess advance would be ined there, and it would be charged to the ger and carried to the commissionaire's ac-nt.

285. They would not, therefore, allow the on to redeem his goods and take them away ss he paid the additional advance of the com-ionaire?—The commissionaire's advance is oned as part of the debt. Although the ower owes it to the commissionaire, and not the establishment, still the establishment ld require him to pay both before he could em.

286. Then they would keep an account cur-with each commissionaire, I presume?—y do; all the transactions are, I suppose, red in an account between them in that .

287. That led, I presume, to a very consi-able business being carried on?—Many of the missionaires do a very large business; there ne of them now who lends larger sums than mont de piété itself. The chief office only during the last year upon 81,408 pledges for 0,000 francs, being an average of 52 francs ; but M. Michelet, who is commissionaire ne Chaussée d'Antin district, lent upon 18,108 lges 1,837,824 francs, an average of 101 cs. That was double the average lent by central establishment. I suppose it is rather extravagant neighbourhood, and people go to because he will lend liberally.

288. Is the valuation made very carefully by officer?—Yes; in the mont de piété the luation is not made by their own servant but a person who is called a commissaire priseur. He is one of the corporation of appraisers of the department of the Seine, and whenever a commissaire priseur is required, the corporation nominates three of their own body, and those three names are sent up to the Prefet of the Seine to select from; one of the three is appointed to the duty, and then he acts between the establishment and the borrowers.

2289. Then is he always in the establishment?—He is always there; there are a number of them there.

2290. Does he receive any remuneration?—Yes, he is allowed one-half per cent. on the loan for his valuation fee, and out of that he is bound to make good any deficiency that may arise through an error of judgment of his own. If he values a thing too highly, and it sells for less, he has to make good the deficiency.

2291. Are any inquiries instituted with parties who come to pledge goods?—Yes. I have pledged, by way of testing the different systems, both at the principal establishment and the commissionaires, but I have never pledged at the bureaux auxiliaires; they are too recent an invention for my experience. First of all, in the central establishment there are a number of divisions; it is like a combination of a dozen pawnbroking offices, each one working independently of the other, and being distinguished by a number, and the whole transaction is carried through in each of those separate divisions. The division is sub-divided into sections; there is a pawning office to No. 1, a redeeming office to No. 1, a cashier's office to No. 1, and a delivery office to No. 1. Each branch of the establishment has its own set of offices, and there are, I think, some six or eight in the principal building.

2292. So that the business of each compartment (if I may so say) is carried on quite separately under one number?—Yes, except that the warehouse is common to them all.

2293. What questions are asked when a person goes to make a pledge?—To facilitate our operations, a gentleman who was with me pledged his watch. We first of all went up to the pledge counter, which we approached through a series of barriers put up to prevent any kind of crowding, so that the applicants came up singly to a sort of window at which the commissaire priseur sat, and when their business was transacted they passed through a side barrier into another section. We were, with very great courtesy, admitted behind the scenes, that we might watch the working all through. The commissaire priseur saw our watch, and valued it; after that we left his office and went into a kind of registry office, where the owner was submitted to a series of questions as to ownership. In regard to this, whenever the loan is of more than 10 francs the owner has to produce documents in support of his identity. This is the rule with articles of ordinary use, but, according to law, in the case of new goods or new merchandise the passport or papers of the pawner, and his trade licence, must be produced; and not only that, but the pawner must be accompanied by a resident dealer of the same class as himself in the city of Paris who is properly licensed, to come forward and support his identity. That is, of course, intended as a check against taking stolen goods, and also to insure that the names given shall be the genuine ones. In the event of the owner not complying with those requirements, the mont de piété would detain the property until until such time as he did comply; but articles below 10 francs are, I believe, taken without most of those precautions, provided they are obviously the property of the person pledging them.

2294. Or provided they are suitable to the condition of the person offering them?—Yes; those particulars having been entered in a book, the pledger is required to sign it, which is a very material distinction between the operation of pawning in Paris and in London. The entries are made in a book, and the pledger signs that book in the margin. On the occasion to which I have referred, a note for 100 francs (the amount of the loan) was then handed to us, together with the pawn ticket of the establishment.

2295. I suppose they have very large and commodious warehouses?—Yes, the building is larger I dare say than the General Post Office in St. Martin's-le-Grand. It is a kind of parallelogram, divided in the centre by a cross range of buildings. It has five floors; the ground floor is occupied by the offices in which the public have their dealings. It employs above 300 persons.

2296. What voucher is given by the person pledging?—It is very different from the English ticket. I have here one for the present month, which was kindly sent to me by M. Ledieu, the director of the establishment. (The same was handed in, see Appendix.) It not only contains all the entries connected with the pledge, but full directions as to the times of transacting business, the rate of interest, the repayment of overplus, and in fact, all that the pledger can possibly want to know in regard to his pledge. The ticket also contains a number of compartments, on which the particulars of each branch of the transaction are entered, such as the charges upon redemption; or if it is forfeited or sold and he calls afterwards to inquire touching the overplus, a statement is made on the ticket giving all those particulars.

2297. Is there a counterfoil kept of that?—There is a small counterfoil, not containing all those particulars but containing all which would be necessary for identification; there is one peculiarity about the ticket which I should like to mention, and which constitutes a very important distinction between the French and the English systems; they do not put the name and address of the pledger on the ticket, that is entered in the books, but it is treated as a confidential matter between the establishment and the borrower; therefore if he loses the ticket the finder gets no clue to his necessities, neither can the finder make any use of that ticket, because if he went to redeem the goods he would be asked questions as to ownership, which he could not answer.

2299. Do they consider that the ticket is available for the bearer of it if he gives the right name and address, or must the true owner come?—I apprehend that if the person offering the ticket could answer the questions put to him he would be deemed the owner, but I cannot speak from any experience as to that.

2300. Do you think there is any advantage in having so large a ticket as compared with the English ticket?—By no means; I think that a ticket less than one-eighth that size would contain all that it is absolutely necessary to know; in fact very little indeed is required; you have seen the English pawn tickets which answer all practical purposes.

2301. Does it occur to you that much that is in that ticket is due to the fact of the business being carried on like a public establishment, and requiring therefore more vouching than a private business would require?—Undoubtedly, they have a system of check in the establishment which that, I suppose, is partly designed to work in with; in fact there is a complete series of check in each branch of the establishment, so that if anything goes wrong they see whose fault it is; each servant of the establishment is bound to deposit security in cash with the establishment, upon which he is allowed interest, and if any losses occur through error of his, through misdelivery of a pledge or anything of that kind, the amount is taken from his deposit and he has to make it up again.

2302. Do you know whether when a person comes to redeem they take any note of his identity in their book?—Simply that of asking him his name.

2303. Will you proceed with your narrative of the procedure at the mont de piété?—Then having applied to redeem the watch we gave up the original pawn ticket, and instead of it we recevied a small statement of the amount due from us to the mont de piété, which we took into the office of the cashier, where we paid him what was due, and he gave us another order upon the warehouse-keeper. We took that into the large delivery hall belonging to our division, where we gave in our order and in due time received back the watch. The delivery hall was a very large place, twice the size of this room, with a large window at the end of it, and benches are put liberally about the room for the pawners to sit upon while waiting to receive their goods.

2304. Do they come to a counter to receive their goods?—No, to the window.

2305. Are they exposed to the observation of each other?—The redeemers are all exposed to the observation of each other.

2306. Are the pledgers so exposed also?—The would be a little.

2307. There is none of the privacy which observed in an English pawnbroker's shop with compartments or boxes?—No.

2309. What is the rate of interest charged for the loans?—The rate charged in the French mont de piété depends upon themselves. There is a law applying to the whole country; but each those separate institutions organises its own rule and charges its own rates, and they vary very materially. I may say that they vary from 4 per cent. in some cases to 15 per cent. in others, different towns in France. Some of them lend gratuitously, and make it perfectly a scheme of charity; and others lend at a very low rate of interest, but charge comparatively large fees in the first instance to cover their working. The rate charged by the mont de piété of Paris is 9 per cent. per annum, or three-quarters per cent. per month. It is estimated upon the principle of 6 per cent. for money lent, and 3 per cent. to cover costs of working working. The calculation of interest is made upon the same footing as in England, viz., by half months after the first month.

2310. What are the charges with which they supplement the rate of interest?—The only charge is that of the one-half per cent. for the valuation, except in the case of the commissionaires; there is nothing beyond that one-half per cent. in the chief establishment, nor yet in the bureaux auxiliares; but you will see on the pawn ticket of the mont de piété that it reserves to itself the power to charge a higher rate under certain exceptional circumstances; that applies, I believe, to cases in which there is great pressure in the money market and a great demand upon the funds of the institution, and it has to go into the money market to borrow at a high rate of interest, to lend again to the pledger. In such cases it can recoup itself, by charging him an extra half per cent. upon the loan, but that is a thing which is scarcely ever done; it is only used as a sort of safety valve in very exceptional times.

2311. How long does it take to get all this business of pledging transacted?—The officer of the mont de piété, who was kind enough to be our guide on that occasion, told us, with some degree of complacency, that if everything went well, a pledge might be worked through in the space of a quarter of an hour, but I should think myself that it would take nearly half an hour.

2312. How long would it take to redeem a pledge?—The time named would include the whole proceeding.

2313. Would it take seven minutes to take a pledge and seven minutes to redeem it?—It might take about ten minutes to pledge the article and about the same to redeem it; the pledging was the longer operation, I think. I have compared that rate of progress with the operations of an English pawnbroker; after my return I timed the movements of a London pawnbroker, and found that the pledging there occupied about two minutes, and that the redemption could be accomplished in from half a minute to two minutes and a half, according to the nature of the article.

2314. Do you know at all what is the practical maximum in the mont de piété for advances?—None whatever.

2315. But up to what amount do they practically grant a loan?—Up to any amount you please, I believe; I do not know what is the practical limit; I did not inquire that. But from official statements, I find that 81 per cent. of the loans ranged from 3 francs to 20 francs; 12 per cent. were from 21 francs to 50 francs; seven per cent. were from 50 francs upwards. I see from more elaborate tables, that the mont de piété had in one year 703 pledges from 500 francs to 1,000 francs; 474 from 1,000 francs to 5,000 francs, and 36 above this latter amount. The mont de piété, I may say, has charged much higher rates of interest under exceptional circumstances; at one time, in the Great Revolution, it charged as much as 5 per cent. per month.

2316. What was the object of the establishment of the commissionnaires?—They were established in different parts of Paris to afford local facilities. Originally the number was 23, but now it is very considerably reduced by the operation of the auxiliary bureaux.

2317. Have those auxiliary bureaux, in fact, taken the place of the commissionnaires?—To a great extent, and they do business on the same terms as the mont de piété. They are branch monts de piété. They were not all founded at once, but established from time to time; four were opened during the last year. They now number 24, and are distinguished by the letters of the alphabet. The process of pledging with a commissionnaire is very much like that of pledging with an English pawnbroker. It is very simple, occupying but comparatively little time. The same questions were asked as at the chief establishment. I had to produce my passport in order to prove my identity; the whole transaction took place in one office, with one person, and only occupied a few minutes. The pawn ticket given me was, of course, a provisional one, as I have explained before. The redemption would have to be performed by going to the commissionnaire one day, paying him the amount, and giving him the ticket. He goes the next morning to the mont de piété and redeems the article, and brings it to his office, and restores it to the pledger.

2318. Then, I suppose, the privacy and rapidity of the operation with the commissionnaire would tend very much to throw the business into his hands, as compared with going to the central offices?—Very much indeed; not only would he, in all probability, be very much nearer to where the pledger resides, but his office is open at all hours of the day. The mont de piété has official hours; I believe, from nine o'clock to four o'clock for pledging, and from nine o'clock to two o'clock for redeeming, renewing, and paying overplus.

2319. What is the profit of the commissionnaire?—The commissionnaire has 2 per cent. upon the pawning and one per cent. upon the redemption; or, if the article is forfeited and sold, and he goes to negotiate the recovery of the overplus, then he receives one per cent. on the overplus for his trouble.

2320. Then for his surplus advances you have stated that if he makes any he charges one-half per cent. per month interest, or six per cent. per annum?—The principal institution charges nine per cent. upon its loan, and he is allowed to charge six per cent. upon the excess.

2321. That would be only at the rate of six per cent. per annum, would it?—That is all; and he finds it to his advantage to invest a large amount of capital in that way, because of the three per cent. commission which it brings him upon the pawning and redemption. He attracts custom to himself by lending, as you may say, at a loss in interest, in order to get the two per cent. and the one per cent. commission. As an illustration, I will say, that when we pledged our watch in the mont de piété, we, on being shown over the building, went into the room where the commissionnaires transact their dealings with the establishment; and one of them, on being shown our watch, told us that he would have lent 20 francs more upon it than the establishment lent us. They lent us 100 francs; he would have lent us 120 francs.

2322. Then he would have had three per cent. upon the whole transaction, would he not?—He would have had three per cent. upon the whole transaction. That is a very heavy charge in comparison with the English pawnbroker's rate, and makes pledging much more expensive through a commissionnaire in Paris, for a short date, than in London; although for a long date it comes less expensive with a commissionnaire, and decidedly cidedly less expensive with the mont de piété in all cases.

2323. The period for which the party pledging is entitled to continue the loan is fixed, I think?—It is 12 months. If he wants to renew he can do so at any time during the thirteenth month. The renewal is a complete fresh pledging; the article has to be re-valued, and if it has deteriorated in the meanwhile he has to make up the deficiency to the establishment.

2324. Did you find out what was practically the average period for which goods were pledged?—I did not; I could easily ascertain that, but I should think, speaking from memory, that it would average about eight or nine months.

2325. From that we may infer, I presume, that it is not much the practice in Paris to take up loans for short periods?—No; I should think they must average from seven to nine months. I judge of that by the way in which capital is turned over in their annual balance-sheet, which shows that nearly two-thirds of the year must be about the average time that the pledge would lie.

2326. They do not succeed in turning their capital once in the year?—About once and a-half; the precise figures are as follows: on the 31st December 1869, there were in the warehouse 1,422,676 articles, upon which 33,612,001 francs had been lent. The total money lent in the year was 48,923,547 francs. They do not seek to make a business of pawnbroking at all, but they merely receive it coldly, you may say as an act of charity; they do not appear to invite it. I may say that the establishment of 24 auxiliary bureaux since 1856 has cut down, not only the number of commissionnaires, but has very much reduced the amount of their business; they are now reduced to 14 in number. Before 1856, they used to do about 75 per cent. of the pledging, and that is reduced now to about 22 per cent.

2327. Have the auxiliary bureaux the same valuation as the principal bureau?—Yes.

2328. Do they value the pledge in the auxiliary bureau, or do they send it up to the head bureau for valuation?—I cannot say; I have not investigated that, it is a comparatively modern institution; I believe that the mont de piété is not on very good terms with its commissionnaires, and never has been; and it has been always endeavouring to get quit of them. The bureaux auxiliaries keep open from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m.

2329. Do you know what has been the average amount of the loans?—The average amount of loans in the mont de piété of Paris in 1869 was 20 francs 59 centimes.

2330. Is it increasing or diminishing?—It is decidedly increasing; in the year 1850 the average was 17 francs, and now it has increased to 20 francs 59 centimes.

2331. Can you tell us the average of any other place besides Paris?—Yes; I derive that from a report made by M. Watteville to the Minister of the Interior. At Marseilles, the average for the year 1850 was 31 francs 48 centimes; at Lyons, 14 francs 19 centimes; at Bordeaux, 17 francs 75 centimes; at Lille, 5 francs 64 centimes; at Strasbourg, 7 francs; at Metz, 9 francs 38 centimes; and Bergues, 4 francs 75 centimes. I selected these as doing the largest trade of any of the French establishments, but they really do not do much according to English notions. The largest of them, I think, does not do above 60,000 to 70,000 pledges a year, and most of the French monts de piété do much less.

2332. Were you able to ascertain the expense of conducting the monts de piété?—Yes; in the report of M. Watteville in 1850, the cost of each pledge at Paris was about 95 centimes; at Marseilles, it was 1 franc 37 centimes; at Lyons, 49 centimes; at Bordeaux, 55 centimes; at Lille, 32 centimes; at Strasbourg, 34 centimes; at Metz, 39 centimes; and at Bergues, 18 centimes. By the report of the Paris mont de piété for 1869, I find that the cost has increased to 1 franc 30 centimes; but I daresay a good deal of that increase is owing to having to support the bureaux auxiliaires.

2333. Would it not appear from that, that the system could not pay unless the amount of the pledges were so high and for so long a period as you have stated?—Certainly; it would be ruinous if worked on the English principle. Their capital would all be eaten up in a very few months in expenses. According to the estimate of M. Blaize, pledges for less than 15 francs did not generally yield a profit during the time the mont de piété was under his direction.

2334. Therefore it would seem to be quite inapplicable to the business of pawnbrokers as carried on in England?—They are widely different in that respect. The average amount of loans throughout France in 1850, was 16 francs and 86 centimes; and the average cost per pledge was 1 franc 3 centimes. The average amount of the loans in Paris last year was 20 francs 59 centimes; the average cost per pledge was 1 franc 30 centimes; and the average receipt on each pledge was 1 franc 55 centimes; 25 centimes being the profit on each pledge.

2335. Is there any difference between the Belgian system and the French system with reference to the monts de piété?—There is a difference, but it is not very material. The outline of the system is the same nearly all over the continent, but the rates of interest vary very much more in Belgium than in France. I cannot now give you the particulars, but the range throughout Belgium is from 6 per cent. in some places to 24 per cent. in others.

2336. Do you know whether the time for redemption is the same?—I believe it is the same.

2337. Do you know what is the law in France as to the recovery of stolen property from the mont de piété?—Yes; the mont de piété gives stolen property up to the owner only upon repayment to itself of the money lent and interest, and this only after the claimant has proved his legal right to the property.

2339. In that respect does the law of France correspond with the law of Belgium?—There is a slight difference in Belgium. There the loan and interest must be repaid unless the establishment takes in the goods within six months after receiving notice of the theft. In that case it loses both principal and interest. At Leipsig nearly the same rule obtains. At Amsterdam principal and interest have to be paid, but interest ceases to accrue after notice of the theft is given by the owner. At Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Moscow, and generally throughout the continent, principal and interest must be paid.

2340. They

2340. They are protected against theft or dishonesty, just as a person who gives a bill of exchange in this country is protected, are they not?—Just so. The law supposes that they do the best that they can do to insure that the goods are deposited with them in good faith.

2341. Does not that result from the fact that they are not carrying on business for a profit, but for a supposed public exigency?—I have no doubt that that is the reason of it.

2342. Does the rule in Paris which you have mentioned, as to the minimum advance, extend generally to the monts de piété throughout France?—Yes; and all over the continent, you may say. In France some of the monts de piété are purely charitable, and will lend a very small sum; but, as a rule, about 2 s. or 2 s. 6 d. is the minimum nearly everywhere, except in the case of Amsterdam, where they have a very peculiar system of small pledging, somewhat similar to that of our leaving-shops, but differing in this, that it is regulated by law, while the English leaving-shop violates the law and exists in defiance of it.

2343. Did you inquire whether in Paris there is ever any loss on the sale of the goods?—If there is a loss it has to be made good by the commissaire-priseur out of his fee, so that the mont de piété never suffers a loss upon his transactions. The sales are made publicly by the commissaire-priseur; the number of sales last year was 162,254, realising about 2,500,000 francs. If a loss should arise by the wrong delivery of a pledge, I apprehend that the servant who gives it out has to make good the deficiency, while to the pledger the amount of the valuation of the commissaire-priseur, with an increase of one-fourth upon that estimate as indemnity, is given as a compensation.

2344. What is done with the overplus, if any arises, upon the sale of the goods?—That, of course, is open to be reclaimed by the pledger; and if he does not reclaim, it goes to the general profits of the establishment, and at the end of the year is handed over to the hospitals.

2345. Did you ascertain whether there was much surplus upon the sales, and, if so, what the amount was?—The amount of profit handed over to the hospitals on last year's trading was 784,737 francs, or about 30,000*l.* But the mont de piété, being a Government establishment, pays neither rent nor taxes; while it is only fair to mention that the London pawnbrokers, besides other taxes, pay a heavy license duty of something like 9,000*l.* a year to the Government, which I take to be something of a set-off against the charity to the hospitals.

2346. Is the house found free by the municipality?—I believe it is; at least I see in their balance-sheet no mention of any rent being paid, nor of any taxes being paid.

2347. Do you know how much of the surplus arose from the profit on the sale of goods?—I cannot state that.

2349. Do you know whether the loans are often renewed upon the pledges?—Yes, very frequently.

2350. Have you any knowledge as to the per-centage of renewals?—I cannot give you the per-centage, but I can give you the total amounts. The pledgings in the last year were 2,206,596, and out of these the renewals were 534,360, or more than one-fourth.

2351. Are the loans renewed more than once?—Yes. When we went over the warehouse of the mont de piété, we were shown one parcel which had been there 17 years. The practice is, there, to put the new pawn ticket upon the top of the old one, tying it on to the parcel, and there were 17 papers tied on this, making quite a bundle; but I was told that there was one parcel somewhere in the warehouse which had been there for 30 years, and had been renewed every year.

2352. What would generally be the character of the articles which would be thus pledged and renewed?—I do not know; all articles, I suppose, would be liable to renewal.

2353. Is there any limit regulating the age at which people are allowed to pledge?—Yes; I grather that chiefly from the regulations of the mont de piété as regards the commissionnaires; but I infer from the manner in which those regulations are worded, that they apply also to the chief establishment, and they certainly apply to the auxiliary bureaux. They are forbidden to receive pledges from minors, unless by written authority from their parents or guardians. They are also forbidden to receive pledges from married women without the authority of their husbands. There is the special distinction—married women living under the guardianship of their husbands. Under a separation, I suppose, a married woman would have a right to pledge. They are also forbidden to receive pledges from domestic servants without the authority of their masters; from clerks and shopmen without that of their employers, always excepting that the articles are such as appear obviously for their own personal use; and if a parent, husband, or employer desires to send his children or servants to pledge, he must make a declaration to that effect in a book kept by the commissionnaires. The same rule appears to apply to the head office and, of course, to the bureaux auxiliaires. In the mont de piété itself no person is allowed to be employed under 18 years of age in the warehouses, or under 20 in the offices.

2354. How do they inform themselves of the fact that the person is married or otherwise?—I think that nearly every foreigner carries papers showing his identity, and he or she would be required to produce them.

2355. Do you know what proceeding is adopted in France if the pledger loses his pawn ticket?—Yes; he has to make a declaration of the loss before the director of the mont de piété, unless the article is above 100 fr. value, and then he has to make it before a notary public. A note of this declaration is entered upon the register, on the margin of the entries relative to the pawning. But the pawner is not allowed to redeem until the end of the year, when he is bound to give a special receipt for it, and security against any other claim. It seems a very great hardship to hold it until the end of the year.

Mr. A. Keeson.

2356. I suppose that is to protect the establishment, and also any person who may hold that ticket?—That is for the protection of the establishment and of any person who may hold the ticket. By that means they secure themselves; but it is at the expense, in some measure, of the loser's comfort.

2357. But they also protect a third party against any imposition, I suppose?—They do; but it is a question whether the hardship would not be greater than the advantage derived from that arrangement.

2358. Has any system grown up in Paris, like that which we are informed has grown up in this country, of having illicit pawn shops?—I believe so. The gentleman who guided us round the mont de piété was very communicative upon all matters, and I asked him that question, and he admitted that there were such places, but he did not seem at all inclined to go into the subject, and so I could not very well press it upon him; but I have read of such things in the public prints, and he admitted at once that there was an illicit system of pawnbroking similar to our leaving-shops. With a minimum limit of three francs for their loans, there must necessarily be such a system, I should think.

2359. Had you any opportunity of informing yourself what was the cause of the average of the pawns being so high in Paris?—No, I do not know any cause for it.

2360. Did you observe at any of the places that the class of people who were pawning were above the class of ordinary workmen?—No doubt of it. In Paris we saw magnificent things. We were shown one room where there were 8,000 clocks, many of them fine specimens of Paris manufacture; beautiful articles, of great value I should think.

2361. Is it your opinion that the mont de piété, after all, does not reach the lowest class of the community?—I should think it did not in their smaller necessities, or not to any great extent.

2362. It would only go to the class above the workmen, would it not?—To some extent; but it relieves the workman also.

2363. But as the average is so great, it would seem rather to pass over his head and to suit the convenience of the class above him?—According to a table prepared by M. Blaize, former director of the mont de piété of Paris, the following are the proportions for 1852: of 1,000 pledges, 112 would be from merchants, manufacturers, and small tradesmen; 84 would be from rentiers and proprietaires; 31 from the liberal professions; 39 from employés; military men, 4; and from workmen and labourers, 730. But in the amount of money lent, 36½ per cent. went to the first class, and 35 per cent. to the last. In the report of M. Watteville to the minister of the interior, returns under this head are given by more than half the provincial monts de piétés of France. According to them, 152,776 advances were made to merchants, &c.; 909,993 to working men; and 120,459 to other classes.

2364. Did you observe much personal clothing of an inferior kind?—The warehouses were full of clothing. There were two floors, I think, filled with clothing. One floor was filled with jewellery and watches; the second and third floors were full of clothing; and the top floor contained bedding.

2365. But did you observe whether the clothing was the common coarse clothing of the people, or whether it was of a better kind?—It was impossible to say; it was packed up in wrappers or bundles, chiefly.

2366. Have you informed yourself at all as to the Dutch system of pawnbroking?—Yes. In Amsterdam there is a double system of pawnbroking at work. The higher one is a kind of compromise between the English and French systems, and the lower one is altogether unique; I have never seen or read of anything like it elsewhere.

2367. Will you explain the difference between the systems?—Both are under the direction of a corporation called the "Great Lending Bank" of the city, which does not deal directly with the public at all, but farms the privilege of doing so to its licensed agents, like commissionnaires. All pledges deposited with the ordinary lending banks, that is the offices of those commissionnaires, have, however, to be brought into the warehouses of the Great Lending Bank, and are stored there.

2368. What is the minimum of their transactions?—The minimum of their transactions is one florin or one guilder, I am not sure which exactly, or whether there is any difference between the two.

2369. What is the other system?—In the "small pawnhouses," as they are called, the maximum loan permitted is equal to about 2*s.* or 2*s.* 6*d.* They are not allowed to go above that.

2370. What is the limit of their profits?—Their profits are not in the form of interest upon the loan, but in the way of per-centage upon the amount. That per-centage varies a little according to the loan. It may be roughly stated at from seven to nine per cent., the latter being charged upon the smallest loans.

2371. That is without reference to time?—Without reference to time. The contract is for three months, and the commission paid at the outset covers the whole period.

2372. Then what right of renewal is there at the end of three months?—Although they are forfeited at the end of three months, the articles must not be sold for another month, and during this month the owner may renew the contract by paying a fresh fee. He may also redeem in this fourth month upon paying a double fee.

2373. What is done with the pledges if they are not redeemed?—If the pledge is not redeemed or renewed it becomes the property of the dealer, who disposes of it in any manner he pleases, and is not bound to furnish any account of it to the pledger; it is like our system, under 10*s.*

2374. Is there any system of booking or accounting for those pledges?—Yes; their system of booking is reduced to a minimum in those cases. The small pawnbroker puts down only the date, a consecutive number, a description of the article, and the amount lent. He does not put the name of the owner; upon redemption he enters the date of that also, and if it is not redeemed, he merely puts a tick in the margin to indicate that it is forfeited.

2375. Does he give any duplicate?—He gives a pawn ticket, and a very curious one it is. (See Appendix.)

2376. Then the ticket does not disclose any name?—No name at all.

2377. Is the name entered by the pawnbroker in his book?—No, he does not take any name at all. In this small system they do not think it worth while, I suppose. They neglect many of the regulations of the greater system of lending; they make very short work of it.

2378. Does the greater system follow the usual course?—The greater system follows the usual course.

2380. Then this business is carried on with great economy, I presume?—With very great economy of working.

2381. Did you ascertain whether much money was advanced by the small pawnbrokers?—No; I have not studied this by my own observation; I have derived it from the report of M. Watteville, who describes it at great length.

2382. Do you know what is done when the ticket is lost?—I do not.

2383. Mr. Whitwell.] How is this ticket filled up?—By the consecutive number and the date.

2384. And there is no significance as to value whatever?—I do not think so.

2385. Chairman.] Do you know whether any supervision is exercised on this small pledging?—They are kept under very strict supervision from the corporation of the Great Lending Bank; they are not allowed to find their own books, but the books are supplied from the chief establishment, and also the tickets. The books are required to be perodically produced for examination at the offices of the Lending Bank, and its subordinate officers also make domiciliary visits from time to time, chiefly, I believe, for the purpose of assessing its own commission or royalty upon their dealings. At the time of the report, there were about 60 small pawns in Amsterdam.

2386. What is done with those small pledges; are they kept by the persons who take them, or are they accounted for in any way?—The pawnbroker is not bound to give any account of them when they are forfeited at the end of the fourth month; they become his property.

2387. Does any system prevail of converting larger pledges into smaller pledges by dividing goods?—Yes; they will divide pledges, where possible, into several parts.

2388. What is the object of that?—To get an additional commission on each pledge.

2389. Do you understand that the minimum charge is the commission on a fixed sum, and not upon the actual value of the thing?—It is from 7 to 9 per cent. upon the loan.

2390. Then what would be the object of splitting the loan unless the minimum loan is fixed; it would only give trouble?—The minimum loan, I think, is 9 per cent. upon the money lent.

2391. But what is the object of dividing the pledges?—They would make an advance of several small sums upon one article divided into separate parts.

2392. Do you mean that the object is to bring a loan of more than 2 s. 6 d. down to the level of 2 s. 6 d.; is that the purpose for which the pledge is split?—They get an advantage by it, but I cannot exactly say in what way now.

2393. There would be no object, would there, unless the whole commodity was worth more than 2 s. 6 d., so as to bring the whole transaction into a 2 s. 6 d. pledge?—The object, I believe, is to get a more valuable class of pawns than they are legally entitled to, by dividing, where it is possible, a pledge of greater value than the maximum into several parts.

2394. Mr. R. Arkwright.] You wrote a treatise, I think, on pawnbroking?—Yes, I did; but it is some years ago.

2395. And you have had some communication with the last witness, Dr. Hancock; he asked you some questions, I think, with reference to the length of time during which pledges should be redeemable?—He addressed some questions to me, and I wrote the answers to them, and they are appended to his report.

2396. I think you seem to suggest that different sorts of goods should be redeemed at different times?—I think that the present time is much too long for clothing; there is no doubt that clothes deteriorate very much in the course of the 12 months during which they have to be kept now, and that if they came out at the end of six months they would come out at the time when they are generally most marketable, but I do not think that it applies to other things.

2397. Would you suggest that the time should be shortened altogether for all pledges?—That I should hardly like to offer an opinion upon, but certainly with regard to clothes I think it should be shortened.

2398. And all articles which deteriorate?—All articles which are liable to deterioration.

2400. Have you had your attention drawn to the fact of the effect of pawnbroking upon the poor-rate?—No, not at all.

2401. Are you aware that in counties where there are the fewest pawnbrokers, there is a higher scale of poor-rate?—That would merely show that in some counties the population is in a more flourishing condition than in others; I should suppose that pawnbroking and poors-rates would be the largest in the most distressed counties.

2402. You do not understand me; are you aware that where the poor have the facility for raising money on pledges, there they least resort to the poor-rate?—I have no knowledge of the poor-rate part of the question; I have never studied it.

2403. Do you not think that the charge for the ticket is rather oppressive?—I do not think it is.

Mr. A. Keeson.

booking; my own view is, that the same price of 1 d. should be charged for all tickets, instead of a charge, varying from ½ d. to 4 d.; I do not myself see any reason why there should be such a difference.

2405. In the case of a person taking in his watch, or anything else, why should there not be a charge which should cover everything?—That would involve a higher rate of interest; if it were properly assessed, it would come to the same thing; but I think that it would be a sounder principle if the expenses of taking in were charged upon the first transaction.

2406. Mr. Alderman Carter.] According to the cost of taking in and storing?—Yes; I should think 1 d. for every ticket would be a fair charge.

2407. Mr. Morley.] Have you considered the mode of selling by auction?—I have not; but it is a thing upon which I might perhaps answer any question.

2408. You have confined your observations chiefly to the foreign systems, I presume?—That is all that I have come to give evidence upon. The other matters I can only derive from the statements of the pawnbrokers themselves, who can give you the evidence more directly.

2409. We have had remarkable evidence of the immense proportion of pledges in England being for very small sums; do you know what is the case in France as to that?—No, except that generally they take nothing under 3 francs.

2410. Is there any mode of which you are aware, except those illicit shops like our leaving-shops, for very small sums?—I fancy not; there is no legal system.

2411. Have you any idea that the tradesmen in France make use of the mont de piété?—Yes, undoubtedly; that is evident, I think, from their rules, in which they require certain precautions where merchants are offering new merchandise.

2412. Those 8,000 clocks which I think you saw, must be the property of persons in business in that line of trade, I presume?—Many of them. In regard to high pledges they have a rule that those above 1,000 francs have to be received under certain regulations distinct from the ordinary ones, and with greater precautions. I remember seeing a portmanteau while we were there which contained some very large amount of valuable property that was being pawned. It was being sealed up by one of the warehouse keepers, being above a certain value, and it was placed in a strong-room which could only be approached by the head warehouse-keeper.

2413. Is it not your impression that they have more guarantees with reference to the right ownership of property than we have in England?—Undoubtedly; we have not the system of personal papers.

2414. They may be oppressive as to the details, but we are almost destitute of any such arrangement, are we not?—We are, because we have no system of personal papers. An Englishman does not carry about papers to prove his identity, and nearly all foreigners, I believe, do so, just as we, if we travel, take a passport.

2415. Did you inquire in Amsterdam, where this simple mode is in use, whether stolen goods are often pledged?—As I said before, I did not derive the knowledge of that system from my own observation or experience, but from reading, from official documents.

2416. Mr. Whitwell.] With regard to the subordinate establishments in Paris, are the commissionnaires compelled to deposit their goods in the central office?—They are under a penalty, of I forget how much, if they do not deposit them within 24 hours.

2417. What license fee do they pay?—That I do not know.

2418. Do you know of any case, either in Holland, or Belgium, or France, where the ticket is paid for by separate charge?—I do not; but many of them charge a valuation fee, which is, perhaps, something of the same character.

2419. The payment of a fee for the ticket, if any, is included in some kind of charge, I suppose?—I imagine so.

2420. Do you know how, in Paris, the ticket can be made available for a loan from an outside party?—No; I believe there is a very large traffic in pawn-tickets, but I do not know how it is worked.

2421. Are you aware whether any person holding it would be able to receive the value of the goods?—I apprehend that if a person transferred that ticket, he would probably give his name and address to the purchaser, and he would be enabled either to redeem or to receive overplus.

2422. With regard to a question which was asked by the honourable Member for Bristol, I presume that the Committee may gather that those institutions in France, are much more used for very large articles, and that they are very little used by the poor?—Very greatly, as nothing below three francs is received.

2423. Is there not one clause in the ticket given by the mont de piété in Paris which enables the person who pawns the article to call for an account of its sale at the end of three months?—The clause is this: "Tout nantissement non renouvelé ou dégagé dans le délai d'un an est vendu dans le cours du treizième mois; toutefois il est loisible à l'emprunteur de requérir la vente de son nantissement trois mois après l'engagement (les marchandises neuves exceptées)."—That is so.

2425. But the pawnbroker has no power to sell it for his own advantage, he is bound to keep it 12 months and then to sell it; would there not be an advantage to anyone pledging a valuable article if he had power to call upon the pawnbroker to sell it at any time after the expiration of three months from the time of its being pawned?—I should think there would be; that would be introducing the free contract system.

2426. But if he had not exercised the power of free contract, and made the arrangements on pledging the article, would it not be desirable to introduce a power for the pledger to call upon the pawnbroker to sell his article after the expiration of three months?—That might be very easily done by his going through the form of redeeming it, and depositing it again for the three months; that is, supposing that free contracts were permitted.

2427. Mr. M. Guest.] Are free contracts permitted in the French monts de piété?—No.

2428. Mr. Whitwell.] Does the Government supply any money to the managers of the monts de piété?—The mont de piété borrows money itself and pays interest for it.

Mr. A. Keeson.

2429. Do you know at what rate it borrows? It paid 3 per cent. last year, but the rate ries according to circumstances.

2430. Chairman.] Do you mean that it bor- ws from the bank?—It borrows where it can. any people, I believe, invest their money at per cent. in the mont de piété, just as they do here in consols. There is also something of a charitable motive in investing money with the mont de piété.

2431. Mr. Whitwell.] You know nothing of the conduct of similar establishments in Italy, I suppose?—I have not prepared evidence on the subject.

Mr. JOHN MORRITT WALTER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Walter.

2432. Chairman.] Do you carry on the busi- ss of a Pawnbroker?—I do.

2433. At 105 and 106, Aldersgate-street, ty.

2434. Are you satisfied with the existing pro- sions of the Pawnbrokers Act, or do you wish y changes to be made in it?—I have been for any years grumbling and abusing those Acts of arliament, and until some members of our trade rmed an association and proposed a Bill, I was ry much dissatisfied with the Act; but as soon I saw their Bill, composed by pawnbrokers, I lt that I was abusing an Act that had a great al of good in it that I had not seen before. want more profit.

2435. Will you state briefly what alterations u would desire to see made in the Bill?—On lause 2, the promoters of this inquiry have re- mmended the Irish rate; I should thank you d the honourable Members to grant it. Before is matter came up, I have for many years ought that a halfpenny for every half-crown, or rt of a half-crown per month would satisfy me. hose statistics which they have placed before u, I candidly admit I do not understand; and here they say that every pledge costs 2½ d., and am dealing in hundreds of pledges every week, hat I only receive one penny profit upon, I can nly say, "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to e wise." But I think that a halfpenny for every s 6 d. is not enough, and I agree with them in aying that one halfpenny for every 2 s., which the Irish rate, would do; I do not object to nat.

2436. What have you to recommend with re- ard to Clause 3?—As to Clause 3, if you adopt heir view and mine, you need not go into it. Clause 4 is done away with, because I object to rthings; farthings and fractions I have a great bjection to.

2437. What have you to say with regard to Clause 5?—I think that the pawnbrokers ought o give the public ten days for nothing; and, pon the eleventh day, charge another month; hose half months and fractions are very objec- ionable; I mention ten days, because, in calcu- ation, ten days is more easily added than any ther number.

2438. What are your views with regard to Clause 6?—I hope this Committee will not pass Clause 6 over. I should wish, for the sake of the rade and for the sake of the public, that you would order that three books should be kept.

2439. What do you think is the advantage of aving three books?—It is an advantage to me as a pawnbroker; it has been given in evidence by some of the country pawnbrokers that it is desirable that there should be a book for 10 s. and under, and a book for all sums over 10 s. I want a book up to 5 s., which we in the trade call a low book.

2440. What is the object of keeping a book for sums below 5 s.?—Then I could have one boy booking in the lows, and another booking in the mediums at the same time; and, in case of reference, it would be much easier to pitch upon this book. This is my auction book (producing a book); it includes all pledges over 10 s., which I am bound by the present Act of Parliament to keep separate from the other pledges; this is the medium book (producing another Book), which contains the pledges between 5 s. and 10 s., and this is the low book containing all pledges under 5 s.

2441. Will you explain what is the particular merit of keeping a book, distinguishing the pledges between 5 s. and 10 s.?—In case of inquiry, whether for the pawnbroker's advantage in carrying on his business or for the advantage of a person who has lost his ticket, it is certainly far preferable to have a book containing pledges under 5 s. and another book containing pledges of 5 s. and up to and including 10 s., than to have one book containing all the pledges under 10 s.

2442. Then if you had liberty to keep as many books as you liked, you would be able to keep one for every shilling if you liked?—Undoubtedly, but that would be foolish.

2443. Then what is the necessity of compelling everybody to keep such a book?—I say you will be making a law that will be of advantage to every pawnbroker; it will be of advantage to the public on the occasion of the police coming in to inquire about an article. If a man had pledged an article for 3 s. he would refer to one book, if he pledged it for 6 s. he would refer to another, and if for 12 s., to another.

2444. You have kept three books, then?—Yes, I keep three books.

2445. And you would like to keep three books still?—I hope this Committee will not sanction two books only being kept; then with regard to the "H" and "L" upon the ticket it is perfectly absurd; there are my tickets, the "Auction," "Medium," and "Low" (producing tickets), we are bound to put "H" and "L"; I tell my printer to put "H" on one ticket and "L" on the other, and that clears me as far as the Act is concerned.

2446. Do you always discover whether the person is a housekeeper or a lodger?—I never dreamt of asking them, and for 20 years I have not done so; and I do not intend to do it, unless you make me pay a penalty.

2447. Then how do you fulfil the requirements of the Act?—I do not fulfil it; it is perfectly absurd, putting it from a pawnbroker's point of view.

2448. Then you have never complied with the Act in that respect?—Certainly not.

2449. Then do you think that there is no advantage in having "H" and "L" on the tickets?—Not the slightest in the world.

2450. Then I presume that you concur in the expediency expediency of putting an end to that restriction?—Yes; I also never ask a pledger where he lives, or the number of the street.

Mr. Walter.

30 June 1870.

2451. Do you not put any address?—I tell my assistants to put down some address; because we are bound to do so.

2452. How do you get that address?—We imagine them; some of us are fond of "Old-street"; I always put "No. 4, John-street," because I can write it more easily. You may think that I am making a joke of it; but with my experience of the pawnbroking trade, it is perfectly absurd for the Act of Parliament to say that we are bound to ask a customer, "What is your name? What is your Christian name? Are you a householder or a lodger? Where do you live? What is the number of the street? Is it your own property?" It is moonshine; it is nonsense. I do not do it, and I am quite sure a good many more do not do it. If you can get any evidence to prove that there is the slightest advantage from it to the police, or to anybody concerned, I will admit that I am wrong; but I will defy this Committee to find evidence to prove that there is the slightest use in our asking whether a man is a housekeeper or a lodger, and the name and number of the street. I have sometimes a hundred people in my shop at a time, and if it were not for the surname I admit that we could not carry on our business, because we could not identify the pledge; but as regards the name and number of the street, and the "housekeeper" and "lodger" and "Christian name," it is perfect nonsense.

2453. Do you, when the duplicate is given you back, always indorse upon it the amount of charge that you have made upon it?—Undoubtedly; I should be very sorry indeed if the Committee did not compel that being carried out.

2455. Do those from whom you receive the duplicate see that you make any such entry?—Never, unless they say, "What do you charge me"? and then they see what they have to pay. All the amount that I take is placed upon the ticket in black and white immediately it is received. I was very sorry to hear some witnesses say, "destroy that clause"; but if you do so, you will cause a number of careless men to do their business much worse than they do at the present time in regard to keeping their accounts.

2456. Would not the same result be arrived at if you entered your receipts in a book?—We do enter our receipts in a book, but not separately, only in totals each day.

2457. Do you enter in any account book the receipt of money against each redemption?—Certainly not; no pawnbroker in Great Britain does so, or at least I never heard of it.

2458. Then is no account kept of the redemption of the pledges in detail?—There is not. I can tell you how many pledges under 10*s.* I have delivered for as many years as you like, and what the amount is in the gross.

2459. Then does the pawnbroker only keep a cash book representing his cash receipts over the counter for the day?—If you will allow me, I will just show you the A B C from beginning to end. That (producing a book) is a book in which my foreman enters the business done in my shop each day, and you will see something there that you object to, but which I shall be very happy to argue with you upon.

2460. In point of fact, do you only enter the total of your receipts for the day?—For the day only.

2461. You do not enter the details?—Undoubtedly not. If there are 10 auctions, they may amount to 15 l. or 20 l. 4 s., and the interest is so much, whatever it may be, the same with the low tickets.

2462. Then do you compute the totals that you enter from the tickets?—Yes, we compute the total from the tickets, both principal and interest.

2463. Is the accuracy of the account checked by the cash in the till?—By the cash in the till (explaining the account books to the Committee).

2464. When the amount does not balance, you put so much short, and balance it in that way, do you not?—Every day we are something short; 1 s. or half-a-crown, or something over, or whatever it may be; it ought to balance exactly.

2465. If he is over he takes it out of the till, and if he is under he puts it into the till; is that so?—Always the shorts exceed the overs during the month.

2466. Mr. Alderman Carter.] The books are put in for the pledges under 10 l.; have you the books for the pledges above 10 l.?—I have (producing a book).

2467. Chairman.] Do you object to the provision in the Act which makes it penal to pawn unlawfully the goods of other persons?—No, I do not object to it. If anybody took my coat and pawned it, I should feel very much annoyed that I should have to pay the money for it and think he ought to be punished for pawning it.

2468. Have you anything to say with regard to clause 10?—In regard to that clause, if a person comes in this afternoon, and I am in my shop, and brings in a watch and looks suspicious and I ask questions, the clause directs me to give the person into custody. If I was quite sure that the pawner was not in rightful possession of the property, and I was behind my counter, I should feel it my duty as a citizen to call in a policeman and place the person in custody. I say that we are entitled that the law should free us from the responsibility of making a mistake. The law of the land invites us to exercise a judgment upon what is no profit to us in any shape or way, but simply wasting our time at the police courts in getting a conviction. We may make a mistake; I have done it myself, and have settled the transaction. If a person comes in and you are not satisfied, and you call in a policeman, and you find you are mistaken in your original idea in regard to the pledger, you may have a lawyer's letter. I am afraid of lawyer's letters; they always cost money.

2469. Mr. Morley.] A lawyer's letter, to what effect?—Threatening an action for false imprisonment, or defamation of character.

2470. You do not give the person into custody?—It is unfair for the law to ask me to do that which is no profit to myself, when I may, by endeavouring to carry out the law, make a mistake, and I may have to pay 100 l., or 50 l., or whatever it may be.

2471. Do you mean to say that if you call a policeman in, and do not give the party into custody, you are still liable to legal proceedings?—I distinctly say so. If you call a policeman in ar nd you say, "This party has offered me a vatch; I think it is not all right, and any of my ustomers heard me, and it turned out all right, should be liable for defamation of character; a awnbroker's shop is never empty.

2472. Do you mean that if the policeman says think you are mistaken, and walks away, the arty would send you a lawyer's letter?—Undoubtedly, many would.

2473. Chairman.] He would not be entitled to o that unless you detained him in the shop, would e?—Here is an instruction that we should do a ertain thing, we run the risk of doing that for hich we may forfeit 50*l.*; there are several eanings to the word detain.

2474. The question that was asked you was his. If you did not detain the man, but merely ent for a policeman and stated the facts to him, aving the policeman to exercise his own discretion, would you then incur any liability?—I ave known a case where the parties have been aken to the station and discharged there, and I ave had a lawyer's letter, and I have been afraid o go on with it. If you can prove that it is any dvantage to the pawnbrokers, I am willing to ithdraw my objections.

2475. If the pawnbroker detained the person, gave him into custody, then you think he ught to be indemnified?—Undoubtedly; I think is only fair between man and man.

2476. Have you any objection to clause 11?—t is too wordy.

2477. Have you any objection to clause 13?—n regard to that clause I should like the Committee seriously to consider the position of the awnbrokers who advance the money. The remarks made by the bench in reference to taking stolen property at times, are quite absurd, ney are made by magistrates and judges, and re printed in the press; if one quarter of what as said by the judges and the magistrates was ue, the public at large would kick us out of the ingdom.

2478. We are not now upon the question of hat the magistrates say, but we wish to know hether you have any observation to offer with eference to clause 13?—I say we are fairly entitled to ask you that the pawnbroker shall not rfeit the money which he has advanced upon ny goods he has taken in, unless the authority ecide that the pawnbroker has been negligent, nd that he shall not have the money he has dvanced; but, unless the magistrate decides that here has been neglect on the part of the pawnroker, I say we are fairly entitled to the money.

2479. Are you aware that, according to the rdinary law of the land, if any person advances oney upon property which is proved to be stolen, he stolen property must be given back to the wner without the advance being repaid?—I dmit that, but it is unfair to the pawnbroker.

2480. Why should it be more unfair to a awnbroker than to anybody else?—If I stole watch to-morrow, should I go to a butcher and y, "Will you buy it or lend me money on it?" should not think of it; but everybody knows at by going to a pawnbroker they are supposed be in want of money, and it is his business to nd money.

2481. Supposing the person having stolen the atch takes it to a watchmaker and sells it, ould not the law compel the watchmaker who ought it to return it to the person from whom was stolen?—Undoubtedly.

2482. What is the difference between the case of the watchmaker and the pawnbroker?—It is not the watchmaker's business to lend money upon property; my shop is open for the purpose of lending anybody money who wants it; we value the property, and lend as much as it is worth, because we advertise to lend the utmost value; a watchmaker does not buy one second-hand watch for 5,000 that a pawnbroker takes in pledge.

2483. Have you any objection to offer with regard to Clause 16 in the Act?—There, I think, we are very unjustly dealt with according to the present law.

2484. Do you wish to explain something about the proceedings upon the affidavit?—I do; according to this Act of Parliament if a person came to morrow morning into my shop, and said, I have lost a ticket of a coat pawned for 10*s.*, I am bound to find it; she says, I will take an affidavit, and we are bound to give one; these affidavits go down to the police court, and the magistrate never examines or troubles himself about the parties in any way; in the City of London they generally put the seal of the court upon it, but in many courts they do not do that; she comes back, and pays the principal and interest, and we deliver the coat, or whatever it may be; if anybody came a month afterwards, and produced the ticket, I then find that we have no defence; now I maintain that this Act should throw the responsibility upon somebody, but certainly not upon the pawnbroker, who cannot know who pledged the coat three months ago, and cannot refuse to give an affidavit when asked for one.

2485. In those cases the pawnbroker makes no inquiry at all, but simply delivers the goods upon the magistrate's certificate of affidavit?—They come in to inquire for a certain parcel; they make a mistake in the day, they know the name, but as to the street, they never think about it; we find a parcel, and we show them the article, and they say, that is my coat, and we are bound by this Act to deliver an affidavit; the process is to walk down to Guildhall, the magistrate signs it, they come back and pay for it, and take it away.

2486. Mr. M. Guest.] Have you yourself had many cases of that kind?—I have not; but as we are going through the Act, we may just as well revise those absurdities. I have had one such case myself, but that is about five years ago; that is the only case I can tell you of in my own experience; but I maintain that you should either make the pawnbroker responsible, and then he would take more care, or you should make the magistrate responsible, and he would take more care; I do not care which it is, but let us know what is right; we do not know all our customers.

2487. Chairman.] Do you object, as regards clause 17, to the time being diminished?—I strongly object to that clause; I protest against it; if you make it less than 12 months, you will be doing an injury to the public, and to the trade at large. They admit that in the first three months, 80 per cent. of the pledges are delivered. A paper has just been put into my hands (I do not know by whom), in which I find these words, "However, the writer of this is able, by actual figures, to show that of the total number of pledges received, 95 per cent. are redeemed." I do not not know the author of this paper but I will accept that average. The trade is asking you to make it six months instead of 12; I say, as a pawnbroker,

2488. But supposing that the time were reduced to six months, the person who pledges the goods will be able to renew his pledge at the end of six months, will he not?—If they want to take it out or renew at the end of six months; they can do so now if they wish it. I am not going to dispute that it would be an advantage to the pawnbroker, because he would have his interest paid six months sooner than at present. I say as a conservative pawnbroker, that it would do us more harm than good. I fairly tell you everything that I know; the effect of this would be, that you would have a number of men coming into the pawnbroking trade, not so respectable as those who are in it now, and I, as a pawnbroker, say I do not want those men to join our trade.

2489. Supposing that the time generally were fixed at six months, and the parties had liberty to make contracts of their own, there would be nothing to prevent their making it 12 months if they preferred it, would there?—I question if our customers would know, if they pledged in February, when the six months were up. One honourable Member alluded to the sense or intelligence of those who pawned under 40 s.; I positively believe that if my customers had a ticket given to them to-morrow, many of them would not find out when the six months were up. If they pledge in January they would know that it was due in January, and in February the same; but if they pledged in June, and the interest was due six months hence, they would either forget it or they would not know what month it was without asking. I am sure I am speaking now on behalf of the trade when I say that the trade do not want it, and would be sorry if you granted it, and it would be a disadvantage to the public.

2490. What means have you of speaking the views of the trade?—Will you allow me to refer to some letters which I have received especially upon that point; they are all master pawnbrokers in a large way of business, in all parts of the country.

2491. How many letters have you received?—When I saw that Bill I invited my fellow-countrymen to write to me and express their opinions about this Bill.

2492. Having written to those pawnbrokers, how many wrote to you and expressed their opinions?—One hundred and eight.

2493. Have you 108 letters there?—No; because some simply wrote "Stop the Bill." These letters are strongly objecting to the six months' clause.

2494. How many letters have you objecting to the six months' clause?—I have not counted them; I have not got all my letters here.

2495. Do you think you have got a dozen?—Most decidedly; if you will give me a week I will give you 500 letters from masters in the trade objecting to the six months' clause.

2496. How many letters have you objecting to this six months' clause?—I have received more than these.

2497. But how many have you got there?—About 13, but I picked those out because they make a special point of it, and give reasons.

2498. Then you have 13 letters especially objecting to the six months' clause?—I have more letters from the trade than those; I do not want the Committee to understand that I have only 13 letters upon the six months' clause.

2499. You have stated that you have received 108 letters generally objecting, and that you have picked out those containing a particular objection to the six months' clause, and that they amount to 13, is that so?—Undoubtedly, but I only put my advertisement in on the Monday previous to the Second Reading; if you can show any advantage to the public, I, as a pawnbroker, will not say another word about it.

2500. Mr. M. Guest.] The Committee have heard something about the clothes being out of fashion, what is your view as to that?—That is all nonsense; if they come to my house I shall be glad to take them in.

2501. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You do not believe in the change of fashion?—A pawnbroker always wants to lend money; I want to lend more money than I am lending at the present time and I cannot do it, and to tell me that the change of fashion will affect me is all nonsense.

2502. Chairman.] Do you think that the system under clause 18 is a convenient system for selling pawnbrokers' goods?—Undoubtedly.

2503. Do you sell goods in that way?—If you destroy this clause it will amount to nothing, because I am quite sure that the pawnbrokers and auctioneers will arrange that we shall have a certain time or period to sell those particular goods they are works of art and paintings, and in a clothes' sale gentlemen will not waste the whole of the day to buy one or two paintings amongst a number of lots of clothes at a pawnbroker's auction sale.

2504. What is the value of that class of goods that you have sold in a year?—They do not amount to much. In the month of April 1869 I sold goods to the amount of 15*l.* 1*s.* Of course it is not a large amount, because they are peculiar goods.

2505. Is that about the average of your quarterly sale?—That is about the average of my quarterly sale; not more; but if those same goods had been put into a clothes' sale, I should not have got what I wanted for them, and they would not have fetched their value. It is a particular class of goods, and only a particular class of buyers will attend a sale, and if you destroy that, we shall make a sale of our own to suit the same purpose. If you could define that class of goods a little more strictly, it would be an improvement.

2506. Do you think it desirable that the person pledging should have the liberty of enlarging the time by their own notice for three months more?—Undoubtedly.

2507. Do you receive many such notices?—During the last three months, 384 persons have come to my shop and paid the three months' interest, including letters written to me to say please do not part with such-and-such goods for three months. The pawner is our best customer, and, therefore, as a trade question, it is folly to do away with the liberty of the pawner as to those three months.

2508. Have you many demands made upon you for the surplus on goods sold?—No; as far as that goes it is very small indeed; but I do not wish to deprive the public of that advantage.

2509. Are you satisfied with the hours during which hich you are required to carry on business?—ertainly not.

2510. In what respect are you dissatisfied?—have been on a committee on the subject, and had the honour a few years ago of speaking to e Right honourable Chairman about the Act, d he said to Mr. Hows and myself that if ere was a division among the masters of the ade there was no chance of obtaining an altera-n, and we withdrew the Bill. I am asking nourable Members to sanction that we should en at 8 o'clock in the morning and shut at o'clock in the evening all the year, with the ception of holidays and Saturdays.

2511. What hours would you fix on Saturday? Eleven o'clock, at present. One man in a ighbourhood will stop a lot of men who are lling to concede this hour night and morning keeping his shop open, compelling his neigh-urs to do the same or to lose some of their stomers, and no men work harder than Members Parliament and pawnbrokers' assistants if they their duty.

2512. Do you think that clause 22 of the esent Act, with regard to keeping a table of ofits is satisfactory, or that it would be better have a simple rate put upon the ticket?—I ve never put a table of profits in my shop ce I have been in business; I have some tables profits here, and if you gentlemen will tell me correct interest you would have to pay if you wn anything, I think my argument falls to ground. If you will tell me what the interest uld be upon 8 s. for seven months I shall be d, but I do not think you can do it.

2513. Then you think it will be desirable to e the charge put on the ticket?—Un-btedly; the pawner will then know what he to pay.

2514. What is the extent of the business that have been carrying on; how many pledges you take in the course of last year?—In 5 I took in 85,153 pledges.

2515. Can you state what the value of the dges was?—I do not know the value, but I t upon them 41,688 l. 13 s. 1 d.

2516. What is the average value per pledge? I have not worked it out.

2517. Have you the number of any particular nomination, as entered in your three books?—ly day by day; this is taken from the total of year; I can tell you for any day in the year, number that I have taken in, and the number t I have delivered.

2518. Take a Saturday; how many pledges there of 5 s. and under; how many of 10 s., l how many above?—Up to last Monday rning, 3,458 pledges under 5 s. have been en in the month of June.

2519. What was the number of pledges in the e time between 5 s. and 10 s.?—There were 00.

2520. And above 10 s., what was the number ing the same period?—Four hundred and nty-seven without the deposits.

2521. Do you think that would represent about average of the business that you do?—Un-btedly. It does not include the deposits that ake under 10 l., or the deposits over 10 l. If wanted 12 l. to-morrow I should not give you cket, and I should not put it in either of those ks. Over 10 l. I should make a special con-ct.

2522. Mr. M. Guest.] I see that you have one pledge for two guineas, which you charge 1 s. for; that is a great deal over the interest allowed, is it not?—It has nothing to do with the Act, which only allows 8 d. per month.

2523. Chairman.] Will you explain what are the transactions which you do under 10 l. which are not under the Act?—Here is the book (producing a book). On the 5th of January 1870, I lent a man, upon four reams of paper, 2 l. 16 s. by special contract, but there is a sixpenny agreement stamped upon it; he signed his name, and agreed to the charge.

2525. Chairman.] Upon what principle is it that you consider yourself entitled to make those special arrangements?—Because I am not doing it as a pawnbroking transaction. A man comes in and he brings in four reams of paper weighing 5 cwt. 30 lbs., or something of that sort. It will not suit me to lend 3 l. on it for 9 d. a month, and I say I cannot take it, but I will make a special agreement with you, if you like, for 1 s. 6 d. a month. He reads that agreement; I do not deprive the Government of any advantage; I always make use of a sixpenny agreement stamp, and he signs it.

2526. However, you claim the liberty of lending any sums upon any terms you think fit, if a person signs an agreement, is that so?—Undoubtedly I do, upon a sixpenny stamp, and I say it is quite right; I am taking no advantage of the Pawnbrokers Act in any shape or way.

2527. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is this usual with pawnbrokers?—It is usual with me, but I do not speak for anybody else. A lot of men say that that is illegal, and that I am robbing my customers when I do it, but I think they are very foolish.

2528. Do they say that you are acting contrary to the Act of Parliament?—Undoubtedly they do, but I do not entertain that opinion.

2529. Chairman.] You do not think that the Act of 1856, to amend the Pawnbroking Act, makes it illegal for you to do this?—Undoubtedly not, because my great point is this: a party comes in and I say, "I cannot take that, but I will enter into an agreement with you, between man and man; here is a sixpenny stamp that will make you abide by what you sign." They sign their names and they agree to that arrangement, whatever the amount may be, and I say that no court would say that I ought to give up that property when a man deliberately writes his name, and agrees to pay me 1 s. 6 d. a month for taking 5 cwt. of paper and lending 2 l. 16 s.

2530. If you are at liberty to lend that money, keeping a shop for the purpose, and you do not do it under the Pawnbroker's Act, for the same reason every other person may be at liberty to keep a shop to do the same; is not that so?—Undoubtedly, if they use a 6 d. agreement stamp with each transaction.

2531. What do you think of the provision of the Act which says "Every person who shall keep a house, shop or other place for the purchase or sale of goods or chattels, or for taking in goods or chattels, by way of security for money advanced thereon, and shall purchase, or receive, or take in, any goods and chattels, and pay, or advance, or lend thereon, any sum of money not exceeding

10 l., with, or under any agreement or understanding, express or implied, or which, from the nature or character of the dealing, may reasonably be inferred that such goods or chattels may be afterwards redeemed or re-purchased on any terms whatever": do you not think that the transaction which you have mentioned comes within that description?—Undoubtedly not; it has nothing more to do with it than I have to do with this chair.

2532. You are lending a sum of money less than 10 l. upon goods, upon an agreement to redeem them, are you not?—Undoubtedly; and an Act says I am to use a sixpenny stamp, and I use it.

2533. Is not such a transaction expressly prohibited by law?—In my opinion, decidedly not.

2534. Then you are of opinion that any person can keep a shop for the purpose of advancing money upon goods upon an agreement, upon any terms he pleases?—Undoubtedly, on a stamped agreement.

2535. Mr. M. Guest.] Do you enter such transactions in your books?—No.

2536. Are you aware that by the Act of Parliament pawnbrokers are bound to keep books?—I am not a pawnbroker in that transaction.

2537. Chairman.] Have you any legal advice about what you are doing?—I have talked to a good many legal men about it, and some say I am right, and some say I am wrong; but I think those are wrong that say that I am wrong.

2538. Then, in your opinion, at all events, there ought to be free contract for the purpose of lending money upon goods?—With a sixpenny stamp, decidedly.

2539. What has that sixpenny stamp to do with the question?—I think it has everything to do with it.

2540. In what way can the question, whether two people are at liberty to make a contract between themselves be affected by the mere fact that they pay for a sixpenny stamp?—A party comes in, and I make an arrangement that I do not take it as a pawnbroker; he agrees to that; I put a sixpenny stamp upon it, and he signs his name, and the date upon that stamp. That gives me a title to deal with that property; and to sell it according to the words of that agreement, but not as a pawnbroking transaction. What do I pay 20 l. 15 s. a year for? Simply that you may come into my shop if you want 1 l.; and I look at your watch, and I make out a ticket, and I give you the 1 l., and you go away without asking me any questions, what you will have to pay, or how long it will be safe; the Act is our agreement, you do not sign anything. I take no advantage of the Pawnbrokers Act in any way in my special agreements.

2541. Mr. Orr Ewing.] This book which I have before me is yours, is it not?—That book is the account of every pledge that I have received over 10 s. and that my customers have not applied to redeem, and that I sell by law under the hammer of some auctioneer. I am bound to account for every pledge, whether it is clothes, plate, or jewellery, if I lend more than 10 s., stating when I sell it, where I sell it, and what it fetches.

2542. Mr. Whitwell.] Being bound to put down the article which you sell, the person who has pledged, the amount advanced, and the amount for which sold, how do you fulfil that requirement by putting "deposit"?—I put that deposit in simply to save my keeping another deposit book, and also to show the profit or loss upon all my pledges and deposits.

2543. What does "deposit" mean?—It has nothing to do with pawnbroking; we call it in the trade "deposit." I call it a transaction which has nothing at all to do with the Pawnbrokers Act in any shape or way.

2544. This is a pawnbroker's book; tell me what distinction "deposit" means?—It means those transactions not carried out according to the Act of Parliament which governs our business.

2545. I find here, a person of the name of * * * pledging a diamond ring for 3 l., which sells for eight guineas; I find that the same person, at a different date, has a "deposit," on which has been advanced 15 l.; now what was that deposit which is marked in this book "Lot 21," which was sold by auction?—If I had brought you the two previous books to that, you would have seen the whole transaction. I am not bound to say whether it is a cow, or a horse, or a pair of boots. I can do what I please with those deposits, they are outside the Act of Parliament.

2546. Then this book is not kept according to the Act of Parliament, is it?—Yes, every pawnbroking transaction there is kept according to the Act of Parliament, but I can put in what I please, in addition.

2547. It is not a record of the transaction?—It is a record of every transaction under the Act of Parliament in regard to the Pawnbrokers Act.

2548. According to my understanding of the thing, the deposit ought to identify the article sold; is not that so?—You have nothing to do with the deposits in this Committee; you are upon the Pawnbrokers' Act of Parliament, and have nothing to do with them.

2549. You bring this book before the Committee to inspect; you sold on the 22nd February 1870, a large number of bats; what are bats?—Cricket bats, and capital ones they are too.

2550. Those were taken in pledge, I presume?—Yes.

2551. Were they afterwards sold?—I do not say that they were sold; we are bound as regards every transaction that I have over 10 s. and under 10 l. to account by a public auctioneer for what they fetch; but I do not sell all those pledges that I send there. I am there to buy them, and if the public will not come and bid what I think they are worth, I buy them myself; but I represent them in that book as being all sold; and they are legitimately sold according to the Act.

2552. The Committee wish to know exactly what this book records; I understand from you that the probability is that a number of articles which appear by this book to be sold were bought by yourself; is that so?—Undoubtedly; a good many of them, and especially lately.

2553. So that the loss which is marked in the two columns as a loss accruing on the transaction may not have proved a loss after all?—Undoubtedly; I have had my money for a lot of those pledges that I bought in for 20 or 25 per cent. less than I lent on them.

2554. And the probability is that you may have made a profit upon the transaction after all?—Undoubtedly, in many cases, but in the majority of cases I decidedly lose.

2555. The pledger has no advantage by any overplus in the sale; but you have bought them at a lesser sum than they were pledged for, and yo

ou have sold them afterwards at a greater sum; that the case?—Undoubtedly; I admit that.

2556. Mr. M. Guest.] They were sold by uction, and you bought them in?—Yes; I ought them fairly; I bid against the auctioneer, nd if there is anybody else there to bid more ey can do so. I am too happy to sell if I can, t I do not like to give my goods away.

2557. I understand you that you consider that ou can set aside altogether this Pawnbrokers ct by putting a sixpenny stamp upon an agreeent?—Undoubtedly.

2558. In fact, the sixpenny stamp, you conder, entirely evades the Act of Parliament?—ndoubtedly; it has nothing whatever to do ith the Act in any shape or way; if I did that ithout the sixpenny stamp, I admit that I should e doing wrong.

2559. May I ask what is your authority or recedent for thinking as you do upon the subct?—Only common sense; I am not up in law, t I have been into county courts, and have seen end of cases where agreements have not been awn out one-tenth as plainly as mine, and the e person sues the other, and gets a decision.

2560. Have you any knowledge where those ur reams of paper came from?—Not the ightest; it would not pay me to go into the ext street to inquire.

2561. But, surely, that seems to me as enouraging a trade of lending money upon what ight be stolen goods?—He looked as honest a an as I am.

2562. Mr. Whitwell.] With reference to lause 20, you propose to charge 6 d. instead 1 d., do you not?—Yes; I am compelled to eep an account; and here is my auctioneer's count, which came in this morning. I have to py his account into a book, stating when the rticle was pledged, the name of the party, the ate, what it cost, and what it sold for; and the erson can come to me and give me 1 d., and see at account. I say that it is absurd, and that e are entitled to 6 d. for anybody coming to now whether there is 1 l. profit, for instance.

2563. Do you think that when any overplus curs, it is only proper for you to inform the arty that an overplus has arisen?—I think that is quite right that we should do so; but it ould be perfectly impossible in my case, beuse I never ask anybody where they live.

2564. You say that the 21st clause is quite ght, but that the hours all the year round ould be from eight to seven o'clock, with the xception of Saturdays and holidays. And you ropose, do you not, that on Saturdays and holiays the shops should be open till 11 o'clock?—es; I hope the Committee will seriously conder that. The assistants fully deserve it; it ould be no disadvantage to us or to the public, we all closed at the same time.

2565. On the 22nd clause you recommend, do ou not, that the interest and the rate per cent. er month, should be endorsed upon the ticket, o that it may be an open and fair transaction etween the depositor and the pawnbroker?—Undoubtedly; and it would assist both parties.

2566. Then you propose, on some successive lauses, to revise them; what do you mean by hat?—They are too wordy; I am not well up n law, and I cannot understand them.

2567. You have a special reference to the 7th clause; you desire to limit the time for rosecuting by information, do you not?—That, I think, is a matter of common sense. If a person feels himself aggrieved against a tradesman, and if he does not find it out for three months, I think that it is fair to say that it is no grievance at all; but here 11 months and 30 days may go by before a man may come and state his grievance, and the tradesman could not recollect out of the number of transactions he had had since, the details of one.

2568. Have you known any practical inconvenience to arise from the 12 months being in the Act of Parliament?—Not at all; I never had a summons in my life for overcharges.

2569. We have here a Paper which has been put in, I believe, on your behalf, as showing the proceeds of your business in the year 1865; have you any objection to its being put upon the Minutes?—Certainly not.

[The following Paper was delivered in:—]

Witness.] With regard to the alteration proposed by the promoters, there is a proposition that we should have free-trade special contracts under 2 l.; I do not object to free trade in that way, in regard to special contracts over 2 l., but if you sanction a pawnbroker arranging with his customer what he should charge for sums under 2 l., the effect would be simply this, that every dolly-shop keeper and leaving-shop keeper will immediately rush off to Somerset House, pay his 20 l. 15 s., and become a pawnbroker, and you will immediately sanction that of which you have been complaining for years, as everybody knows the way in which they do their business.

2570. Do you mean to say that they would have power to charge such a large interest that they could pay for the license?—If you passed that clause you would sanction the very thing that they are doing, and they could charge what they pleased.

2571. Are the Committee to understand, that if there were free contracts for articles under 2 l., the business would be so profitable that every one would be induced to go and take out a license at once?—Undoubtedly; and you would simply sanction those dolly-shops, which, according to the evidence, are a great evil; you would make us all dolly-shop keepers, and the effect would be that the respectable pawnbrokers would go out of the trade; we should stink in the nostrils of the public in less than 12 months.

2572. I think we have your opinion very decidedly upon that; is there any other matter upon which you wish to offer an opinion to the Committee?—I think not.

2573. It seems that in the year 1865 you delivered pledges to the number of 80,991, that you took in pledges to the number of 85,153, that you advanced money to the extent of 41,688 l. 13 s. 1 d., and that the stock which you had in your business was 16,221 l. 12 s. 11 d., did that include the sale stock as well as the pawnbroking stock?—Yes; that was the gross stock, but it does not include any goodwill, lease, or fixtures.

2574. The expenses of conducting your business were 1,882 l. 10 s. 7 d., were they not?—That included all expenses except interest on my own capital.

2575. Did it include any interest on capital?—Decidedly, interest on the money which I owed; I have a book here for every day that I have been in business, showing every item of expense.

2576. Does that include interest for capital?—It does not include interest on capital of my own.

2577. Does it include rent, working expenses, and interest on money borrowed?—Interest on what I owed, but not on the gross amount, and all other expenses.

2578. You would appear to have made a profit of 3,006 l. 5 s. 4 d. upon a capital of 16,221 l., is that so?—That is so.

2579. What is the first item in this paper, called "delivered"?—That is pledges which I have delivered to my customers, and unredeemed pledges I have sold under the hammer.

2580. Then, did the pledges delivered amount to 40,926 l. 10 s.?—Yes; it was the best year that I ever had since I have been in business, but the unredeemed pledges sold are included in that amount.

2581. Mr. M. Guest.] You stated just now, did you not, that you thought it would be a great mistake to have free contract?—Undoubtedly.

2582. As far as I can make out, that is because you can break the law by putting in a sixpenny stamp yourself?—That is just the point. All the rest of the trade seem afraid to do it; I maintain that it is a legal and straightforward transaction, and if I could not justify it, I would not do it.

2583. Mr. Whitwell.] Then if there were any doubt about it you would wish it to be legalised by Act of Parliament?—Certainly. If you keep that sixpenny stamp out, you will legalise a man lending a poor fellow 2 s., and charging anything he likes for it, and that would be the dolly-shop system; but it would not answer their purpose if you made them put a sixpenny stamp upon it.

2584. Mr. M. Guest.] Can you explain to the Committee, then, what is the use of keeping books at all, if you go to the great trouble of keeping books, and the country go to the great trouble of passing certain laws, which laws you can entirely evade by putting on a sixpenny stamp?—If you think that a person wanting to borrow 6 d. of a pawnbroker, upon more than a pawnbroker's rate, will pay 6 d. to make the arrangement, you are mistaken. That sixpenny stamp is simply to prevent the dolly-shops being legalised, and if you do not sanction the same they will all be proper pawnbrokers, and we shall all be, I believe, dolly-shop keepers in the opinion of the public.

2585. In that case, would it not be better to throw the whole thing open to public competition?—You do not understand the question at present, I am quite sure; but if you would come and stand or sit in my shop, you would be far more able to deal with it.

2586. Was there any particular reason why there was a private contract made between you and this man who sold the four reams of paper?—I suppose that you will admit that he wanted the money, or else he would not have come. If he had wanted to sell that paper, he would not have got so much as I advanced him upon it.

2587. What was the reason that you entered into a private contract with him instead of doing it in the ordinary course of business under the Act?—Because if I had lent him 2 l. 16 s., I should have been entitled to only 8 d. per month, but I charged him, under my agreement, 1 s. 6 d. per month, and very cheap too.

2588. That is a matter of opinion; but what was your reason for getting the higher interest upon the four reams of paper?—Four reams of paper lying on the ground would be about four feet high, and would weigh between 5 and 6 cwt. If you consider that 8 d. per month will pay me to carry it into my house and lug it up stairs, I do not think it would.

2589. Do you think that any pawnbroker should be the judge of whether he should make a private contract according to the size or the different circumstances connected with the article which he has in pawn?—If the pledger is willing to pay 6 d. for the stamp, I think he is perfectly at liberty to make any arrangement he pleases.

2590. Do you have many of that kind of transactions with reams of paper?—I cannot get enough of them; if I thought I could get them, I should advertise for them; but trade is very scarce and I cannot lend my money; I have 500 l. in the till now, and some more in my bank.

2591. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Did you not say that you borrowed money?—I do borrow money; I could not carry on my business unless I did.

2592. Mr. M. Guest.] I suppose the police have no power to look into the book which you have shown the Committee?—Not unless they have the counterpart.

2593. They can examine your other books, can they not?—No, they cannot examine my books; but I allow them to do so because I and the police understand one another, and if they want any information I give it to them.

2594. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I should like to have an explanation of the last answer, in which you said that you and the police understand one another?—Simply this; that the police in my district know that I am a respectable man and that I have assisted them upon many occasions and given people into custody. There are the records of the Guildhall Police Court, and you can refer to them and have the clerks here to prove what I say, and many City policemen, to say that about anything that I think suspicious I give them every information I can.

2595. Mr. Richard Arkwright.] You stated, did you not, that one of the reasons why you objected to reducing the time during which pledges should be redeemable, was the fear that it would add largely to the number of pawnbrokers?—That is one of my reasons; I am here not in the public interest, but in the pawnbrokers' interest.

2596. Consequently you would consider, would you not, that it would be a boon to the trade?—Undoubtedly, but a great injustice to the pledger; I believe, as a pawnbroker, it would induce a number of men to come into the trade.

2597. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Are the names in these books real or fictitious?—A lot of them are fictitious.

2598. Then will you tell me that, in looking at this book, I can get no accurate information as to the parties pledging the goods?—About half of them I could not tell you anything, but about the other half I could.

2599. If the police inspected this book they ıld receive no more information from it than I ?—Not the slightest; because a man coming to and pawning a watch which was not his pro- ty, would say his name was Jones when it s Robinson, and that he lived in White Street en he lived in Black Street.

600. Then you acknowledge before the Com- tee, that you keep fictitious books?—I deny I say they are not fictitious, because I say t book is kept according to the Act of Parlia- ıt.

601. Are the names real or fictitious?—How I tell whether a man's name is Brown or ith.

602. To the best of your knowledge, then, y are real?—If I pawned anything I should give my right name; no more would you, or body else in my opinion.

603. I asked you that question, because I l in this book that a certain individual, on the h of August, pledged some goods for 24 s., . then during the week he pledged goods for ., 18 s., 18 s., 15 s., 25 s., 20 s., 12 s., 30 s., ., 22 s., 12 s., and 35 s.; all those are under name; I want to know from you, whether t name was a fictitious or a real name?—The ıe given there is the man's right name; he is of those customers that I know where he s; he is an important customer to me, as I ll loose money by him; he is a man who manu- factures cricket-bats; and for some years I have done a large trade with him, but now I think I have more bats in my house than he has money to get out.

2604. Are we to understand that you are opposing the general body of pawnbrokers in their application for alterations in the Act of Parliament?—According to the late Bill, decidedly; I would sooner keep the old Act, but I want more profit.

2605. Would you wish for any alterations as far as special contract is concerned?—Not under 40 s., unless as I do it with a 6 d. stamp.

2606. To speak honestly, is not your mode of doing business an evasion of the Act of Parliament?—Not in my opinion; but lawyers differ, and pawnbrokers differ.

2607. Do you think that every pawnbroker would be justified in receiving goods under 10 l. by special contract, as you do?—On a sixpenny stamp, decidedly.

2608. And you think that that would not be an evasion of the Act of Parliament?—Undoubtedly not.

2609. With reference to this special contract, I find several parties, and especially one man, pledging goods within a few days for 45 l.; 11 l.; 10 l. 5 s.; 10 l. 10 s.; and 20 l.; had this anything to do with what are called "duffer" goods?—No; but I have a sample of "duffing" goods in my pocket (producing the same).

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN MORRITT WALTER, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. J. Walter. 4 July 1870.

2610. Mr. Alderman Carter.] YOU stated the last time that you were before the Committee that you had a sample of what you call "duffer" goods with you; have you brought it with you to-day?—I have not; unfortunately I lost them going home; I have been looking for them, but cannot find them.

2611. I believe it is correct that the pawnbrokers generally have lost very much by this trade?—Undoubtedly.

2612. Is it the fact that the general public have lost as well as the pawnbrokers by this trade?—There is no doubt that the public have been defrauded by that system.

2613. Will you explain that to the Committee, because I wish the Committee to understand how the public have been defrauded and imposed upon by what are called the "duffers"?—The "duffers" pawn with pawnbrokers. They first of all deceive the pawnbrokers, that is to say, they represent things to be what they really are not; the pawnbrokers' assistants are deceived, and they get more than they are worth from the pawnbrokers, and then they employ somebody else to go and sell those tickets to the public upon the representation that the pawnbroker does not lend the value upon those goods. The parties who buy the tickets come to redeem them, and of course they lose the money that they have given for the tickets, and they do not get the value in the goods that they have paid for.

2614. Do you remember to have seen a number of letters in the papers about 12 or 18 months since, complaining of this trade?—I do.

2615. Were not those letters complaining that there was an understanding in many cases, betweeen the pawnbrokers and the "duffers," with a view of defrauding the public?—Undoubtedly; and a pawnbroker has been taken into court and has admitted his guilt, and was fined by the magistrate for that offence.

2616. Inasmuch as when there is, as you must know, an understanding between the pawnbroker and the party pledging the "duffer" goods, there is no protection to the public, can you suggest any means of protecting the public from those frauds on the part of the unprincipled pawnbroker and the "duffer"?—I can do so, and I hope that this Committee will carry my view out if it is sound. I propose that any one pawning a pledge for any amount with a pawnbroker, if he find before it is run out of time that it is out of hi power to redeem it, or that he wishes to dispos of it, he shall go to the pawnbroker and give i his duplicate and a small fee to cover the expens of the sale, and that the pawnbroker shall be boun to sell that particular article by a public auctionee at his next auction sale, and that it should b illegal for a party who has pawned anything wit a pawnbroker, to sell the ticket. That is th only remedy which I can imagine which wil cure this evil.

2617. Do you know of a practice among pawn brokers, of making up the goods which they d not succeed in selling by auction, putting paw tickets upon them, and then giving those paw tickets to their customers to sell, and thus b those means defrauding the public?—Undoubt edly we of the trade know it, through our protec tion society, but there are very few in the trad who would do such a thing.

2619. Do you think that it would cure th evil if a clause were inserted in a new Act, t deprive a pawnbroker of his license if he wer convicted of any such practice?—I think th my view would be much more sound, because man would never lock up property with a pawn broker when he could sell it under the hamme If you made it illegal for a person to buy pawn brokers' tickets, no one could be defrauded regard to the article which the ticket represent The evidence which you have had has, I thin satisfied you that nothing is more false than th a pawnbroker derives a large profit on the sale unredeemed pledges, taking the whole of th unredeemed pledges which he sells, or that th amou nt which he receives comes to the principal interest. I do not think there is a house h can show such an account.

20. What was done with those pawnbrokers were brought up under those charges to h you have referred?—One of them was or punished at Worship-street. He ad- d the transaction and paid the penalty; but get now exactly what took place there.

21. Mr. Whitwell.] What is the penalty for ing goods, intended to deceive the pawn- er; that is to say, "duffer" goods: is it ob- ng money under false pretences?—When an make a case, it is obtaining money under pretences, and we have several times suc- ed in punishing them; but a more difficult we cannot have to deal with.

22. In a list of articles sold by auction which left with me on the last day the Committee one column represents the goods sold, and ier column represents the goods bought; is so, is it not?—That is pledges bought by lf.

23. Is this a true representation of the goods on behalf of the pawners, you being a pur- er at the sale of the goods?—I bid against public at the auction sale, and I am sorry to that I buy more goods than I wish upon y occasion.

24. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you know of actice of this kind, where a pawnbroker for "duffer" goods puts on the ticket a much er sum than he lends, so as to enable the ffer" to sell the ticket with more advantage mself?—There have been cases where pawn- ers have admitted that fact, and have returned noney of which they have defrauded the pub- but there have not been many such cases.

25. Colonel Beresford.] I suppose you wish o understand, by your saying that you buy le than you like, that you bid for them in r to get a good price, and that then they knocked down to you unexpectedly?—Un- otedly. When we sell the goods of course enter what they cost, and then two of my ng men go through them without knowing t they cost, and put their judgment upon article. If the room (that is, the public,) more than our judgment, they have the ds; if they bid less I buy them in myself, purchase them as if I was one of the general lic.

26. Mr. T. Hughes.] Then how do you wish lter the auction system?—The honourable nber for Leeds referred to this selling of licates. I have thought over this matter, I can see no other cure whatever for this but this: that as regards any person pawn- a pledge for any amount at a pawnbroker's, rom disinclination to redeem it, or from not ting the article, he does not redeem it, and as reason to believe that the article is worth e than it is pawned for, he should go to the nbroker and say, "I cannot redeem this, I h you would sell it by auction at your next ," I would make the pawnbroker deal with it separate transaction, so as to enable the pawner ecover the overplus. There are a large number people who pledge articles with pawnbrokers, resenting that the articles which they pledge of higher value than they are really worth, then they sell the ticket to some other person; t they rob the pawnbroker, and then they rob parties who are fools enough to buy the tickets, and that is an evil for which I cannot see any remedy without making it illegal to buy and sell pawnbrokers' tickets.

2627. But the pawnbroker and the pledger might arrange that now, might they not, without any change in the law if the pledger came to the pawnbroker and said, "Put it up at your next sale, I cannot redeem it"?—That applies only to pledges over 10*s.* If you do not redeem the pledge, I am bound, at the expiration of 12 months, to sell it by auction.

2628. In the meantime the pledger can come to the pawnbroker and say, "Please put that up, and let us get rid of it"?—We are not allowed to buy anything in our business, but I want to stop the "duffers" selling their tickets.

2629. But you are allowed to sell, are you not?—I do not know any pawnbroker who would sell a thing unless it was out of time.

2630. What change with regard to auctions would you propose?—It simply applies to this question of "duffing" goods. If you make it illegal for a person to sell a duplicate, you immediately stop the "duffer's" occupation. He first robs us by misrepresenting the value of the thing, and he next robs somebody else by representing that it is worth much more than it has been pawned for. I cannot suggest a remedy, except making the sale of duplicates illegal.

2631. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would you extend the sales to articles below 10*s.*?—Only when asked by the public to do so. As a rule, it would be ridiculous to sell every article by auction; but I would give the pledger the power to go to the pawnbroker and say, "I demand that this be sold by auction," giving his name and address, and a fee, and let the pawnbroker forward the account of the sale to him. That would kill the "duffing" trade, and I cannot see any other way in which you could possibly deal with it.

2632. Mr. T. Hughes.] Then do I understand you to say, that you would like the Act in future to apply to all transactions of any amount?—I do not object to it, but under 10*s.* only, at the express wish of the pawner.

2633. I thought you distinctly seemed to approve of it?—I say that you cannot do away with the evil without doing what I have stated. Let every transaction be a pawnbroking transaction of whatever amount it might be.

2634. And you do not think that there are sufficient grounds for any distinction either of 10*l.* or of 40*s.*, or of any other amount?—No; but under 10*s.* I do object to being compelled to sell by auction. The small amount and the expense render that impossible; but I would give the pledger the right, if he felt he could not redeem, to come and say, "I wish that coat pledged for 4*s.* to be sold by auction, and let me know the result;" and I would make it illegal to sell the ticket. You would by that means immediately cure the "duffing" trade in which some people have said here that there are 10,000 persons employed; and I fully believe it.

2635. Chairman.] How much would you charge for the special sale?—I alluded to 6*d.* instead of 1*d.* I think that would satisfy the trade. You would be astonished to know the few instances of persons applying for an overplus. For 1*d.*, a person now can demand the whole transaction. I say that is ridiculous. If it is worth while coming, let him pay us 6*d.*; and I think that would be a fair sort of thing between man and man.

2636. Mr. T. Hughes.] Sixpence is rather heavy, is it not?—I was alluding at that time to a transaction over 10 s.

2637. Chairman.] Do you think that it would be fair that the pledger should pay 6 d. in a special transaction over 10 s.?—Yes, undoubtedly.

2638. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You stated, did you not, the last day that you gave evidence that people were so loath to give their real name and address that you had ceased to ask for the name and address, and that you put down anything out of your own imagination?—I beg your pardon, not the name; my remarks applied to the number of the house and the street, and the "housekeeper" and "lodger."

2639. Chairman.] And the Christian name?—And the Christian name.

2640. The surname is what you ask for, is it not?—Undoubtedly.

2641. And nothing more?—Nothing more, I think; it is against human nature to say that they would give their right names if they wanted to borrow 5 l. or 5 s.

2642. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] What do you think is the reason that people are so loath to give their names?—There is a pride about our customers; they do not like to go into a pawnbroker's for a loan of 5 s. or 10 s., giving their names and addresses, because it is not like a solicitor's office or a private office; but we have 10, 20, or 100 people at one time in our shops.

2643. Do you know any other trade where the same dislike exists to giving a proper name and address?—I do not know any other trade that is in the same position.

2644. Chairman.] Except the trade in poisons; pledges and poisons are on the same footing in that respect, are they not?—Yes.

2645. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Do they not give their right name and address?—I should say they did, but that is different to pawning an article for 2 s. 6 d. or 5 l.

2646. When some pains is taken to discover the name and address of the person who is pledging an article, do you think it is not useful?—I do not think there is the slightest use in it, in any shape or way.

2647. Do you think that the parties doing business should not be known?—If you could show me how I could carry on my business under that system I should be very happy; but I say it is perfectly impossible.

2648. It would be a great trouble to the pawnbroker, but would it not be a considerable benefit to the public?—Not the slightest in the world.

2649. Would it not prevent the possibility of stolen goods being often pledged?—Undoubtedly not; if a person goes into my shop with a stolen article, he gives a false name and a false address, if it is asked.

2650. Supposing that he were obliged to bring a known householder to certify to the fact that he was a bonâ fide customer, and that his address was correct; would not that obviate the difficulty?—My shop is not large enough to do my business in at the present time, and it would be worse still if every pledger had to bring a householder with him every time he came to my shop.

2651. But what do you think would be the effect upon the public?—I do not think that you would get a householder to come and trouble himself about such a matter; if he did he would want to be paid for his trouble. I should lik this Committee, if it was within their power, t order every pawnbroker in Great Britain to sto lending a farthing to anybody for a month. N thing else, I believe, will enlighten the public to what pawnbrokers do, or what they are require to do, or what use they are to the community large.

2652. You heard the evidence of Mr. Keeso who told us that in France they did not allo anyone to pledge an article for a smaller su than 2 s. 6 d.; would you have any objection that system being introduced into the pawn broking of this country?—I think it would b very hard upon the poorer classes.

2653. But would you have any objection, as far as your own trade is concerned?—So far my own trade is concerned, I should not ind vidually object to it.

2654. It is not a remunerative business present?—The low business does not pay suf ciently.

2655. Do sums so small really confer mu benefit upon anybody?—If they want a shillin it is very useful; there is no other mode of gettin it; poor people cannot borrow; if they borrow a shilling of a friend, he would want a pot of be when he lent it, and a pot of beer when it w repaid, and that would cost about 8 d.

2656. Are those small sums generally spent pots of beer?—I believe the borrower would ha to stand at least a pint of beer, which wou cost 2 d.

2657. Supposing that they had not the facili of obtaining money by pledging articles, wou it not make poor people more frugal?—Wh the Education Bill has been in force for abo 50 years, I believe it will have a great effe upon them; but I think that at present it wou not be of the slightest use in that respect.

2658. Do you think that if the people were a better position as regards education, there wou be less pawnbroking?—Undoubtedly. I thi many of my customers are very foolish; th appear to be about 10 s. behind the world.

2659. You have stated, have you not, that t parties dealing with you were so ignorant th they could not properly understand transactio under the special contract system?—Yes, u doubtedly; I have taken the last 24 affidav from persons who have lost their tickets, and o of the 24 there are 13, none of whom could wr their names (handing in 13 affidavits). My you man had written the name, and had put "h mark," and the pledger has made a cross, and t magistrate signs it, and I deliver the pledg those parties would not be able to deal wi these special contracts; it would be impossib I hope that the Committee will give serious co sideration to that question; to allow contracts be made, and any interest to be charged, wou be taken advantage of by a large number people, and would cause more litigation, and mo complaints before magistrates than anything e could possibly do; over 40 s. I have no objecti at all to special contracts.

2660. Mr. T. Hughes.] Will you explain a mark which you made just now, that is, that y would be glad if we had the power that we shou stop all loans made for a month, because you s that the effect would be to show somethin what would it show?—I believe that the pub have no idea of what use a pawnbroker is to t nation; I maintain that it would make a revo ti in a small way; you have no idea what it d cause; as to the landlords they would not their rent, which would be an inconvenient ; another thing would be that it would very h inconvenience the public generally, the le as well as the lower classes.

61. Do you think that it would make it that the pawnbroking business is one of great value to the lower classes?—Unitedly, and that the business of the country l not be carried on, I believe, without it.

62. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] The pawnbroking ness you mean?—No; I mean the business e country; pawnbrokers are as necessary to ation as bankers are to the tradesmen, and e the bankers of the poor people.

63. Mr. Hambro.] Is it not the fact that brokers have a table of interest which they in their own possession, and on which they late the rate of interest to be charged upon hole; have you a printed table of interest h, I believe, is published by the editor of Pawnbrokers' Gazette"?—I have, but that d not enlighten you on anything you ought y, if you pawned anything at my house ling in a paper).

64. Is that the one which is generally in use e trade?—That is according to the Act of ament; it is no information to the public.

65. Is this the one generally used?—Yes.

66. Is it affixed in the shop where people ee it?—It ought to be; but I have never one in my shop.

67. Are you aware whether it is generally where the public can see it or not?—As a it is.

68. The 3rd section of the Act says, "That ll cases where any intermediate sum lent any pawn or pledge shall exceed the sum of 6 d. and not exceed the sum of 40 s., the pertending the same shall and may take by way rofit as aforesaid, at and after the rate of 4 d., no more, for the loan of 20 s. by the calendar th, including the current month as aforesaid." you aware whether this table is calculated ctly?—A large number in the trade believe at fractional rate; but I do not.

69. But is it the custom of the trade in the which they adopt to ignore the fractions of ings?—A large number agree with me, and re fractions.

70. Is it their custom to do so?—A large ber do not take the fractions, and a large ber do take the fractions. I am one of those do not take the fractions, because I do not ve that the Act of Parliament meant it.

71. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You do not obey Act in that respect?—I do not obey it. decision is not so satisfactory as to cause a to give up 10 l., 15 l., or 20 l. per annum, or tever it may be.

72. Colonel Beresford.] What rate of intedo you charge for 3 s. for a month?—Three ings for a month, and three farthings for y month afterwards.

2673. What do you charge for 4 s.?—One penny per month, and 1 d. for every month afterwards, so the Act distinctly says, and my customers know it; they know what they have to pay. Mr. J. Walter. 4 July 1870.

2674. Mr. Hambro.] Is there not another pawnbrokers' rate of profits for sums above 5 s., this being only up to 5 s.?—No, that is the only one; it is a copy of the Act of Parliament. There is a difference of opinion about the reading of that Act of Parliament. The matter has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, but it was so unsatisfactory that I admit that I do not agree with it. With regard to the question of free contract, I should like to ask how it would apply to towns where there are one, two, three, four, or five pawnbrokers. In such cases the customers of the pawnbrokers would be entirely in their hands. I think it would be very unfair.

2675. Chairman.] Your practice of making free contracts, whether legal or illegal, has been limited to pledges of what amount?—I have made them down to 30 s., but always use a sixpenny stamp; that is my argument upon those transactions.

2676. And the practice which you have taken to yourself you would not allow to anybody else?—Undoubtedly I would; I think it is right and legal; and if you will allow anything to be done on a sixpenny stamp, it will prevent those dolly-shops and leaving-shops being legalised.

2677. Mr. M. Guest.] You do that now?—I do. My point is that I am doing that which I am entitled to do; and if you sanction that, it would prevent a man lending 2 s. and charging 2 d. or 3 d. a week, because they would not pay the 6 d. for the Government stamp. Free trade in pawnbroking has been tried for years in Australia. I have not heard it mentioned in this Committee, but it was tried in Australia, and there it failed in toto. Mr. Mechi, the Attorney General, in 1859, in less than a week, got the Bill read a first, second, and third time to put a stop to it.

2678. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not pretty much like free trade if you set the Act of Parliament at defiance, and say that you are not bound by it; is not that free trade to all intents and purposes?—It is my reading of the Act; you and I differ upon it, and so did the judges at the Court of Queen's Bench.

2679. Supposing that every pawnbroker read the Act as you do, there would be no Act of Parliament for pawnbrokers, would there?—I beg your pardon; I strictly adhere to the Act as I read it. In Australia the charges were so extortionate that Mr. Mechi, the Attorney General, happened to hear of it, and they put a stop to it immediately.

2680. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] What is the system now?—A fixed rate.

2681. Is it the same as it is here?—It is a fixed rate, but it is very much more per cent. than it is here.

Mr. Richard Attenborough, called in; and Examined.

82. Chairman.] Do you carry on the busiof a Pawnbroker?—I do.

83. At what place?—In Piccadilly.

84. Do you carry on business chiefly in small rge pledges?—In large pledges.

2685. Do you carry on business to any considerable extent above the pawnbroking limit by special contract?—To a considerable extent. Mr. R. Attenborough.

2687. Do you look for your remuneration, or for your profit, chiefly to pledges below 10 l. or above 10 l. relatively to the capital employed?—I look upon my business as an investment of my money in this way: that if I get so many thousands invested at 15 per cent. per annum, I know the working expenses range from 5 per cent to 7½ per cent., and then there is 7½ per cent. profit. I know that over 5 l., every pledge is paying 15 per cent. per annum, and the working expenses run over the whole amount; and that removes all necessity for going into the cost of the lower pledges.

2689. Is it your opinion that the scale of profit diminishes with the value of a pledge under 1 l.?—It is.

2691. Do you find that there is a disposition to bring inferior goods, and to pledge them beyond their legitimate value, and that that occurs chiefly in the smaller or higher classes of goods?—The "duffers," whom I have heard mentioned, are not at all particular. If they think they can do you with a 50 l. pledge they will try it, just as much as with a 50 s. pledge; but with the larger pledges we have a much more respectable class of people to deal with, and we are much better able to distinguish between a gentleman wanting money and a person pledging goods for profit.

2692. Do you think there is any advantage on having a fixed statutory rate for pledges under 10 l.?—I do.

2693. What, in your opinion, is the advantage derived from that?—I think that the poor people certainly ought to know what they are going to pay, and my chief reason for wishing to give evidence is that, under the present Act of Parliament, I do not think that they do know anything at all about what they have to pay. I think that the rate of taking profit should not be a rate of interest for pledges under 2 s. 6 d. It is not a rate of interest at all, but it is a fee for the loan of the money, and the work done is the thing which is paid for, and not the interest for the money. Sometime ago I thought it out rather carefully, but my own idea would be that a person borrowing 3 s. should pay a penny, that whether he redeemed the pledge in a month or two months (I would work it out carefully if your honourable Committee wished me), that he should pay a penny at the time of pledging, and nothing when he redeemed it; that for three or four months he should pay 2 d., and that for five and six months he should pay 3 d. When the pledge is made he should pay the first 1 d., and when it is redeemed the second 1 d., and I would have no half months and odd days. The odd days I think are a great mistake. If a person pledges an article, he knows that on the 31st day he will have to pay a second month's interest. The pawnbrokers cannot alter it at all, so that it is their interest to go on the 30th day, and it is no use trying by giving 10 days grace to evade it. That would be much more simple, and I am quite sure that the poor people would save more money by having an explicit rate where they had not to calculate farthings and where they had not to calculate half months but where everything was laid before them when they went into the pawnbroker's shop, 99 out of 100 poor people who go to redeem their pledges are entirely dependent upon the pawnbroker as to how much they have to pay; whereas if it were a simple rate, the pledger would reckon up his money and pay it, and if anything were wrong he would go and inquire about it; it is utterly impossible for them to do that now.

2694. Then would you have that charge printed on the tickets?—If you charged a 1 l. when they pledged the article, and if at any time within two months they might have it back for nothing, it would become familiar to them in less than a month.

2695. For what period do you think it desirable that goods should be pledged, so as to enable the pawnbroker to sell if they were not redeemed?—I quite agree with the six months' forfeiture, especially for wearing apparel and those things; I would not make any difference for plate and jewellery, but the great thing is to keep simplicity, and to get a uniform system as simple as possible.

2696. Without giving odd days of grace, that a month means a month, and not 27 days or 30 days?—Quite so; half the people know nothing about the three months, and those who do forget it when the three months have expired. It is the elaboration of the Act which makes it so unsuitable I think.

2697. Do you think that up to a certain time there ought to be a positive fixed scale to which everybody could refer?—I think so; for instance if you have free trade, you will have every dolly shop keeper a legitimized pawnbroker, and I cannot think that the persons who advocate free trade would like to associate themselves with such persons.

2698. At what point would you have special contract?—I am quite satisfied with the present limit, but I do not think there would be any harm in reducing it to 5 l., although I think it would make the trade more difficult to carry on.

2699. Have you considered the expediency of having a fixed simple rate, such as you have described to take effect in case no special contract is made?—Certainly.

2700. So that the party might have the option either of proceeding upon the Parliamentary rate, or of making a special contract?—I do not know that I should give the privilege of making a special contract for small sums.

2701. Supposing that there were a Parliamentary rate, unless there were special contract, what limit would you fix for the option for special contract?—I have not thought it out carefully, but I should think perhaps up to 3 l. or 5 l.

2702. Have you had any experience in taking in small pledges for articles of domestic convenience which require trouble and space?—Yes; I know that they do not pay for the trouble that they give; it is quite certain that they do not.

2703. Therefore, do you think that pawnbrok

4 July 1870.

brokers are prevented from advancing upon a rge class of commodities?—Yes; my own men ok in a grand piano some time ago for six uineas; all I could charge was 1*s.* 6¾*d.* or . 7*d.* per month for that, and then I should be ound to keep it for 12 months, and warehouse , and sell it by auction; whereas any of those rniture warehouses would have charged, I ould think, at least 1 l. for warehousing alone.

2704. There is an established rate, is there ot, for warehousing pianos by people who make their particular business?—I do not know it of y own knowledge, but I have no doubt that ere is a rate.

2705. Do you consider that you should have a ght to charge that warehouse rate?—I think at it would be a very fair thing to allow ware- use room to be charged for upon all bulky ticles, and I think it might easily be arranged.

2706. Do you think that it would pay to take a feather bed for 5*s.*, for instance?—I do not; the first place, it has to be taken in and folded , and it is a very great trouble to fold it up; I ve folded up many a bed of the kind.

2707. Do you think it desirable that the public ould have the convenience of having money lvanced upon every conceivable article?—I ink it would be an advantage to the public that gitimate traders should be able to do their busi- ss. If the legitimate pawnbroker cannot do e business, they are sent to brokers and leaving ops, where, no doubt, needy people are plun- red.

2708. Do you find that any advantage arises om the provision which compels you to endorse e charge upon the duplicate?—I rather like it. ou are able to see, in reckoning up your interest r the day, whether you have charged the right te, and you know very well that it renders it ry easy for you to calculate your day's profits.

2709. Do you find that the public look at the dorsement which you make?—No; the public ke no interest in the thing whatever.

2710. What is the object of the Act of Parlia- ent making a man do something which does not ncern the public?—I think the object of that ct was that the ticket should be produceable in se of an information; and it must, of course, nless forgery or a penal act was committed, be vidence as to the amount which was charged, d, of course, it it were endorsed for more than e interest due, it would be evidence against the wnbroker himself.

2711. Do you think that that is preferable to ntering the charge in a book?—Yes; I think it simpler and more satisfactory, because each ansaction carries its own evidence with it.

2712. Is the duplicate particularly capable of eing kept and identified?—Yes, it is used, be- ause no matter what laws were passed, I should ave every article crossed off in my book; that to say, I should put at the side of the entry in e book the day when it was redeemed, and ose tickets can be filed and kept. They are ept three years under Act of Parliament, and ere is no objection to that at all. To anything hich makes the business simpler I have no bjection.

2713. In point of fact, what is wanted is, that he pawnbroker should keep an accurate record f whatever charge he makes, so that in case of ispute as to legal charging he may produce his ecord made at the time?—Certainly it ought to e done.

2714. Do you think that if the rate of interest were made so simple that everybody could understand it, there would be any necessity for the Legislature to trouble itself about the record of the charge?—I do not know how the common law would act in case of anybody taking double the understood rate. That is for lawyers or law makers to arrange. It would depend upon the ease with which a pawnbroker could be brought to conviction, as to his taking wrong interest. It is not the amount of penalty, but it is the ease with which it is obtained. I think that a small penalty easily obtained would be much more conducive to the proper conduct of business than a large penalty very difficult to be enforced.

2715. Have you found any difficulty in applying the clauses which relate to the giving up of goods when the duplicate is lost?—My customers are very careful, and I have very few cases of that kind. Sometimes I break through the law. If it is a gentleman or lady they have a special aversion to going before a magistrate, and I very often allow them to have the pledge on having their receipt on the back of the ticket. I take care to know that they were the owners of the property when it was pledged, and I do not believe that the people would come to me with a lie, saying that they had lost the ticket when they had sold it. If I give up the property I render myself liable to an action for loss, but I run the risk on my own account.

2716. Has it ever been decided that if a man gets a ticket without notice to a pawnbroker he has any claim upon the pawnbroker?—I have not heard of any one suffering from that, but there is no doubt that we are liable; if we infringe the law we must take the consequences.

2717. What is there in the law which makes you liable?—Simply the fact that in case a person loses a ticket, an affidavit is to be made; and if we deliver a pledge without an affidavit, and the person has sold the ticket, I think we should be liable to the person to whom the ticket was sold for damages, at all events, if for nothing else.

2718. Has it been decided that the person purchasing the ticket can claim from the pawnbroker?—I do not know; I have never heard of it, but I should think his claim would be good without giving notice.

2719. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you remember any loss taking place through that?—I do not. If we know a customer pretty well, and know him to be respectable, we take the risk; at least I do; many people will not do so; most pawnbrokers insist upon the affidavit being taken, but my customers are of rather a respectable class; it is an exceptional business.

2720. Chairman.] Do you find, in your class of business, that there is any indisposition on the part of the pledgers to give their true names and addresses?—I think there is a very great objection to doing so.

2721. Have you your suspicions as to that?—Very great, except where the amount alone is sufficiently large to make it advisable to insist upon a reference to a lawyer, or upon some evidence of the person being entitled to the pledge. I think most gentlemen and ladies give a false name and address.

2722. They do not choose to have their true name entered in your books?—They do not; they have always an idea that if their name is given it is known or may be known.

2723. Or do they think that it may be used for some

Mr. R. Attenborough.

4 July 1870.

some purpose?—I do not think that is their idea; it is nervousness, I think, as to being short of money; it is an exemplification of the old adage of being poor and seeming poor.

2724. Do you think that the more respectable the people are the less they are likely to give their true name and address?—I think so; you have quite hit the blot.

2725. Therefore, the law only compels them, as it were, to tell a story?—As to asking their name and address being a guarantee as to the proprietorship of the goods, it is quite a mistake altogether; unless, as I have heard suggested here, you insist upon a housekeeper accompanying the pledger, which would be quite impracticable.

2726. If a person were honestly pledging goods, at all events he would not give his true name and address, I presume?—No, certainly not; although he is quite as likely to be a respectable man, and probably the more so, because he would have no fear of his name being known, if he did not think that it would have any effect one way or the other.

2727. With regard to the investigation as to whether a person is a housekeeper or a lodger, is the question generally asked, or is the form dispensed with as a rule?—I tell my young men to comply with the Act of Parliament; but if I went into the shop and found one of my young men wasting his time asking whether a pledger was a housekeeper or a lodger, when there was plenty of other work to do, I quite think I should say to him, you had better not waste your time in asking those questions, it is quite useless.

2728. Are many applications made to you in your better class of business to renew pledges?—A great many.

2729. Do you keep them under renewal for a considerable time?—A considerable time. I have pledges in my house that have been in the house I should think 20 years.

2730. Have those been steadily renewed?—They have been steadily renewed.

2731. Can you give the Committee any idea of the proportion of pledges that are abandoned to those that are redeemed or renewed?—In my case it is very small. I do not think it is five per cent. either in number or in the amount.

2732. Do you find as a rule that you gain or lose on the whole sale of your forfeited pledges?—I generally gain.

2733. Do you receive applications after the time has expired for the surplus in any cases?—I am sorry to say that I do; and I think it is unjust, for this reason: if I have a sale by auction, I sell from 1,000*l.* to 2,000*l.* worth of goods in a day; it is very seldom that I get the amount of interest to which I should be entitled if those goods were redeemed. I sell, perhaps, 10 per cent. of those pledges for a good profit, and a person comes and takes the overplus on those, while I have no opportunity of recouping myself on those I have lost by, so that the profit is all taken. I have known a case where some goods fetched a long price. I have paid the overplus on those goods, and instead of my goods paying me a profit, it has actually reduced the sale to a loss.

2734. Is it your opinion that the contract ought not to be one of absolute forfeiture in case of redemption?—I think it should be on small sums, but that on larger sums we ought to be bound to pay overplus. On sums under 10*l.* (and it is not in my own interest that I am saying this). I am quite sure that you might take 99 pawnbrokers out of every 100, and their sales do not pay them 15 per cent. of the interest that they would fetch if the goods were redeemed. I think it is a hardship for one customer who has, perhaps, been to the sale and seen his goods fetch 20 per cent. to go and take that overplus, and leave the pawnbroker to lose on those that sell for less than the amount.

2735. On the other hand would he not say that it was very hard that he should suffer loss because you had conducted your business incautiously?—There is that, but he has the opportunity of redeeming them; I really think that the competition is so great that it will always control the pledges, and the pledger knows that. He will not leave a sovereign for 17 s. for instance.

2736. In your case it would be necessary to alter the character of the contract, and make an absolute forfeiture if the goods were not redeemed, would it not?—I think that as regards the amount to which the Act of Parliament extends, it should be so.

2737. Then the pledger would have no cause to complain, because he would pledge his goods under the conditions specified?—Yes, any respectable pawnbroker would tell him when the goods are to be sold, and he can attend the sale and buy them if he likes; I have known a customer of mine go and attend a sale and buy the goods for less than the principal and interest; I had a case only six months ago, where a man bought a thing of his own pledging, for less than I lent on it.

2738. In that case do you consider yourself bound by law to give him the goods?—Yes, I am bound by law to give him the goods.

2739. But have you no right to claim the deficiency from the person who pledges?—Yes, I have the opportunity of summoning him at the county court.

2740. Mr. Hambro.] You can put a reserve price upon the article, can you not?—Yes; but it is better to sell it for what it is worth, than to lose the interest upon it; if I have lent too much upon it I have no remedy.

2741. Chairman.] But in that case have you not the same remedy as all Her Majesty's subjects, of suing the person in court to recover the money?—No doubt.

2742. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you ever buy in at your own sales?—I do.

2743. Chairman.] What is the time that you generally fix in your own contracts above 10*l.* for the redemption of the goods?—Six months.

2744. In those contracts do you provide for the sale of the goods?—Yes; it is stated in the contract.

2745. Do you agree to account for the surplus, if any?—I agree to account for the surplus, if any.

2746. And I suppose the person who borrows agrees to pay the deficiency, if any?—He does.

2747. On the special contracts, do you generally get the whole amount, or do you have occasion to call upon the borrower to pay the deficiency?—I do not think I have ever gone to law with a pledger for a deficiency; I may have threatened to do so, but I do not think I have ever recovered under such circumstances.

2748. In the case of large contracts, do they often drive you to sell, or are the pledges generally redeemed?—I think the average sold would be about five per cent. upon the whole of my siness.

2749. Do you think there is much difference that respect between unredeemed goods below l., and unredeemed pledges above 10*l.*?—No; ink it is about the same.

2750. Do you, in your special contracts, have rinted form which you adhere to?—I have.

2751. Does a pledger accept it, or not, as he ases?—I never had it once objected to in my . I never had a question raised as to the terms the contract.

2752. Have you a copy of it here?—I have ; but it simply gives me an opportunity of arging 15 per cent., with the power of sale.

2753. Will you send in to the Clerk of the mmittee a copy of your contract?—I will.

2754. Mr. Hambro.] Yours is, perhaps, the gest business in London, is it not?—I should ink it is perhaps as large as any.

2755. Is the new house in Piccadilly, at the rner of Sackville-street, yours?—That is mine.

2756. Have you found the business a remunetive one?—Yes.

2757. Are your expenses, in the trade, larger an the expenses in small businesses?—No; on contrary, they are smaller in proportion.

2758. I imagined that the articles pledged th you were so valuable, that you had to take re care of them; is not that so?—It is not at; we keep one good strong room.

2759. From your own personal experience, do u know much about the working of the Act ong the poor?—I do. I have done a very ge business, in the low trade alone, at one time my life.

2760. You say that you have lost by your es at auctions; does that mean that the articles ich you put up did not fetch the reserved ce?—We mark them at what we think the lue, no matter whether a pledge is for 5*l.* or ; if it is only worth 3*l.* we sell it.

2761. It is your idea that free trade in pawnoking would be very disastrous to the trade nerally?—It would be very difficult to say; I ink it would be very diastrous to the poor ople; it would bring in a very low class of rsons who would come into the trade, who uld defraud the poor. The trade is bad ough, and there are plenty of blackguards in now, and a very little more would induce me get out of it.

2762. In fact, do you think that free trade uld be injurious to the public and to the wnbrokers?—I think so.

2763. Mr. T. Hughes.] When you reckon 15 r cent. you reckon it because that is the rate which you do your contract business, I preme?—That is the rate at which I do my busiss.

2764. But for all the business below the rate which you begin to enter into contracts, you t a higher rate of interest according to the Act Parliament, do you not?—I do; but I should ink that 75 or 80, or perhaps 90 per cent. of my siness is 15 per cent, business. Sums up to l. are liable to 20*l.* per cent., and I should ink 90 per cent. of my business is 15 per cent. siness.

2765. You reckon, do you not, that the exnses of the business are 7½ per cent., the other lf being profit?—Yes.

2766. You stated that you think that pawnokers ought to be bound to keep a record of all their transactions; surely they are bound to do that now under the Act, are they not?—Yes; they endorse on the back of the ticket the amount of interest that they take, and they discharge that ticket in their books.

2767. But is not that almost as perfect a record as could be requird and kept?—Yes; I do not think that anything more is requisite; they are bound to keep that, and produce it if necessary.

2768. You do not propose to have any more stringent clauses as to that?—None at all; if that is properly carried out it is enough for all purposes.

2769. Mr. Mills.] You said, did you not, that all pledges below 3*s.* should pay a penny?—Yes.

2770. And you propose that the penny should be paid on the pledging for one or two months?—Yes; I intend that to be for two months.

2771. Instead of its being three farthings for a month?—Yes; that is to say that it should be liable to be redeemed at any time within two months for nothing; and that for pledges under 3*s.*, it should be another penny for two months longer. I would have no halfpence; I think all those fractional sums are a great nuisance; the people do not understand them, and if you give them farthings they give them to their children for suckers.

2772. Would you reduce the charge from three farthings to a halfpenny?—So many of the pledges are redeemed weekly, that although it would be an advantage to the poor in some cases, it would be an advantage to the pawnbroker in the other. I am quite sure that the advantage to the poor in knowing what they have to pay, and the calculation being so simple, would be a general benefit.

2773. You would have no time less than two months, and for that you would charge 1*d.*?—For that I would charge 1*d.*, including the ticket. My own idea is, to cover the expense of the transaction when it is carried out.

2774. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Supposing that the pledge was kept for 12 months, would it be 1*d.*?—No. In the first place I would say that it should be only a six months' transaction, and then I would charge 1*d.* for the third and fourth months, besides the penny taken when it was pledged; and 2*d.* for the fifth and sixth months; that would make it 3*d.* for the six months; 1*d.* when it is pledged, 1*d.* for the third and fourth months, and 2*d.* for the fifth and sixth months.

2775. Chairman.] A penny additional if it is redeemed within the third or fourth month, and 2*d.* additional if it is redeemed within the fifth or sixth month?—Quite so; they have got the expenses of the transaction paid on the first and second month.

2776. Mr. Mills.] You would wish to limit the time of forfeiture to six months, would you not?—I think it would be an advantage.

2777. Would not that be a great advantage to the trade?—The goods would be more saleable, and I think the poor people would be much better able to pay the interest.

2778. Of course it is a great advantage for a person to be able to redeem at the end of six months, if he can?—Exactly. For instance, in the spring a person pledges a thick coat or a blanket, or anything of the kind, and when the winter comes on he is reminded that he wants his things.

2779. Do not the seasons coming round remind him that he wants his things?—Yes, of course; and it induces him to redeem them, unless they are forfeited.

2780. He would make an effort then, I presume, because he would want the article?—No, not if it could go on; it is the recklessness of poor people which leads them to go on as long as they can; as long as they can go on they do not care; they will make any sacrifice rather than part with 3*s.* or 4*s.*, if they can do without the article.

2781. Do you approve of the principle of making the sale of tickets illegal?—I do not see that there can be any objection to it; I think it would stop a great many fraudulent transactions of advertising tickets, and all those things that have been referred to in the papers lately.

2782. How would you define bulky goods; where would you begin?—That is a very difficult point; it might refer to furniture; I do not know anything else that would require measurement; you might say that any goods were bulky which were over a foot square, or anything of that kind; I think it might easily be defined that goods taking more than a foot square of room should be charged warehouse room; the Act might be made to work fairly, I think.

2783. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You are not obliged to record transactions as to articles upon which you advance 10*l.*, or above that amount, are you?—No; but we do it for our convenience.

2784. Do you not think that a person having a pawnbroker's license should be obliged to record every transaction that he enters into?—I do not think that he should be obliged to do so any more than a banker.

2785. Do you think that your business is in the same position as that of a banker?—Just in the same position.

2786. Are you liable to be be imposed upon by stolen property being pledged with you?—I think that the greatest liability which persons doing a good business now undergo arises from the carelessless of housekeepers; I gave up 30*l.* worth of plate, a short time ago, that a lady's butler had pledged with me; he had been in the house 10 years, and those goods had been coming in and out of my house for 10 years, and they had never been in the plate chest the whole time, and yet a gentleman, a personal friend of my own, condemned me very much for taking them in; they were sent to me from Cheltenham, and several letters passed upon the subject.

2787. Have you many transactions of that kind?—I have transactions of that kind.

2788. Chairman.] Do you mean that you have transactions of that kind as regards the mode of pledging, or as regards the fact of the goods being fraudulently pledged?—I do not mean stolen property.

2789. Do you mean that you have many transactions of that character relating to stolen property?—No; I never had a case of that kind in my life before.

2790. Mr. T. Hughes.] Did you know that this was a butler who was pledging the plate?—I sent down to inquire of a gentleman living there, and he sent me word to say that the man was a most respectable person, and was living in a certain terrace; I know the brother-in-law of the lady; he was a baronet, and he scolded me very much; I said "I must listen to all you have to say, but if you go and scold your sister for never having her plate chest looked over, you will do a great deal more good."

2791. Was there a crest upon the plate?—There was a crest upon the plate; but I did not like the man's handwriting, and I inquired if the man lived in such-and-such a place; and I got information that he was a very respectable man.

2792. Mr. Whitwell.] Did the butler pledge the plate in his own name?—That I do not know. I happened to be going to my house one day when his letter was lying on the counter, saying that he had sent so many spoons, and that he wanted so many sent back again. I said, "What pattern is that?" They said, "King's pattern." "That letter does not look to me like the letter of a man who ought to have King's pattern plate." I said I knew a gentleman living in the town, and I asked him to inquire whether the man was a respectable man, and he said he was.

2793. When the honourable Member for Dumbarton put the question to you, whether you had many transactions of the kind, and you replied in the affirmative, did you refer to the fact of domestics frequently pledging their employers' plate?—Certainly not.

2795. And you give this as a special instance of the carelessness of housekeepers?—I did. That was a case that came under my own knowledge. I gave up 30*l.* worth of plate. That person had been dealing with me for five or six years at the least, and certainly I must have had more than a quarter of the plate of that establishment in my house for the whole of that time, and the people had never known of it.

2796. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You stated that you thought pawnbrokers should not be called upon to record their transactions any more than bankers; is it not the fact that bankers record every transaction that they enter into?—And so do pawnbrokers.

2797. You are not obliged to do it?—Neither are the bankers; they do it for their own convenience.

2798. But are bankers liable to receive stolen property in the same way as pawnbrokers?—I should think bankers receive fraudulent bills and stolen bills quite as much in proportion as pawnbrokers receive stolen pledges.

2799. Do you speak as to that from your own knowledge?—Yes, I speak from my own knowledge.

2800. Do you mean forgeries?—No, I mean property that they have no business to discount. My bankers are Messrs. Herries & Farquhar, as respectable a house as any in London; and I should think they get many transactions that they would rather not have entered into, just the same as I do.

2801. Do you not think that it is rather an anomaly that the same person who is licensed as a pawnbroker is obliged to record every transaction that he does below a certain amount, and that when he goes above that amount that regulation does not apply?—I do not think he is obliged to record any transaction simply because he is supposed to be a dishonest man. If I thought so I would not be in the business to-day.

2802. I am

2802. I am not speaking with reference to yourself, but with reference to the business?—I do not think he is expected to record every transaction, because he thinks his customers are dishonest men.

2803. Do you think it is a good thing for the public that a person licensed as a pawnbroker should have another shop for sale, where he can purchase and sell the articles pawned with him?—The Act of Parliament says he shall not do so, 2804. But you do so, do you not?—I buy them in by auction, and that is simply an advantage to the pledger.

2805. And you pass them into your sale-room?—I pass them into my sale-room.

2806. And your sale-room and your pawnbroking establishment are in one house, are they not?—My sale-room and my pawnbroking establishment are in one house, and I think it is a great advantage to the pledger, because if he came and saw his own property in my house he could come and have it.

2807. You are not under the inspection of the police at all, are you?—We are not.

2808. Would you object to being under the inspection of the police?—I should give up business the moment a policeman had the right to come into my house.

2809. Do you think any honest trader should object to the inspection of the police?—I do. Should you like a policeman to be allowed to come into your house?

2810. I should if I were in such a business as yours, where you run such a risk as to be giving money upon other men's property?—I do not give money upon other men's property, if I know it.

2811. I am quite sure that you would not do so; but are you not liable, as a pawnbroker, to accept property of that kind?—I do the best I can to prevent it, and 50 policemen would not make me do it any better.

2812. But would it not have tended to the discovery of this theft of the butler's if the police had had the power to go in to inspect your premises, and to see the articles that you have there?—If they did so we should not do any business; if you pledged your plate with me you would not like a police inspector to come in and report that he had seen Mr. Orr Ewing's plate in Mr. Attenborough's house. There is the simple fact.

2813. Would it not be good for the public that such power should be given, to detect such a case as you yourself mentioned just now?—No. In the first place, he would not have detected it, and in the next place, it would render my business perfectly useless or perfectly disagreeable, one of the two; as an honest man, I would not submit to it, and it would be an insult to every one of my customers.

2814. Are you aware that in Glasgow it is the law?—I am not aware as to the law in Glasgow, but if it were so, I should not be a pawnbroker in Glasgow.

2815. Are you subject to be imposed upon by stolen property?—I have been in Piccadilly for 20 years, and I think I may have had 30 such transactions, not more, that is about one and a half in the year, I should doubt if it is so many.

2816. I suppose that you might possibly have a considerable quantity of stolen property in your house without being aware of it?—I sell only about five per cent. of the whole of my transactions, and I should think I know nearly everyone of those customers that buy the goods I sell. Of course all those goods that are redeemed, you may naturally presume belong to honest people, and are their own property, so that I should think there is not one per cent of my business that is in the least doubtful.

2817. Your business is of a much higher class than usual, is it not?—I lend large sums of money.

2818. But in a lower grade than yours, do you not think there is a great chance of pawnbrokers having stolen property offered them?—Where a pawnbroker wishes his business to be conducted respectably, I am quite sure that every precaution is taken to prevent stolen goods being received. It is the greatest nuisance that can possibly happen to the pawnbroker; he has to give the property up, he has to send his assistants to the police court, and nothing injures our young men so much as having to loiter about at the police courts, or at the Old Bailey; I believe that many of our young men are ruined in character by having to loiter about the Old Bailey and the police courts.

2819. Do you think it would be a good thing to introduce into this country not to allow advances lower than 2 s. 6 d.?—So far as I am concerned, I think it would be a capital plan if there was a society established for lending needy people money for nothing. If any charitable society of that kind were started, I should be very willing to support it; I look upon pawnbroking simply as a matter of business, if a man borrows 2*s.* 6 d. of a pawnbroker, he does it because he really wants the money which will be advanced upon the pledge. Such a society might easily be established; as to the schemes for combining business and charity, they will never succeed, but if there were a charity established that would lend small sums without interest it would be a great boon, and might very well be carried out.

2820. Mr Hambro.] On the security of the goods?—On the security of the goods, and charging them nothing for it.

2821. Chairman.] In that case the loan would be made upon charitable considerations, would it not?—It would be a charity, and those people who were too proud (and I am happy to say that most Englishmen are too proud to have charity in any case) would not go.

2822. Mr. T. Hughes.] With respect to this police interference, do I understand you to say that you would entirely object to a law by which, not an ordinary policeman, but an inspector of police, might come and inquire about a specific article?—Certainly not; they do that now.

2823. You would not object to any clause that would strengthen the hands of the police in searching for a specific article?—Certainly not; but I think that any clause that said the pawnbroker should be bound to open his transactions to the police, would be iniquitous and unjust to all pawnbrokers in London. I do not know the nature of the Glasgow business, I am sorry to say; but as to the police having the right of coming and saying to me, "So-and-so's plate is missing; do you know anything of it?" my young men would not hesitate for a moment to answer the question; and if they had any doubt as to the initials on the plate, they would go and look, to be certain. The police have no difficulty whatever in ascertaining in respectable houses at the present time what pledges have been taken in.

2824. We have had some evidence that they have some difficulty among a certain class of pawnbrokers; are you aware of that?—I believe that has been very much owing to the manner in which the police have set about it. The police can be very offensive.

2825. But I did not understand you to object to such power being given to the heads of the police, as I have intimated?—I have not the slightest objection to submit to anything that an honourable man may fairly submit to, and I think there are very few pawnbrokers who would not submit to that, but to anything else I am happy to say I would not submit, and I think it would be very unjust to put upon pawnbrokers anything that would be derogatory to their position.

2826. Mr. Arkwright.] Is the law understood among pawnbrokers, that if a pledge is sold by auction for less than the money advanced upon it, there is a right of action against the pledger?—There is.

2827. Are actions often brought upon those grounds?—I have never brought one in my life; I believe there have been two or three, but I should think there have not been half a dozen since I have been in the business, 30 years; the county courts have afforded facilities for it. If a man is known to be an impostor, and has pledged property very often, knowing it to be pledged for more than it is worth, and he has set the pawnbroker at defiance, proceedings might be taken.

2828. As a rule, you have no way of getting it back?—No, as a rule you get your trouble for your pains.

2829. Colonel Beresford.] Did I understand you to say that the pledging of small articles was unprofitable?—Any pledge, I consider, on which there is a halfpenny taken must involve a loss.

2830. Do you know anything about the French Government system?—I do not; I only know that it is a monopoly, and of course there is no competition. They must get a profit upon the goods, but the restrictions as to the convenience are very great. For instance, you cannot do as you do in England; if you want a pledge out you must give notice for it the day before, or something of that kind.

2831. But the charge is not more than three or four, or five per cent. altogether, is it?—Yes; I do not know exactly how much it is, but I think, taking the average of their transactions, it produces over 10 per cent.

2832. That would be two-thirds less than it is in England, would it not?—That would be two-thirds less than it is in England.

2833. Calculating it upon the amount paid for interest upon small pledges, it comes to between 25 and 30 per cent., does it not?—I do not know how low the mont de piété goes, or how small a pledge they take in, or whether they lend any sum for less than a penny, but I have understood that their profits are rather over 10 per cent.

2834. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] In the case of those large robberies which have taken place in London lately, did the robbers go round to the pawnbrokers and offer the goods generally?—No, they are too good judges. For instance, in that case to which I have referred, the man ran the risk of being detected every day. It is the most risky place he can possibly go to, and a thief cannot go to a more dangerous place than a pawnbrokers. We do our business so as to get 15 or 20 per cent., but if a pawnbroker lends 2 s. 6 d. on a thing worth a sovereign, the house is known, and would be known as a "fence" in a very short time. When you lend money in the ordinary course of business, and are only liable to gain 15 or 20 per cent., it would not pay you for running the risk of taking stolen goods, consequently the moment you have the slightest suspicion, you say to the man, either be about your business, or you send to the police office.

2835. In that case of the butler which you refer to, did he give you his real name or a feigned name?—He must have given his real name and address, because I sent to the place.

2836. Was there a crest on the plate?—There were crests on the plate.

2837. When you wrote down to your friend at Cheltenham, did he go to the proper place?—He went to the proper place.

2838. Was the man living in such a house as that it might have been supposed that he might pledge such plate as that?—That is a question of opinion. There are many people living in small houses who own large quantities of plate. I had no interest except to find out what the man was, and who he was, and my friend wrote to me to say that he was a respectable man.

2839. Was this the house of his master?—No, he was a married man, living in a house of his own.

2840. You mentioned, did you not, that you had had considerable experience at one time in a lower business than you have now?—I had.

2841. What is your opinion as regards the licensing of pawnbrokers in reference to their business?—I think that if you made the license higher it might, perhaps, be better.

2842. Do you think that it would be an advantage that the licenses should be granted by the magistrates?—I do not think it would have the slightest effect, or that it is at all necessary. I should certainly not advocate it.

2843. Do you not think that in a case where the law had been contravened by a pawnbroker, it might be easier to refuse the license then?—I do not know. I do not believe there are two pawnbrokers in London who are habitually in the habit of contravening the Act. I am afraid I am wrong there as to the fractional charges; but I really have paid so little attention to that, that I ought not to say; but I think that pawnbrokers, generally, as a rule, would object to the license being controlled by a magistrate. I do not think it would be considered at all satisfactory.

2844. Do many of those "duffers" come to you with made-up goods?—Yes; I am sorry to say a great many men live by that, and nothing else.

2845. But a man who understands his business as you do, I suppose, would hardly be taken in?—It is not very difficult if you are busy. They generally find the time when your weakest force is available, and they are wonderfully clever, as all rogues are. If they would take the same trouble to be honest men, they would live a great deal better.

2846. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you lend anything on special contracts under 10 l.?—No, never. All I do below 10 l., I do strictly within the Act of Parliament.

2847. I understood you to say that you had had considerable experience in low pledges?—I have.

2848. How

2848. How long were you in that business?—as apprentice in a house where we used to liver 1,600 pledges on a Saturday night.

2849. Have you been in business, on your n account, where you took low pledges?—Yes, ad a place where a great deal of low business s done.

2850. With regard to the cost of pledges, ler 2*s.* 6*d.*, or under, say 4*s.*; I understood i to say that you would have 1*d.* only on those dges, and that you would have nothing on re-uption; that would be 1*d.* altogether for those pledges; do you think that that would pay? I do think it would pay.

2851. Have you had experience, as a pawn-ker, to justify you in saying so?—Yes; the inary business now pays with one halfpenny en at the time of pledging, and one halfpenny the time of redemption.

2852. But the evidence before this Committee that upon all pledges of that kind there is a s of three farthings. London pawnbrokers, and ers in that class of business, tell us that there a loss of from one halfpenny to three farthings all pledges of that kind; I have your expe-nce to rebut that?—In this case there are one two advantages that you do not quite detect; instance, I should take 1*d.* on every transac-n; consequently those goods that are not re-emed would pay the 1*d.*, and there would be ge advantage to the pawnbroker. Then the mense saving of labour in delivering the goods uld be very advantageous to him.

2853. A very large proportion of those small dges are redeemed within the first month; ing that into account, do you think that the . would pay?—I think that the 1*d.* would save reat deal of labour.

2855. You are in a neighbourhood where you not get that class of business, yours being ite an an exceptional business. You get dges for large amounts, and you have very tle trouble compared with those who are in a ry low neighbourhood; and as your evidence es so directly against the evidence of other wnbrokers who are in low neighbourhoods, I sh you to be particular in answering my ques-n?—I am inclined to think that a penny en at the time of pledging, and the ordinary urns of the business would produce a sufficient ofit.

2856. What do you mean by "the ordinary turns," because if their business were simply low pledges the ordinary returns would be ply twopence?—They would have the extra nth and the twopence and threepence; and the dges over 5*s.*, on which I should have a differ-t rate of course. I am inclined to think that a nny on every low transaction, taken at the ae of the transaction, would very nearly pay expense of the transaction; there would be other transactions to pay a profit.

2857. By your last answer I should gather t the system which you suggest with regard low pledges would not pay; if it would not y what would be the use of doing it?—I am t inclined to admit that it would not pay. I not know what amount of capital the pawn-ker would go into business with. If he has 0 l., or 400 l., or 500 l. to go into business with, he could do nothing but low business, and then he might not be able to get a profit out of it; but if he had a large capital then it would pay, taking advantage of a longer period on which to charge interest.

2858. Can you give the Committee the average number of pledges per annum in your business where you are situated now?—It would be very small.

2859. Then the average amount lent on each pledge would be very large, would it not?—It would. I have a pledge at the present time waiting for me to get home, for 3,000 l.

2860. You stated, did you not, that you got 15 per cent. on your pledges?—Yes.

2861. But your expenses cannot be 7½ per cent. out of the 15 per cent.?—That is what I reckon; I have not gone into it very narrowly; you see I do a sale business as well.

2862. But you are telling the Committee what are the profits of those other gentlemen; I should like to know what are your average number of pledges during the year, how many assistants it requires to manage that business, and what is the cost of managing your business, and then I could get at what is the amount of profit that you are able to make?—I should think I do not take in, on the average, 30 pledges a day.

2863. Then yours is principally a sale shop, is it not?—It is scarcely a guide as to other businesses; I only go from what I know of the business that I used to do, and that I used to do more of; I cannot help thinking that if we had had 1*d.* on each transaction then we should have liked the business.

2864. Mr. Whitwell.] With regard to the "duffing" trade, I think you said you are acquainted with it?—Yes, I dare say, at times we take in a "duffing" pledge.

2865. Are the goods made for selling in those cheap shops, which are always selling off their stock within seven days, or are they made simply for the purpose of deceiving pawnbrokers?—Some goods are made expressly for the purpose; but they attend our auction sale, and buy our own goods, and then pledge them; for instance, our goods are sold for exactly what they are worth in the trade.

2866. Are those goods manufactured in London, Birmingham, or Sheffield?—The new goods are manufactured in Birmingham; they will get a plated chain instead of a solid gold chain, made of a good pattern, which we take to be solid gold, and they will fix it on to a watch which they have bought at our auction sale, at just what it is worth, and then if any pawnbroker can only be persuaded that the man is sure to redeem it, and that the chain is solid gold, the margin of 1 l. or 30*s.* is two or three day's work.

2867. But the article is manfactured to be sold above its real worth, not only to the pawnbroker, but to whoever they can find, is it not?—That is so.

2869. But would that be fair, inasmuch as the advance might be 6*s.*, and still you would only allow the pawnbroker to take a penny on the 6*s.*

Mr. R. Attenborough.

4 July 1870.

6 s. advance?—Still he gets a penny on the 4 s. and 3 s., and he only now gets three farthings on 3 s.

2870. Are you aware that in another return the cost of pledging each article is made to be 2¼ d.?—He would have a great advantage upon that scale; he would take 1 d. when the article was pledged, and he would take 1 d. on its redemption the first month, that would be 2 d. the first month; at present he only takes 1½ d., and at the end of the second month he would take another 1 d.

2871. But that would be introducing a new scale altogether, would it not?—That would be introducing a new scale entirely, and a much more simple and satisfactory one, in my opinion.

2872. But still it would be different to the other grade of the scale, inasmuch as you advance by one month in one case and by two months in the other; would not that discrepancy be very inconvenient to the poor people?—I think not, because those small loans are generally for very needy people.

2873. Would it not be better to advance by two months at a time in each case?—I am quite in favour of uniformity, but it would be difficult.

2874. What would you charge for pledges above 6 s.?—I would charge 2 d. the first month. I had sent my scale to Mr. Dicker in a letter, but, unfortunately, he has lost it, and consequently I cannot refer to it, but I can work it out again.

2875. Perhaps you will be kind enough to send it to the Chairman, leaving it to his option as to whether it should be added to your evidence?—I will send it to the Chairman with pleasure, if the Chairman would like to have it.

2876. You say that you are satisfied with the present scale of 10 l. as the limit of free trade?—Yes.

2877. You do not wish it to be reduced, do you?—As far as I am concerned, I think I may say that I am an opponent of free trade very much below the present Pawnbroking Act; the Pawnbroking Act works very well, so far as I am concerned, except that I dare say low pledging does not pay.

2878. I understand that you do not wish it to be reduced below 10 l., but you have no very particular objection to its being reduced to 5 l.?—Exactly so.

2879. Are you yourself in the habit of advancing much upon manufactured goods?—I am not. Plate and jewellery are my principal branches of business.

2880. Is that a sort of pledge that you do not receive?—For instance, I should receive silks or shawls, anything that was clearly valuable; but I would not take large bulky goods that want a lot of room and a lot of lifting.

2881. Are the Committee to understand that you are willing to advance to dealers on stock?—My business is principally with private gentlemen and ladies, and very little on stock, unless it is jewellers' stock.

2882. You stated, did you not, that you thought the lower classes were entirely in the hands of the pawnbrokers as to what they are charged?—I think they are. I do not believe that one customer out of ten, where a pledge has been in more than a month, or where he redeems two or three pledges that have been in various times, does ever take the trouble to calculate the rate of interest, or could calculate it if he took the trouble.

2883. The Committee generally understand the character of the business that you transact. May I ask you upon what articles you generally suffer the greatest loss on resale?—I think, perhaps, in fairness, I ought to say on goods that have been a long time in the house.

2884. On what description of articles?—On articles in which the fashion has varied. Of course plate and jewellery do not vary much: they do vary, and I am happy to say that it is to my advantage, because they have been getting dearer every day; but on goods on which the fashion changes I lose. I can give you a case in point: the fashions of ladies' dresses are continually changing at the present time, and that makes it very difficult for a pawnbroker to take in ladies' wearing apparel of the better quality that will pay, because after a thing is 15 months old now, no person who pretends to be a genteel person will buy a second-hand article.

2885. What proportion of your trade is sale, and what proportion is advance?—That is rather difficult to say. I have more money locked up in pawnbroking than I have in sale goods.

2886. Still your sale trade is a very important one, is it not?—It is a very important one.

2887. I think you told the Committee that you very often buy in auction the articles pledged with you?—Perhaps I should mislead the Committee if I did say that; as a rule, I prefer selling by auction every article that is unredeemed: I do not like selling my own goods retail, though, perhaps, I ought not to ventilate it; for instance, if I have a pledge of a diamond ring for 10 l., and I put it up to auction, and nobody would give more than 9 l. for it, and I bought it in for 9 l., and I put it into my window, and sold it for 12 l., I am rather doubtful whether the owner, if he came, could not take the profit on the 12 l. and not on the 9 l. which it fetched under the hammer.

2888. You stated distinctly that if a person who pledges a diamond ring which you had bought in auction, saw it in your shop, he would have a right to claim it: you do not think the Act of Parliament concludes the transaction between you and the pledger, when the article has been sold by auction?—I think it ought to do so; but I think the common law would give him the right of saying, "That is my ring, and I will pay you the principal and interest for it, and take it;" and I should give it him at once.

2889. You think that if the law really authorises you to buy in a particular article, it certainly ought not to enable the pledger to come in against you afterwards?—It is a very difficult thing to determine; I simply buy in where I do not think the trade give me the trade value; I particularly object to buy in a pledge.

2890. With regard to the auctions, you say that you are ready to buy in when the trade do not give you the trade value; you speak then as if those auctions were only attended by the trade; is that the case?—They are attended by private individuals, and we now and then get rather a higher price.

2891. Practically, can a private individual really buy at one of those sales?—I know several private individuals who do buy at them; as at all auction sales, you stand the chance of being pushed about, and you do not hear polite language at all times.

2892. Is it a common custom at all pawnbrokers' sales for the trade to stand within the counter, unter, and for the outside trade to stand with-t the counter, and that amongst this least re-ectable part, whom the auctioneer will not mit behind his counter, the public have to nd?—Yes.

2893. So that amidst what I may call this mob second, third, and fourth class dealers, the blic have to stand?—The public have to stand tside the counter.

2894. Amidst that mob of second, third, and urth class dealers?—Yes.

2895. Consequently the public have no chance buying fairly, or seeing the article which is d, so well as the trade, have they?—Not so ll as the trade; the auctioneer, simply for his n convenience, has a back counter, and the alers and men who he knows may be trusted, ve an opportunity of going behind the counter d looking at the goods with greater care than angers. Of course, if a stranger goes in, and asks to see the lot, it is shown to him.

2896. If he goes in a certain time before the e, but not during the sale?—He can see at the
e. When I speak of the trade at a sale, I an the dealing trade; what we call the dealers those goods.

2897. Chairman.] Persons who trade in the ods?—Persons who trade in the goods.

2898. Mr. Whitwell.] You said that sometimes rsons claimed the surplus of the value which goods had realised after sale?—Yes.

2899. And you have had to pay it occasionally?
Yes.

2900. I suppose that that occurs but seldom er all?—I do not know.

2901. Is it worth while for you to make a re-rn to the Committee of the number of trans-tions during the year 1869, when the parties o had pledged goods, applied to you for the rplus?—It is scarcely worth while. On six or ven transactions, I should think I have paid
l. or 50*l.* overplus this year.

2902. The Committee are quite aware that you ve a loss on some of these transactions, and u think that you ought to get the profit which u take on A, to satisfy the loss on B?—Pledges er 10*l.* are not under the Act of Parliament, t I think that where no pledges are likely to erage more than 10*l.* or 12*l.*, the average of s would be against the pawnbroker, and conquently I think that it is very hard upon him ere he has to refund perhaps upon the only o or three things which paid him a profit.

2903. Of what value ought the article to be to ke it desirable to compel the pawnbroker to form the person, if he gives his name and ad-ess, the day on which the article is to be sold?
I think I would give the pledgers the oppor-nity of insisting on that every time they wished
I do let every customer of whose address I am rare, know every time when I am going to sell.

2904. Would there be any objection to com-lling the pawnbroker to inform the pledger?—
rhaps it would be a very good plan on sums er 5*l.*, but I do not think that it would be on ms under that amount.

2905. It would be only fair and reasonable, uld it?—I do not think that pawnbrokers uld object to it.

2906. He gives notice in the same way as any her mortgagee that he is going to foreclose his rtgage, so to speak?—Exactly; but he can ly do that by writing to the address given to m, so that the right address must be given.

You must not insist on the pawnbrokers finding it out, because sometimes there would be great difficulty in doing that.

2907. Chairman.] How much would you charge for that service?—I do not know. The pawnbrokers find it, like everybody else, most profitable to do their business in a respectable way.

2908. Mr. Whitwell.] What is the cost of your sales by auctions?—The charge is generally 5 per cent., with a certain amount for lottage; but I have just had one 7½ per cent. They do not charge me anything for lots.

2909. Do they charge you a higher per centage?—No; but then my sales are heavier. If I sell 2,000*l.* worth of goods, it is a 100*l.* profit for the auctioneer, and it is a very good day's work.

2910. Do they charge you 2½ per cent.?—No, they charge me 5 per cent.

2911. If a man pledges three articles at different times, which are all sold the same day, and there is a loss on one and a profit on another, and a loss on the third, can he claim the profit on the one without recouping the losses on the others?—Notwithstanding what has been established lately, but I cannot help thinking that law and justice ought to be as one.

2912. You do not know whether the law is against you in that respect?—I should think that they would go to the House of Lords rather than give it in. I would, if I were consulted as to my opinion.

2913. Would you advise that auctions of pawnbrokers' pledges should be conducted by some official auctioneer or by an ordinary auctioneer?—I think that the ordinary auctioneers have generally the best market for our goods that we can possibly find.

2914. And yet you complain of its being a bad one?—No, I do not say that.

2915. You say that you make a loss on all your pledges, do you not?—That is not because we do not get the value of the goods. I do not make a loss, I make a profit. I do my business very carefully, and I will not take a pledge in, as a rule, unless I can see that I can get principal and interest.

2916. Chairman.] Have you had your attention directed to the Irish rate of charge?—I have.

2917. What do you think of it?—I think it would be intricate. I want to make the calculation very simple, so that people can go in and know what they have to pay.

2919. You made use of the expression that most of your young men are ruined by attending the courts; do you mean that most of the young men employed by pawnbrokers are, in fact, ruined, or that those who are ruined are ruined by this means?—That is so. They go down to the Old Bailey, where loose characters abound, and I have known one or two instances where young men have lost their characters entirely by having to wait about in that way.

2920. Do you include in your scale the charge for the ticket?—The 1*d.* was to cover the whole charge on the first two months under 3*s.*

2921. Do you think that it is right that the original charge for the transaction, which is to some extent enhanced by a special charge for the ticket, should be continued the same, month by month, or that the first charge should be larger than those afterwards to be made month by month?—On pledges under 3*s.* I am inclined to back my opinion that 1*d.* pays the cost of the transaction, so that all pledges that stop over the two months pay a profit. The 1*d.* would very much simplify the business, so that I am quite sure that a pawnbroker doing a large low trade could do with one young man less, if he had no calculations to make as to the interest on Saturday nights; and the increased rates which I give on the higher pledges would recoup him by the simplicity of the calculation for all that he loses.

Mr. R. Attenborough.

2922. Is there any difficulty as regards simplicity if there is a fixed first charge which covers the transaction, and also an equally simple subsequent charge to be superadded for every additional month or two months?—I think not; I do not say that it is absolutely necessary that my rate should be followed; I simply recommend a rate easily calculated without fractions of days, and without fractions of months, but I am not at all wedded to my own scale.

2923. Would it not be more just, that after the first month, including the expense of receiving and otherwise finishing the transaction, the rate to be paid month by month should be less?—Then it would bring in the halfpenny again; I am not wedded to that. I think 1*d.* on the first month and a halfpenny afterwards might answer the purpose.

2924. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Would you include in that 1*d.*, the halfpenny for the ticket?—I include the ticket in the 1*d.*, the 1*d.* would be the whole sum for the first transaction, and the charge afterwards would have reference to interest and other matters.

2925. Mr. T. Hughes.] Your advantage being that you get it paid in advance?—You get it paid in advance, and you get it settled; on all those small transactions of weekly business there would be no interest to pay.

2926. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would you not virtually exclude that weekly business, because a man could not afford it, inasmuch as he would have to pay 52 pennies in a year?—He does that now.

2927. Mr. Hambro.] With regard to the employment of children in the pawnbroking trade, are there many children under 14 years of age employed?—None at all.

2928. Would you recommend the extension of the Factories Act to that?—No; if a boy is very quick, he may be employed as a pawnbrokers assistant at the age of 14, but he would not be of much use.

2929. As a rule, are they employed in very hot rooms and in very confined air?—They sleep in the shops under the counters a good deal, but there are not a large number of persons in the same room.

2930. What sort of places do they work in?—They are rather close, but there is no necessity for the Factory Act in regard to pawnbrokers; if they are very young they are the children of the pawnbrokers themselves.

2931. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Are there many women employed in the lower pawnbroking shops?—None in London I believe, although there are in the manufacturing districts; but I know very little of the nature of the employment.

Mr. Francis Turner, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Turner.

2932. Chairman.] You are a Barrister, I think?—Yes.

2933. Are you the author of a work on the Contract of Pawn?—Yes.

2934. And that has directed your attention to the state of the law on the subject of pawnbrokers, has it not?—It has.

2935. Has your attention been directed to the definition of a pawnbroker under the Act?—It has. I may say that my suggestion with respect to that is simply this: at present the definition of a pawnbroker is contained in one Act, and the license duty is also fixed in some degree by that Act; that is modified by a later Act; and then there is a third Act, which extends the definition to persons who are not primâ facie pawnbrokers.

2936. Which are the three Acts?—The first is the 25 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 5; that contains the definition. Then the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, increases the amount of duty payable by pawnbrokers; and then the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27, makes pawnbrokers of persons who do not profess to be pawnbrokers, but who take things in as on absolute sale, with an implied understanding that the seller should be at liberty to re-purchase.

2937. Then would you find some better definition of a pawnbroker?—I am not aware that any difficulty has arisen which may not be met by those two Statutes. The Act of the 25th of Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 5, contains the definition of a pawnbroker pure and simple, so to speak. Then, in the other Act, the 19 & 20 Vict., the definition is in such very wide terms, that I do not think there could be any practical difficulty about its sufficiency; but it would be an advantage, I think, supposing legislation should follow this inquiry, if those three provisions were brought into one Act in one short section.

2938. We have heard that there is a practice by pawnbrokers to advance money under special contract under 10*l.*; do you consider, on the construction of the Acts, that such a practice is possible within the limits of the law?—My opinion is, that that course of business is utterly illegal; that it gives a pawnbroker no right to the goods; that if the pledger brought an action against that pawnbroker for the goods so pledged, he would be utterly undefended; and besides that, he could be convicted of several offences against the Act of 39 & 40 Geo. 3. At present there is a difference between the rate of license duty paid by London and country pawnbrokers. Of course it is a matter for the Committee, but it seems to me that there is hardly any reasonable ground for maintaining that distinction. I suppose the theory is, that less business is done in the country than in London; but it is a query whether that can be said of such towns as Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham, and whether all parts of the country should not be put under the same rule; or if there is to be a distinction, the line might be drawn, say at towns of 100,000 inhabitants. With regard to the rate of profit, I dare say the attention of the Committee has been called to the fact that that rate is prescribed by, I think, four our different sections. Those sections are very long and very complex. It is absurd to suppose that any uneducated pledger could read all those through, or could understand them when he was pledging an article of small value.

2939. Have you considered whether any very simple rate could be specified upon a principle somewhat the same as that of the present Act?—My suggestion would be a halfpenny per month or each 2 s.

2940. With or without the addition of the first halfpenny for the ticket?—I had not thought of that until I heard Mr. Attenborough's evidence just now; but it seems to me that that Act requires an amount of clerkship and some expenditure for stationery which it is not quite reasonable to compel the pawnbroker to provide for nothing.

2941. Would you propose a penny for the first month and a halfpenny for every subsequent month?—If a penny is sufficient to pay for stationery and clerkship, let it be a penny on all transactions, and then let the rate of interest be a halfpenny per month for 2 s. I may say that, so far as my observations, from occasionally having matters of this sort to advise on, have enabled me to form an opinion, the tickets prescribed by the Act are generally printed on stout paper, almost cardboard. By the Act the pawnbroker is required to provide two tickets, but, practically, I have been informed, he provides three, for his own satisfaction. That must, of necessity, be a somewhat serious item in his yearly expenditure; and I think it is only right that he should be allowed to make such a charge for it as would cover it; and I should hardly think that a halfpenny would be sufficient, taking clerkship into account.

2942. Is it your view that there should be a uniform charge of a halfpenny on all transactions, with a superadded charge of a halfpenny for interest?—I think it would be for the benefit of both parties, because the pledger could then easily calculate, and the pledgee would not be liable to make the mistakes which do occur now, whether by accident or design I cannot say; but there would be less excuse for design, and less liability to mistake. With regard to the question whether you should draw the line at 40 s. or 42 s., and allow a different rate of interest above and below that line, or whether the Legislature would not lay down the same rate all through, that is a matter rather for business witnesses than for myself; my reason for noting it, is on the ground of simplicity, as avoiding the chance of offences under the Act.

2944. Would you start with a new rate for 1 l., and for all above 1 l., or would you start with the present Parliamentary rate of 20 per cent.?—I think not, because when once you do that you deprive the Act of the advantage of simplicity.

2945. Unless for the broken part of the 1 l., you adhere to your rate?—Yes.

2946. For the whole 1 l., the question is, whether you should not charge 4 s.?—I think not, for this reason, if you make a difference between the broken part of the 1 l., and the 1 l. itself, there will be a point at which it will be more to the pawnee's interest to lend only the broken part, and therefore the Act will, in that respect, I think, become a dead letter.

2947. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Twenty shillings will come to 5 d. per month, will it not?—Yes, and if you charged 5 d. for the first 1 l., and took 20 per cent. above the 1 l., the interest payable on 40 s. would be 9 d., while, if the pawnbroker were to advance 38 s. only, the interest, calculated at one halfpenny per 2 s., would be 9½ d.

2948. Mr. Hambro.] At present it is 7¾ d., is it not?— Yes; so that you would have that struggle repeated at every point just short of the dividing line.

2949. Mr. C. H. Mills.] It would be higher on the lesser than it would be on the larger amount, would it not?—Yes, so that it would make it to the advantage of the pawnee to advance a lower sum, and the pawner therefore would lose in two ways; he would get less money, and he would pay more interest.

2950. Chairman.] But if the higher rate were limited to fractions of 1 l., for the facility of calculation, and if for every entire 1 l. the rate was lower, he would be a gainer, would he not?—Up to 20 s. it would be 5 d., above 20 s. up to 40 s. it would be 4 d. for the second 1 l.; that would be 9 d. for 40 s., but 38 s. as previously explained would give 9½ d.

2951. Do you think that that would have the effect of inducing the people to lend 18 s. rather than 1 l.?—Yes, taking the ordinary estimate of human nature.

2952. Mr. C. H. Mills.] It would only signify above the 1 l., would it?—It might be a matter of consideration for the Committee whether it would be quite well to go up to the extreme limit.

2953. Chairman.] On the other hand, the pawner would be still better off, would he not, than if he paid 10 d., which would be the case if he paid 5 d. for 1 l.?—Yes, but he would get 2 s. less advance.

2954. Then is it your view that the scale should run up continuously up to 10 l.?—I would not say quite to 10 l.; it might stop short of that; say at 5 l.

2955. So that the fractional charge would become insignificant?— Yes; I apprehend that when it got up to 5 l. they would go by jumps, to 5 l. 5 s. or to 5 l. 10 s., or something of that kind, and then perhaps the difficulty would not arise.

2956. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to Section 4, about the change of the farthings?—That difficulty is eliminated by the arrangement which I propose. Very recently, it has been solemnly argued whether, in the case of a rate of a person whose assessment came to more than one farthing, and less than another, he was liable or not. It came before the Court of Queen's Bench in Banco. The argument, I think, lasted the greater part of a day, and the Court decided that the ratepayer could not be compelled to pay the farthing.

2957. That would depend upon the language of the Act, would it not?—It would, but the ground of the decision to which I have referred, was that the ratepayer ought not to be compelled to contribute more than his share to the amount of local burdens. It is quite an open question now in regard to pawnbroking transactions, where, say $\frac{99}{100}$ths of a farthing is the calculated rate of interest, whether the pawnbroker would, or would not, commit an offence rendering him liable to a 10 l. penalty, by taking the farthing.

2958. Do you consider that if an Act of Parliament

liament requires a man to pay something which is more than a farthing the responsibility of paying it is thrown upon him?—Yes, that would be my view of it; but I think a good deal might be said on the other side.

2959. He would answer that he cannot do it, because there is no coin?—Just so. Then it would be a question for the Court whether, under those circumstances, the pledgee would have a right to say, "You shall not have the thing pledged until you give me more than I am actually entitled to," and that might or might not be held to be an adverse detention.

2960. With regard to Section 5, which allows periods of grace, do you think it desirable that the contract should be for one term, with a period of grace, or that it would be better that the contract should be precise, and for a fixed period?—I think, in the abstract, it would be better that the contract should be precise, and that, say, going over one day should involve the penalty of another month's interest. It might be too sudden a change in these transactions to do away with a period of grace altogether, therefore I would adopt the analogy of a bill of exchange on which there is three days grace. By a later section of the Act, a quasi negotiable character is given to the pawnbroker's ticket. If you adopted the analogy, you would avoid any chance of the imputation of having made an invidious distinction between the larger and smaller classes of transactions.

2961. You would make the days of grace rather to cover any possible error as to the day than to extend the time?—Just so; the three days, I think, would be ample for it.

2962. With regard to the 6th section, which relates to the keeping of the accounts and the giving of the names, what is your view?—I think that the section seems to require too much. The pawbrokers must ask who the pledger is, who sends him, and whether he is a housekeeper or a lodger, and must put all that down; and he must specify the particular terms at which the interest should be paid, and so on. I think all those provisions are needlessly minute, and in practice I believe they are almost invariably disregarded.

2963. Have those clauses been found to work any injustice, which induces you to think that they should be qualified by saving clauses?—I think that now they work injustice in this way: if a pawnbroker fails to comply strictly with the requirements of the Act, it has been held that he acquires no right to, or property in, the pawn, Supposing that to be stretched to the utmost, if a pawnbroker omits to ask whether a person is a householder or a lodger, or, if having asked, he omits to put "H" or "L," as required by the Act, he then loses his money and security, and is liable to a penalty besides. I think that is rather hard; and while, of course, Parliament can lay down any conditions it likes for the protection of the public, I think there should be something like a dispensing clause relieving the pawnbroker from those consequences, when, in the opinion of the magistrate or other tribunal, before whom he is brought, he has acted bonâ fide.

2964. Then, in point of fact, you would make the illegality consist in his not doing those things for some fraudulent purposes?—Either for fraud or gross carelessness.

2965. Have you looked at section seven of the Act which requires endorsement upon the pledge, when the money is taken back?—Yes; it seems to me hardly necessary. The presumed object is to afford the pawner some security, but it does not seem to me that it can possibly do so; if as I think suggested elsewhere, the rate were printed on the ticket, which would be possible if the rate were simplified, then the pawner would have a check upon the pawnbroker, and it might be required in addition that he should endorse the amount which he takes on the duplicate, which would be evidence against him as to the amount which he did take.

2966. In case of a question arising as to the amount which had actually been paid, what precaution would you take, because how would the pawnbroker be able to identify the transaction?—I say that it might be desirable for him still to endorse the amount on the duplicate, but that for its assumed purpose the section does not seem to be of very great value.

2967. What do you consider then to be its assumed purpose?—I assume that it is intended to protect the pawner from an overcharge, but I do not see how it does that.

2968. Does it not do that, simply by having a record made at the time, so that in case he complains, the pawnbroker is compelled to produce the record?—That is rather a protection to the pawnbroker than to the pawner, because the pawner not seeing the amount endorsed cannot possibly be the wiser for it.

2969. Do you think that if there was a disposition to cheat him, it would be evidence rather the other way, that the true sum would be entered, and not the overcharge?—Exactly; but at present the pawner is almost at the pawnbroker's mercy, to know what the correct amount is, whereas if the pawner has a ticket with the correct amount, calculated on a simple scale, printed on it, he can check the pawnbroker.

2970. Do you think it desirable that there should be some check given to the pawner in the shape of some receipt for his money?—I think that if he is to have that additional security for the reason I mentioned, with regard to the duplicate, the pawnbroker ought to be entitled to make a charge for it; if he gave a receipt, let him have the power of making a charge for that receipt; and if he gave a receipt above 40*s.*, he would be bound to affix a penny receipt stamp.

2971. Have you looked at section 8 of the Act?—Yes; that seems rather complex, and it, I think, does not quite sufficiently define what unlawful pawning is; though the decisions of the courts have rather come to the help of the Statute in that respect; then as regards the latter part of it which disposes of the forfeitures by giving them to the overseers of the parish, I believe that it is practically a dead letter, and there is no reason for retaining it.

2972. Have you considered section 9, with regard to persons forging or counterfeiting notes?—Yes, you see the extreme penalty there is three months imprisonment. Forgery, of course is the same crime, whether committed on a duplicate or on a bill of exchange; I think, therefore, it would be desirable to strike this section out, and leave the offence to be dealt with by the Criminal Law Consolidation Act.

2973. That question you would leave to be dealt with either under the law as to obtaining money under false pretences, or under the law of forgery?—Yes; the question has arisen under the the Criminal Law Consolidation Act, and the forging of a pledge ticket was held to be the forging of an accountable receipt for goods or money; but the words "pawnbrokers' duplicate" not being contained in the Act, and this section remaining, the judges did not feel safe in acting upon it, until after argument before the Court of Criminal Appeal.

2974. Did they uphold the conviction?—Yes.

2975. Mr. C. H. Mills.] For forgery?—Yes; therefore it seems anomalous to keep on the Statute book one section which makes three months imprisonment the extreme penalty for an offence, having in the very same country a law making a man liable to seven years' penal servitude for the self-same crime.

2976. Chairman.] The effect of this clause would be, that a magistrate can deal with these small forgeries on summary conviction, would it not?—He can.

2977. Whereas he could not deal with forgery at all?—Quite so.

2978. That enables him to deal with it summarily?—No doubt that is so, if this is a benefit.

2979. Section 11 of the Act relates to unfinished goods; have you any observation to make as to that?—There are a number of Statutes which contain provisions somewhat analogous to those of this section, where, from the nature of the goods, there is a kind of implied notice given to the pawnbroker that they are not proper things to be taken in pledge, such as military and naval stores, the clothing of policemen, the clothing of volunteers, the furniture and other effects of poor law boards, unfinished articles in different manufactures other than those mentioned here, many of which are mentioned in a Consolidating Act of the 6th & 7th of Victoria; I think that it would be very desirable if all such provisions were consolidated and appended in a schedule to the Act, which could be increased by Order in Council from time to time, instead of having them as they are now, scattered over a multitude of Statutes which it requires a great deal of labour and trouble to be quite familiar with.

2980. Then with regard to section 13, which relates to goods unlawfully pawned, being restored by the pawnbroker; do you think that that requires any amendment?—Yes, I think there is a great deal both of hardship and of anomaly in the present operation of the Act. By the Metropolitan Police Act, the provisions of which are extended as to some towns by the Towns Improvement Act, or such sections of it as are adopted by the local authorities, the pawnbroker may be compensated to some extent, if, in the opinion of the magistrate, he has acted honestly, and if there has been negligence or other circumstances on the part of the real owner of the property, entitling him to compensation. Now, it is very odd that we should have two directly different sets of legislation in the same country, extended, say, to London, by a general Act, and to Liverpool, and I believe to some other towns by the adoption of a special Act, which Act is adopted so far as this present subject is concerned at the mere option of the local authorities. If the provisions of the 2nd & 3rd Vict., c. 47, are just to the public, and to the pawnbroker, then, I think, they should be extended to the whole country. There is this further anomaly: that while this power to award compensation is given to the Metropolitan Police Magistrates, Judges of Assize, or Judges sitting at the Old Bailey, and equal in dignity to the Judges of Assize, have no such power. A proviso to that effect was inserted in the Criminal or Consolidation Act as drawn; but I see by Mr. Greave's note, that the section was struck out during the progress of the measure through Parliament.

2981. Then would you make a general law extending over the whole country, and applying to all courts?—Yes. For instance, where a person has kept his property negligently, so as to put absolute temptation in other people's way, then I think it is not altogether unjust that he should pay a part of the penalty which has been occasioned by his own negligence.

2982. With regard to Clause 16, which provides for the case of notes or memorandums lost, have you any amendment to suggest?—I think that clause requires some amendment. At present it is a moot point whether the delivery of this declaration is an absolute indemnity to the pawnbroker or not. The intention of the Act seems to be that the magistrate shall himself institute an inquiry, and satisfy himself of the bonâ fides of the applicant; and that then the pawnbroker shall, in any case, be bound to deliver, and shall be indemnified for the consequences of delivering the pawn. Now I must say that I do not think that it goes so far, but still I know that, in some cases, metropolitan magistrates and county court judges have held to that effect. I think, therefore, that it would be desirable, when legislating, to define more precisely the value of the declaration. My idea is, that the delivery of the goods, in pursuance of a declaration made before a magistrate, should only be an indemnity so far as the delivery of the goods, on the production of the duplicate, would be an indemnity; that is to say, where the pawnbroker has no actual or implied notice, that the declaration has been improperly applied for. That is the law with respect to duplicates. I think, therefore, that logic and justice seem to require that it should be the same with regard to the declaration.

2983. Have the police to exercise any judgment or discretion, or care, in the process of the substitution of an affidavit for a duplicate?—That, I think, is practically nominal.

2984. Does not Clause 16 peremptorily require the pawnbroker to give a declaration to any applicant whomsoever, without any right to question his demand?—Yes, provided that he comes and represents himself to be the person pledging, or the owner of the goods pledged.

2985. Not as the owner of the duplicate?—No.

2986. He is absolutely bound to give the affidavit, is he not?—Yes.

2987. Therefore he is not called upon by the Act to take any care at all?—Not as regards the declaration.

2988. Is the magistrate required to exercise any care or judgment in the matter?—I think the magistrate is, but practically the magistrate does not do so.

Mr. F. Turner. 4 July 1870.

2990. Mr. Whitwell.] It is the previous line I think, "Shall thereupon prove his, her, or their property in or right, to such goods and chattels, to the satisfaction of some justice of the peace?"—Just so.

2991. Chairman.] Have you considered whether the effect of those words is to impose upon the magistrate the duty of satisfying himself of the bonâ fide of the application?—I think so, because it says that something is to be proved to the satisfaction of the magistrates, and that something is the truth of the particular case stated in the affidavit.

2992. We have been told that the magistrate signs the affidavit without making any inquiry whatever, is that so?—I believe it is done without his ever seeing the applicant.

2993. Practically the magistrates decline to carry out the Act in fact, do they not?—I believe that the difficulty arises from the fact that there are so many of these cases, that it would be impossible for the magistrates to institute an inquiry in every instance and get through the rest of the business.

2994. Still, according to your reading of this clause, that is the only stage or process provided by the Act for the protection of the public, is it not?—Yes.

2995. Do I understand that the pawnbroker, when the affidavit is produced to him, is peremptorily bound by the Act to give up the goods?—I do not think he is. Suppose that a certain article being in pledge, the owner of that article comes to the pawnbroker and says, "I have lost my duplicate or mislaid it, do not give a declaration with respect to that;" and sometime after, another person comes in for a form of declaration, and the pawnbroker has either forgotten it, or the person sees some other assistant, and that other assistant in breach of that notice, does deliver a declaration; the applicant goes to the magistrate, the magistrate gives the needful authority, and he comes back, and then the property is re-delivered; I think that in that case the pawnbroker having had notice, ought to be bound by the consequences of that notice.

2996. Does not the law say, "Thereupon the pawnbroker shall suffer the person or persons proving such property to the satisfaction of such justice as aforesaid, and making such affidavit or affirmation as aforesaid, on leaving such copy of the said note or memorandum, and the said affidavit or affirmation with the said pawnbroker to redeem such goods or chattels"?—Yes.

2997. So that he has the same absolute right of redemption which the holder of the ticket has, has he not?—He has, if the 16th section is to be read alone; but I think that if ever the case came before the courts it would be quite an arguable question whether the 15th and 16th sections ought not to be read together. The 16th section, you will see, substitutes the declaration for the duplicate. I do not think that it could be successfully contended that if a person is bound to take certain precautions with respect to the original, he is not bound to take the same precautions with respect to the substitute.

2998. He has the same right as the owner of the duplicate has to receive the goods, has he not?—Yes; but I am speaking with respect to the obligation of the pawnee. The pawnee, by the 15th section, is bound to deliver the goods unless he has notice of the claim of another owner.

2999. Apart from the claim on the part of another owner, he is absolutely bound to deliver up the goods, is he not?—Yes.

3000. Then having been absolutely bound by law to deliver up the goods, the question arises, whether, if the true owner of the goods turns up, he is not liable to a claim, there being no words in the Act to discharge him from the claim of the true owner, is not that so?—In the case of goods pledged, when the pledger parts with the duplicate, and nevertheless goes to the pawnbroker to redeem, the pawnbroker is not liable, if the goods have previously been delivered to some person who produces the duplicate.

3001. If the person who has pledged the goods and who holds the duplicate for the goods, come to the pawnbroker after the pawnbroker has delivered up the goods to a third person under the affidavit, is the true owner entitled to be indemnified by the pawnbroker for the loss of his goods?—That, as I said before, has never been authoritatively decided. It would depend upon the reading of those two sections. There is a case somewhat like it, the case of Vaughan and Watt, which was decided by the Court of Exchequer, and which was an action of trover for wearing apparel. It appeared at the trial that the defendant was a pawnbroker, with whom the goods in question had been pledged on the 24th of July, by a person who gave the name of "Mary Warne," and the duplicate was made out accordingly, she was in fact the wife of the plaintiff Vaughan, but it did not appear that this fact was then known to the defendant. The next day she sent to say that she had lost the duplicate, and to demand a copy of it. The defendant gave her a copy, and also a form of declaration of the loss of it. Some days after she sent again to say that she had lost the form of declaration, and to ask for another, which was given to her. On the 6th of August the plaintiff called with the original duplicate, and tendered the money to redeem the goods, but the defendant told him that as declaration of the loss of the duplicate had been obtained, he could not give them up. There the pawnbroker acted on the assumption that he was bound to take reasonable precaution.

3002. But in that case the declaration had been obtained, but he had not delivered up the goods under the declaration; it was only a claim?—No, it was only a claim. If they had delivered up the goods to the declarant, it would be a question on the construction of those two sections, which has never yet been settled, whether the pawnbroker was indemnified or not; therefore, I think it would be desirable when legislating, that some definite provision with respect to this matter should be made.

3003. Would you think it right that if the pawnbroker delivers up the goods in consequence of the declaration, he should be entirely discharged?—I think he should be discharged if he has not had express or implied notice. That, I think, is what the law, unaided by the Statute, would imply, and that I think is just.

3004. Mr. Whitwell.] Should not the Act also, if you make that clause so clear, require some investigation to be made into the real character of the ownership of the declarant?—Yes, I think that would follow, and it would be for the legislature to consider whether that should be of a magisterial, or simply of a private character.

3005. Chairman.] Do you observe that in clause 15 the pawnbroker is only declared to be indemnified indemnified if the real owner of the goods has obtained them back under the form of an affidavit?—Yes.

3006. Therefore, if a person who was not the real owner had made an affidavit, and obtained the goods, he would not be indemnified under this clause?—No doubt; and then comes the latter part of the section, which strengthens that inference. Still I say that magistrates have, nevertheless, looked at the 16th section only, not going outside of the four corners of it, and have held that the pawnbroker was absolutely indemnified.

3007. If the magistrate neglects his duty under the one clause, the pawnbroker is bound to deliver up the goods to the real owner under the other clause, from the magistrate's neglect; is that so?—I think you can scarcely call it neglect, considering the amount of business that they have to do; but if it is the duty of the magistrate, and certainly the words of the section seem to show it, it would be advantageous, if it were thought desirable that the magistrate should institute an inquiry, that there should be some action on the subject.

3008. Mr. Whitwell.] I see that in the case which you have cited, Lord Cranworth was of opinion that the fact of declarations having been obtained was no defence against the owner of the goods, who might in that case never have it in his power to recover possession of them; and that the 16th section did not authorise the pawnbroker to keep the goods as against the owner, unless the party to whom a declaration had been given had proved his right to them to the satisfaction of a justice?—Yes; but the case went off; and, practically, it does not decide the question.

3009. Chairman.] What is your view of the proper mode of protecting the real owner; because that is the point to which our attention must be directed, as well as to guard the pawnbroker against the intervention of a fraudulent third person?—There would be absolute protection if you could compel the magistrates to act upon this section.

3010. Subject to the contingencies of legal miscarriage?—Just so.

3011. Is there any other mode by which the thing could be adjusted, except by making the magistrate do his duty?—I do not think there is, because you may presume that the pawnbroker will desire to avoid any difficulty now; therefore you have his interest in one way, and you want something to clench that.

3012. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Is it possible for the magistrate to do his duty, seeing that there is no person to bring before him formal evidence of the matter?—It is so.

3013. Mr. Orr Ewing.] If the pawnbroker was more particular in getting the real name of the parties with whom he was doing business, he would run very little risk, would he?—I have heard some of the evidence given this morning, to the effect that people never do give their true addresses.

3014. But if the pawnbrokers run a risk by this loose way of doing business, could they not rectify it by being more particular in getting the real address of the pledgers?—It does not occur to me how a pawnbroker is to tell whether a perfect stranger is giving a real address or not.

3015. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] But I suppose a person cannot apply unless he produces the ticket?—Yes; he must know of the existence of the pledge, and he must know about the time when the article has been pledged.

3016. May any person having acquired that information, and going to the pawnbroker, and making this declaration before a magistrate, get the goods out?—Yes, the magisterial test of the truth of the declaration is, I believe, something like this; that the declarant takes the declaration to the magistrate's clerk, and the magistrate's clerk takes it to the magistrate, and the magistrate never sees the declarant.

3017. It seems to be a farce altogether?—I think it is.

3018. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Are they obliged to state in the declaration the day on which the article was pledged, the name in which it was pledged, and also what was pledged?—Yes.

3019. Therefore anybody who does it fraudulently, must have known about it?—Yes; he might know it through some carelessness on the part of the actual pawner.

3020. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Have you anything to suggest as to a mode by which this evil could be obviated?—No other than that which I have previously made. I think that if you compelled the magistrates in all cases to institute an inquiry, the evil would be obviated.

3021. Mr. Whitwell.] But is it not generally assumed that a pawnbroker, having given this form, has pretty well satisfied himself that the declarant is the party in question?—I suppose it is; and therefore it is that the magistrates' practice is so lax. And this course is open to the objection that the Act casts the burden on the magistrate who does not bear it, and not upon the pawnbroker who, I suppose, does bear it.

3022. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] In fact, the pawnbroker is relieved, is he not, if he does that?—Yes.

3023. Chairman.] The pawnbroker is, under the Act, deprived of the exercise of any discretion or judgment in the matter, is he not, because he is bound to give the declaration as soon as any party comes to make a declaration?—That is a matter of construction. If you look to section 16 only, the pawnbroker is discharged; if you take the two sections together, the pawnbroker is not discharged.

3024. In point of fact, the protection seems to consist in the fact that the applicant is compelled to state certain facts to the pawnbroker; and it would be more complete if the law compelled him to state to the pawnbroker the character of the article pledged, to show that he was privy to it, which he could not do unless he had had the pledge in his possession or had been a party to the transaction; is not that so?—Quite so.

3025. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do the pawnbrokers suffer much from this evil?—I do not know whether they suffer much; I have been consulted about it once.

3026. Is it really any grievance?—I do not know that it is much of a grievance.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. LUCAS PETER STUBBS, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stubbs.

7 July 1870.

3027. Chairman.] ARE you employed in the office of the Borough Magistrates at Liverpool?—I am.

3028. How long have you held that appointment?—Fifteen years.

3029. What were you before you held that appointment?—I was an assistant to a barrister, and in the evenings I used to employ my time as a voluntary superintendent of a ragged school, and a visitor among the poor.

3030. Have you written a book called "A Guide to Pawnbroking"?—Yes.

3031. What is the object of that book?—My object in publishing it was to simplify the law for the use of the poor.

3032. Have the poor bought your book?—They have not. The publishers suggested a higher price first than I had originally intended, thinking to reduce it afterwards for the benefit of the poor; but we found the law so voluminous that it could not be compressed within reasonable limits for the use of the poor. It could not be published at a price at which they could buy it.

3033. Then, perhaps, it has been useful to the pawnbrokers?—No doubt it has.

3034. Has that led you to inquire much into the system and practice of pawnbroking?—It has.

3035. What is your opinion as the result of that inquiry respecting the present rate of charge as to the profit to the pawnbroker?—I should say the scale is rather low. I can only say that from having had accidental acquaintance with those in the trade who frequent the magistrate's office on business; and, before the new Act was thought of, many conversations have taken place between me and the trade, and they have invariably said that they could scarcely make a profit out of the pledging business.

3036. Have you ascertained what would be a remunerative rate as compared with the present rate?—I have not; but I should judge that if the fractions were abolished, that would better compensate them for the trouble and loss which they now have, and that it would also be no hardship upon the poor, because the simplification of the rate of interest would benefit them to a degree which would be sufficient to compensate for the interest which they would have to pay.

3037. What would you call a simple rate of charge?—Such a rate as could be printed at the back of a pawn-ticket, compressed into about three lines, say, not exceeding 2*s.* 6*d.*, ½*d.* per month; exceeding 2*s.* 6*d.* and not exceeding 5*s.*, 1*d.*; and so on up to 40*s.*

3038. That would be a ½*d.* for every entire 2*s.* 6*d.*, and a ½*d.* for every fraction of 2*s.* 6*d.*, would it not?—Precisely.

3039. Would you extend that scale up to the whole sum of 10*l.*?—Up to at least the sum of 40*s.*; but I have not sufficiently considered the matter to recommend its being carried up to 10*l.*

3040. That is the rate up to 10*l.*, is it not?—No; I think it is 15 per cent. from 40*s.* up to 10*l.*; 3*d.* per 1*l.* per month for sums exceeding 42*s.* is the present rate, and 4*d.* per 1*l.* per month for sums below 42*s.* and above 1*l.* Guineas, I presume, were in use when that rate was fixed.

3041. Would that be exclusive of the ticket charge?—Yes.

3042. Do you know much of the character or class of the people who pledge goods in Liverpool?—The bulk of the pledgers consist of labourers, and of families who have small pledges and irregular wages.

3043. Do they pledge to equalise their wages?—They do no doubt.

3044. When you say that they have irregular wages, I suppose you mean that they are casually employed?—Yes, the trade in Liverpool is fluctuating, according to the winds, and the vessels which arrive. A large number of labourers are employed when trade is brisk, and they are out of work when it becomes dull.

3045. Mr. Alderman Carter.] That answer refers more, I suppose, to dock labourers?—Yes; but it is not confined to dock labourers, for we find that, as business at the docks increases, all branches of unskilled labour come into requisition.

3046. Have you inquired at all into the losses and the expenses of the pawnbrokers in Liverpool?—I could only give hearsay evidence upon that point. As I have told you, I have a casual acquaintance with several pawnbrokers through meeting them at the courts, and they have stated to me that their expenses are so high, and their losses so great, that on the pledge department they hey could not make a decent living; and they requently lose sums, to my knowledge, by aving to restore to owners property which has een illegally pledged.

3047. Does that come much under your obervation in connection with the police-court of Liverpool?—It does.

3048. Are there many orders made there for he restoration of property?—I should think, erhaps, 80 or 90 during the year.

3049. Are those for property only illegally ledged, or property stolen and pledged?—I hink I must correct my last answer, if you will ermit me. There will be considerably more han I have stated. I was only alluding to one ourt; but I should think that fully twice the umber I have stated would be the correct numer. There is one place of business in Liverpool or the transaction of the magistrate's duties, but here are several courts in the one building.

3050. For both courts it would be twice the umber?—Yes.

3051. Does that embrace both the restoration f the property stolen and pledged and property therwise illegally pledged?—It does.

3052. Have you an opportunity of hearing hose cases tried or investigated before the agistrates?—Yes; I frequently sit in the ourts.

3053. Do you infer from the evidence which ou have generally heard that there has been a ant of care on the part of the pawnbroker ringing about those illegal pledges, or some rtifice and fraud on the part of the persons ledging?—Pawnbrokers are not frequently lamed from want of care, but the magistrates lmost invariably order the goods to be delivered o the owner without any payment to the pawnroker.

3054. Do you think there is any particular acility in Liverpool for persons illegally pawnng goods?—No more than in any other town, I ink.

3055. Do you think that any facilities are fforded by not asking the proper questions or y otherwise taking in goods easily?—There eing so many pawnbrokers in Liverpool, it would e impossible for them, I should say, to know the ledgers, and they are dependent upon the ledger's word at the time of pledging.

3056. Have you inferred from hearing all hose cases that there has been any facility given y the pawnbroker to the receiving of illegal ledges?—I should judge, by the number of ases, that a large quantity of stolen property oes find its way into the pawnbrokers, and also large quantity of property not stolen, but llegally pledged, finds its way there; but I do ot know that any pawnbrokers have ever been onvicted of having knowingly received stolen roperty, nor have I heard them censured as enouraging the pledging of property illegally.

3057. Have you any suggestion to make by which any further precaution could be taken gainst the illegal pledging of goods?—If the awnbrokers were properly paid for their serices I believe they would form a very efficient rotection and aid to the police.

3058. In what respect do you think that they re not properly paid for their services?—I think hat when they stop stolen goods they ought to ave some reward; I think that when they attend the police court on such matters they should e fairly remunerated for their loss of time.

3059. That is, I presume, when they attend for the purpose of aiding the police, and not when they attend merely to defend their own property?—When they attend for the purpose of aiding justice.

3060. Have you been able to observe whether the law is efficiently carried out in Liverpool, which requires the name and address of the pledger, distinguishing householders and lodgers, to be put on the ticket?—It is almost invariably violated. We find among the numerous pawn-tickets which are produced in court the letters "H" or "L" at one corner of the ticket, but one of the letters is seldom obliterated.

3061. Are they printed with both letters on with the intention of obliterating one and leaving the other?—I think that is the intention, but usually we find that the tickets have both letters on them.

3062. Do you think that, as a rule, the pledgers in Liverpool give their true name and address?—I do not think they do.

3063. Do you think that arises from a sense of shame?—Among the more respectable pledgers, I have no doubt that it arises from a sense of shame; but among those who have received the goods unlawfully and pledged them, I have no doubt that it arises from a desire to prevent detection.

3064. Therefore, in either way, it does not seem to work well?—It does not; I may remark that the Christian name ought invariably to be written in full upon the ticket, and that is frequently omitted, a simple initial being placed there; and pawnbrokers, in giving evidence, have been unable to tell whether goods were pledged by a male or female prisoner.

3065. Then, to that extent the pawnbroker fails to give the identity which the law requires of him, I presume?—That is so occasionally.

3066. How is the clause relating to lost duplicates carried into effect in Liverpool by the magistrates?—Declarations are brought to the court, and handed in to an officer at the door of the court, who asks the person presenting them if he declares the contents of the declaration to be true, and on his answering in the affirmative, the officer affixes the stamp of the office upon the declaration, hands the declaration up to the magistrate, who signs it, and then it is returned to the declarant.

3067. Is any inquiry whatever made to satisfy the magistrate of the truth of the contents of the declaration?—None. We have so many declarations each day in Liverpool that it would take one magistrate a considerable time to get through the business of inquiry.

3068. Can you judge at all, or can you give any idea of the class of people who make those declarations, as to whether they are very poor or wanting in intelligence?—They are chiefly poor and wanting in intelligence; but there are occasionally highly respectable people among them.

3069. Do you find that they can generally sign their names, or do they make their marks?—They more frequently make their marks.

3070. Have you ever had any complaint afterwards from the true owners of the goods, that the declarations have been made by persons not entitled to the pawn-tickets?—I have not. The declaring of those forms is rather a more serious matter than perhaps you would suppose, from the way in which they are received by the officer. I remember, I think, two cases where prosecutions have been instituted against the declarants for perjury on the pawnbroker's form of declaration.

3071. Were convictions obtained in those cases?—I believe they were obtained at the assizes.

3072. Then you think that the people who make those declarations really regard them as so serious a matter, that they are not falsely made?—They are very rarely falsely made, I think. I I might add, on the section on which we are now speaking, that I think it a hardship upon the pawnbroker that he has no option in giving a formal declaration, and yet that he is liable afterwards to compensate the true owner for the property.

3073. Is it understood in Liverpool that if the true owner comes with the true ticket he is still entitled to receive the goods, or compensation for them?—That is the law, no doubt.

3074. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Is it the 16th clause to which you are alluding?—It is. I think the pawnbroker ought to have option and responsibility, or no option and no responsibility.

3075. Chairman.] You mean as regards acting upon the declaration, I presume?—Yes, I think a simple receipt might answer the purpose, on a form at the pawnbroker's shop. Then he should take the responsibility of giving the goods over to the owner, and, if he made a mistake, he would still be liable to the owner.

3076. Then would you leave him to put the owner to a declaration for his further satisfaction if he thought fit, as part of his own proceedings?—Yes.

3077. Do you think that any hardship has been done to pawnbrokers in ordering them to deliver back, without compensation, goods which they have received, or do you think they are fairly bound to give them back, if they are goods which belonged to other people?—If they receive them, and are guilty of any want of care, they deserve to suffer the loss; but if, with ordinary care, they still incur a loss, I think it is a hardship.

3078. Why should pawnbrokers be more exempt from the ordinary law as to stolen property than other people; is it not just as great a hardship if a man who deals in old clothes, and other second-hand commodities, buys a thing, and has to restore it?—I presume that it is a part of his trade to incur that loss, and it may be just that it should fall upon the pawnbroker occasionally, but it is a hardship.

3079. Then your proposition would apply to other cases than those of stolen goods, would it not?—I should say that it is a hardship in either case, but it may be justice to the owner.

3080. Are there any special provisions in your local Acts relating to the business of pawnbrokers in Liverpool?—None directly relating to the business of pawnbrokers, but I think there are some which indirectly apply to the trade. We have a local Act similar to the Metropolitan Police Act in one clause. It enacts that any pawnbroker who receives a pledge from a person apparently under 16 years of age, is liable to a penalty of 5 l.

3081. Is there any other local legislation?—We have one clause also in our local Police Act which empowers justices to order goods which have been stolen, and which are in possession of pawnbrokers to be delivered to the owner, on payment of money, or otherwise; but that law is rarely put in force, because cases of that description are more frequently taken to county courts, where judges seem to have no other power than to order the goods to be delivered to the owner without any money payment to the pawnbroker.

3082. But can the County Court do that before prosecution to conviction of the thief?—Before or after, I think.

3083. Under what authority?—Under the common law.

3084. Are you aware that that is not the common law?—I am not quite sure whether it applies before the conviction of a thief, but certainly it does afterwards.

3085. But this would seem to be a clause which would enable the magistrate to restore the goods before the conviction of the offender; is that so?—Yes; but lawyers have argued in court that the goods ought to be proved to have been the subject of a proved felony before they come under the definition of stolen goods.

3086. Will you read the section of the Act to which you refer?—It is the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106, s. 292. It is the Liverpool Police and Improvement Act: "And whereas, doubts have arisen whether goods unlawfully deposited, pledged, pawned, or exchanged, may be restored to the owner in cases of summary conviction, or where the goods are produced without the issue of any search warrant; be it declared and enacted, that it shall be lawful for any justice to order that any goods unlawfully pawned, pledged, or exchanged within the borough, which shall be brought before him, and the ownership of which shall be established to the satisfaction of such justice, shall be delivered up to the owner by the party with whom they were so unlawfully pawned, pledged, or exchanged, either without compensation, or such compensation to the party in question as the justice may seem fit."

3087. Is there another provision in the 288th section?—That is what we call the "not-accounting clause," but I find that the General Pawnbrokers' Act, section 10, embodies the same principle, only with much more verbiage.

3088. This clause, in fact, extends the Pawnbrokers' Act to every one in Liverpool, does it not?—It does; the clause is as follows: "And be it enacted, that any person who shall be brought before any justice charged with having in his possession within the borough, or conveying in any manner anything which may be reasonably suspected of being stolen, or unlawfully obtained, and who shall not give an account to the satisfaction of such justice how he came by the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 5 l., or, in the discretion of a justice, may be imprisoned in the gaol or house of correction of the borough, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two months."

3089. Have you any other suggestion to offer upon the present Pawnbrokers' Acts?—Section 3 of the present Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, repeals in effect, the whole of section 2 in the same Act. Section 3, which states that the pawnbroker must take interest not exceeding 20 per cent., appears to make section 2 of no use. In section 3, you will perceive the words, "At the rate of 4 d. and no more for the loan of 20 s. by the calendar month."

3090. That is for any intermediate pawn or pledge, and it applies to any sum except those particular sums stated, does it not?—Yes; if the word word "intermediate" was left out, that section would be quite sufficient without the other.

3091. But, if I understand the section rightly, the specific sum to be lent, for instance, under the other clause is 10*s.*, is it not, and the charge is to be 2*d.*; and that rate of 2*d.* applies only to particular sums of 10*s.*?—I think not.

3092. You say that clause 3 in effect repeals clause 2, but clause 2, as I read it, directs a charge to be taken for a particular sum lent and no other sum. Then clause 3 relates to all intermediate sums between the sums particularly specified in clause 2, does it not?—But for all the sums mentioned in clause 2, the rate fixed is at the rate of 4*d.* and no more, for the loan of 10*s.*, and section 3 enacts that the intermediate sums shall be at the same rate.

3093. Then section 3 fills up the gap which is left by section 2, is not that so?—It does; but it is just another illustration of the useless verbiage of which the Act is full.

3094. Of the clumsy mode of framing the schedule?—Yes; the whole of sections 2 and 3 might have been framed within four lines or five lines.

3095. You mean that section 3 would have done just as well without section 2 for everything above 2*s.* 6*d.* and below 40*s.*?—Precisely. As to section 4, which enacts that pawnbrokers are to give farthings, I may say, that in Liverpool farthings are scarcely known, and it is frequently the case that rows of pins have been given in lieu of farthings, whether from the scarcity of the coin or from other causes, I cannot say; but I have not seen a farthing in Liverpool certainly within the last six years, although I have had some thousands of pounds passing through my hands.

3096. Mr. T. Hughes.] You have had large experience among the persons who deal with pawnbrokers, have you not?—I have.

3097–8. And from what you have observed, do you think they are chiefly persons wanting in intelligence; they are "marksmen," the greater portion of them, you say; do you think that they are able to hold their own in a bargain with a tradesman of intelligence?—No, I should scarcely think they are.

3099. Then you would not advocate perfect freedom of contract, I presume?—I would not, excepting it might be on large bulky furniture or goods of that description, which under present circumstances the poor are compelled to sell, as they cannot raise money upon them at a pawnshop.

3100. Otherwise, do you think that in the present Act the limit of 10*l.* is a fair one?—Yes.

3101. You would not be inclined to recommend that it should be lowered to 2*l.*, so far as your experience goes?—I think that free contracts on such articles as I have named might be made, but not lower than 2*l.*

3102. I think I understood you to say, that you do not think that the present system sufficiently identifies the pledger?—In many instances thieves go free from want of identification.

3103. When you say that thieves go free, do you mean thieves who have dealt with pawnbrokers?—Yes.

3104. In your experience, is it frequently the case in Liverpool that the thieves make much use of the pawnbroker's shops?—They do; those who are convicted are frequently convicted through the pawnbroker's evidence. There may be four or five pawnbrokers in one case, three of whom may identify a prisoner, and two may not, and yet all the goods may be identified.

3105. Do the pawnbrokers in Liverpool give proper facilities to the police for tracing stolen goods?—They assist the police very much as a rule.

3106. Then should you recommend any strengthening of the Act, or any alteration of the Act, as to the power of the heads of the police in the shops of the pawnbrokers?—It would be well if the head constable under his hand could order an inspector to search for certain specified goods which could not be now searched for, because their present power of issuing search warrants seems to require an oath that the goods have been stolen, and that they are likely to be in a particular place; and it would be well, I think, to enable the police to search the pawnbrokers' shops, when specially directed by the head constable, so that the very few pawnbrokers who are unwilling to incur the loss might really be compelled to have their shops searched for the stolen goods.

3107. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You said that you considered the scale too low; the present scale of interest is 20 per cent., is it not?—Before I studied the matter I thought the pawnbrokers were a highly paid class. I thought that they must be making a vast deal of money out of their pledge department, but the more I have become acquainted with pawnbrokers, prior to this Act being sought, the more I have arrived at another opinion.

3108. Is it not the fact that the charge for the ticket is not sufficient, and not that the rate of interest is too low?—I think that you have been calling interest what I mean to include as other charges; that is to say, what we call interest is not really all interest, but it includes the expenses of working the shop, as I understand.

3109. In fact, there is rather a confusion between the ticket and the interest, is there not?—I do not think that the price which is got for a ticket would be sufficient to pay the assistants, and the rents and the losses which a pawnbroker would incur. If it did, he would be amply paid by the 20 per cent., and too well paid.

3110. Therefore, do you not think that if any rise is to take place it should be in the ticket and not in the rate of interest?—If it is called interest, and is confined to that, I should say 7½ per cent. clear profit would be amply sufficient.

3111. But it is the rate of interest, because it is on so many shillings for every month, which is a rate of interest, is it not?—That includes profit and working; really, it has to cover loss of every kind.

3112. It has to cover the interest on the money and also the expense of working the business, has it not?—That is what I mean.

3113. But is not the halfpenny too much for simply giving up the duplicate?—It is beyond the cost of printing, no doubt, but I do not think that it is equal to the cost of an establishment such as a pawnbroker has to keep up.

3114. But you say that interest at 20 per cent. is not sufficient, because the expense of the establishment has to be charged upon it; and then you say that the halfpenny is not sufficient because the expense of the establishment has to be charged upon that; will you explain how you reconcile those statements?—I look upon the two sums together.

Mr. Stubbs.

3115. How would the poor be benefited by the increase of the rate?—I should be sorry to have the rate increased on account of the poor if I did not think that the simplification would be of great advantage to them. At present there are many benefits conferred by the Act of Parliament which are quite unknown to the poor.

3116. To what benefits do you allude?—I could enumerate several, no doubt; I think that the days of grace are unknown to the generality of people. I think that their not being liable to pay on the first part of a month is unknown to them, and there are several other benefits which the Act confers, which are unknown to the poor because it is such a bulky Act.

3117. But would you not, if you raised the rate, do away with those extraordinary privileges which they might enjoy, but which they are ignorant of now?—They do not enjoy them now, because they are unknown to them, and I think that something that they really did understand, and that they could trust by comparing it with the mark on the ticket, would be a very great advantage. At present, I believe, they are often overcharged, and, though an increased rate is recommended by me, I think it would really be no greater charge upon the poor than they are now subjected to, because they are really subject to an overcharge.

3118. Because they have been defrauded by the pawnbrokers?—Yes.

3119. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] I gather from your evidence that you have been brought a good deal into contact with pawnbrokers?—Yes.

3120. Are you well acquainted with their modes of doing business?—Simply from hearing of them.

3121. You are connected with the police court, I believe?—I am.

3122. Have you anything to do with the pawnbroking business?—I have no further acquaintance with any of them than having met them on business at the police court; I have no relations who are pawnbrokers and I have no visiting friends among them.

3123. You say that in many instances the pawnbrokers afford every facility to discover stolen goods?—They do.

3124. But in some instances they are backward?—Exactly.

3126. But there may be cases where they could not prove a conviction, but where it might be apparent to the magistrates that they held back information; now, if a pawnbroker had to apply annually, the magistrates would have it in their power to grant the license or not; do you think that that would be of any importance to the community at large?—I think not; if there had been cases at all frequently where pawnbrokers had been censured by magistrates, I should have been of a different opinion, but it is so rarely that you hear a master pawnbroker censured that I do not think that there is any requirement for a magistrate's license in Liverpool.

3127. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Have you heard any complaints from the pawnbrokers with regard to being obliged to keep the pledges in their possession for 12 months?—Never before this new Act was contemplated.

3128. Have you had such complaints since?—Since then I have heard them say that it would be a benefit to have the time shortened to six months.

3129. But you have no personal observation of it yourself as to how it acts?—The only observation that I could make would be that the operation of the six months might possibly get the poor people to take their winter clothes out at the begining of winter, if they found that they would be forfeited otherwise.

3130. Colonel Beresford.] Are you of opinion that the present Bill would be an advantage to the pawners generally, as well as to the pawnbrokers?—With the alterations which I have recommended, I think it would be an advantage to the poor and to the pawnbrokers.

3131. You stated that a large per-centage of the pawners at the present time are ignorant about the Act; that they do not know how much they pay, and that the increased rates in reality would not mulct them in any larger charge than they pay at present. How is it that those people are not informed by the pawnbrokers, and that they are not made alive to the advantages in the Act which tell in their favour?—I can only say that if I were a pawnbroker I should feel it my duty to tell the poor the advantages which the Act gave them.

3132. Do you think that, as a rule, they are quite left in the dark as to the advantages?—Yes, I think they are, as a rule.

3133. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Why would you limit the pawns by special contract to sums above 40 s.?—Those articles, I should say, would only be possessed by people of moderate means and intelligence.

3134. Might not a cottager, for instance, or any poor man, prefer to part with something which he had in his house which was bulky rather than with a suit of clothes which he might require?—That is the very reason which I gave for recommending freedom of contract.

3135. Why would you limit the special contract to sums above 40 s.?—I think it would be a safeguard to the poor (I speak of the ignorant poor), who mostly pledge articles under 40 s.

3136. Do you not think that the majority of the poor who pledge, who are above 21 years of age, would be able to make a contract?—No, not entirely to their advantage in many instances, if pawnbrokers are what I have read that they are in other towns, such as in Scotland. In Liverpool the pawnbrokers are a very fair dealing, respectable class of people.

3137. Do you think they are, as a class, worse in Scotland than in England?—They must be, if certain evidence which I have read be true.

3138. Chairman.] Is it your opinion that a labourer who owns a bedstead is not capable of buying that bedstead or selling it?—He is quite capable of buying it or selling it, but I think that many labourers would prefer to pledge it rather than to sell it, or, at all events, to have the option.

3139. Then is he not as good a judge of the value of his bedstead, and of the expediency of dealing ing with it when he pledges it, as he would hen he buys it or sells it?—Yes, but I would him to be protected.

40. Why should a man be protected who es to pledge his bedstead?—On the same ciple that we shelter children who cannot care of themselves, we ought to protect weak ignorant men.

41. If a man prefers not to sleep on a bed- d, why should he not be at liberty not to do —He has now the power of selling it if he ks proper, but I think he would in some s prefer pledging it.

42. If he prefers pledging it, why should the law allow him to do so; what objection ere to a man pledging his bedstead?—I said the law should allow him to do it.

43. But supposing that it is impossible for a nbroker to take in a bedstead and warehouse r 12 months for a penny, do you think that the should insist upon conditions which render actically impossible for it to be done?—I k I have said that for bulky articles I would mmend special contracts to be entered into nable a man to pledge a bedstead, or other y article, which he cannot now do.

44. Then I understand you to say, that for rticles for which warehouse room might be imately charged, whatever their value might the pawnbroker ought to be at liberty to e a contract as regards that special transac- ?—For bulky articles, and sums exceeding

45. Would you apply the same rule to ile articles which require to be handled with , such as glass, or would you call that a bulky le for its value?—I think it would, to a in extent, be a benefit to the poor to led to pledge any article of value which they essed.

46. Do you think that the same rule might pplied to an article which would deteriorate, s being a consumable article if he possessed nd that he ought to be at liberty to make a ract for his own convenience whatever might s value?—Yes.

47. Supposing that he had a cheese, and he did not want to eat it immediately, do think that the law should prevent him if he ts to borrow money upon that cheese, from owing money upon it?—No; I think that law should enable him to do it; but at the time I would like to see the law throw a ection over poor uneducated people, who ot sign a contract which they did not oughly understand.

48. Then if the law prevents his pledging nd compels him to sell it, instead of the law ecting him it does exactly the reverse, does ot?—The law as it now stands prevents his ging it.

149. And therefore it compels him to sell it? xactly.

150. And therefore, instead of protecting , the law injures him, does it not?—It , but it protects him from imposition of high rest.

151. Do you know the difference between price at which a man would be able to sell a se and to buy it back again as compared n the charge which a pawnbroker would make its being pledged?—I should say that the n could sell it at the market value, and pledge or something less.

3152. Have you any idea of what a man would sell a cheese for to a cheesemonger, as compared with what he would have to give when he went to buy half a pound of cheese?—I do not know the difference between the wholesale and retail trade for cheeses; I am not in that line.

3153. Do you think it would be more or less than he would pay the pawnbroker for pledging his cheese for a month?—I should say that if a pawnbroker were obliged to keep it unsold for a length of time he would not lend as much upon the cheese as a person would who could sell it immediately.

3154. But if he could lend money for a short time for certain, then do you think that he could accommodate the man much more conveniently than he would be accommodated by having to sell his cheese?—Yes.

3155. Then if the law does not allow that to be done, does not the law injure the working man instead of benefiting him?—To a certain extent it does.

3156. Is not that the case with regard to all commodities which the working man might advantageously pledge rather than sell if the law prevents his pledging them in a convenient manner?—Yes.

3157. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Did you ever hear of a case of a pawnbroker taking a cheese in pawn?—I never heard of such a case in my life. I have heard of strange things being pawned, but never a cheese. I should say that it would scent any other article in his shop.

3158. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you see any other reason why such a transaction should not be entered into by special agreement?—I do; I think the very smell of a cheese among his other goods would deter him.

3159. But are you supposing that the pawnbroker shall not merely have what is called an ordinary pawnbroker's shop, but a warehouse, and that in that warehouse he shall be allowed to store any kind of goods which may be brought to him by special contract?—It would be in that case, no doubt, easy to pledge a cheese.

3160. With regard to sums under 40 s., I will suppose that a man has a valuable chair, an arm-chair, or any other kind of chair you like, and he prefers to part with that to parting with his Sunday coat, which he might want, perhaps to-morrow, and yet he may wish to get 5 s. or 10 s.; the pawnbroker would not take the chair, because it is a bulky article; do you see any reason why he should not have the opportunity of pledging his chair as well as the opportunity of pledging his coat?—I do not speak so positively about the limit of the money as of the bulk of the article. I have said he should have power to pledge a chair.

3161. You would not object, in the case that I have put, that a man should, by special contract, pledge his chair rather than his coat or his blanket?—Exactly.

3162. Chairman.] If you were going to make yourself the guardian of grown-up people, would you not rather that a man should pledge his bedstead, and sleep on the floor than that he should pledge his clothes?—I should like him to have his choice.

3163. But the law undertakes to choose for him; in this case do you think that the law has made a wise choice?—No, not as it now stands.

3164. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Is it your opinion

Mr. Stubbs.

that there ought to be a limit to the rate of interest charged by pawnbrokers upon articles except other than those which you have stated as being bulky?—I only spoke about the limit, thinking that would be some protection in case of dishonest pawnbrokers; there is no doubt that among the pawnbrokers there are, as amongst every other class of people, some who would take advantage of a man's poverty or a man's ignorance, and get him to sign an agreement which, if he did not well understand it, would be disadvantageous to him.

3165. It is your opinion, is it not, that the great bulk of the class of people who pawn articles are unfitted to cope with the pawnbrokers themselves in making a bargain?—No doubt; the pawnbrokers are an educated class of men, capable of driving a harder bargain than the majority of pledgers.

3166. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would not that difficulty be met by having a statutory rate, which would be enforced unless there were some special contract?—To the extent which I have named, I think it would.

3167. Chairman.] After all, is not the essence of the bargain which is made between the two parties the amount of money which will be lent upon the pledge?—No, the essence of the transaction is the amount which the poor would have to pay for the use of that money.

3168. But is not the essence of the transaction which is going on the amount of money which is to be received upon the pledge, and is not that the main point upon which the negotiation turns?—No, the question is what would have to be paid at the redemption of the article.

3169. Do you think that, in the minds of those ignorant people who are dealing, the chief point is the sum which they will have to pay upon the redemption rather than the sum which they will get advanced upon the pledge?—At the time of their pledging it may be that the amount which they get upon the article would be their chief consideration.

3170. If they could get more at one pawnbroker's than at another they would probably go to the man who would give most, would they not?—Not invariably. Sometimes a person requires only a small sum, and he has a valuable article, and he would not like to be charged a great interest for the amount lent.

3171. Do you think that a person who is so dealing with his goods is an improvident pledger, or is he not rather a person who is dealing providently for some useful object?—There are a class of people who are provident, who use pawnbrokers. I should call such a person provident.

3172. Do you think that a provident person dealing with a pawnbroker is a person who cannot be trusted to deal in borrowing in the same way as he can be trusted to buy and sell in his daily life?—There are many provident people who are very ignorant, and who would not understand how to cope with a pawnbroker who wished to have a very exorbitant interest.

3174. Do you think that those people cannot follow so simple a statement as that for every month for every 2 s. 6 d. they will have to pay one halfpenny?—They could follow that, and that is a scale which I recommend; but when it comes to making special contracts upon such terms as might be dictated by a skilful pawnbroker, they might be led into making bargains which were disadvantageous to them.

3175. Is it your opinion that if they were asked to pay a penny extra, they would not understand that?—That is a simple way of putting it and a way in which it would not be put to them I am afraid.

3176. Colonel Beresford.] Do you think that doing away with contract altogether, and throwing it open, would either benefit the pawnbroker or the pledgers?—I think it would be more for the benefit of the pawnbrokers than of the pledgers.

3177. Do you not think that throwing it open would raise up a host of small people in the trade?—It might have that effect.

3178. And that could not possibly benefit the pawnbrokers at the present time, could it?—No.

3179. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You have not heard of any proposition to throw the trade entirely open, have you?—I have not.

Mr. Rayner Storr, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Storr.

3180. Chairman.] You are, I believe, an Auctioneer?—I am.

3181. And you are in the habit of selling the unredeemed pledges taken by pawnbrokers, are you not?—Yes; that is a large portion of our business.

3182. Those sales are conducted by auction, are they not?—Yes.

3183. Do the pawnbrokers attend those sales for the purpose of protecting their goods?—They do.

3184. Are they also buyers of goods at the sales?—In the nature of protectors of their goods, they are of necessity occasionally buyers.

3185. They have to buy them in, to prevent their being sold at a loss to themselves, if they think that the public do not offer a sufficient price, is that so?—Just so.

3186. Are the sales frequented by any other class of people but pawnbrokers?—They are frequented by every class of buyers, both private persons and dealers in general.

3187. That is to say, dealers in second-hand goods?—By dealers in second-hand goods, shopkeepers, sometimes noblemen, and continually gentlemen looking out for cheap lots and bargains.

3188. Do the gentlemen generally buy themselves, or through brokers?—They generally buy themselves, but occasionally through brokers.

3189. Is the attendance pretty good at the auctions?—Very large indeed; our room is almost always crowded.

3190. Do you find that there is generally an active bidding for the goods which are offered?—Always.

,91. Do you get a reserved price put upon he goods when they are sent to you, or is the ve made by the bidding of the owner at the ?—Chiefly by the bidding of the owner at sale, who attends behind us.

92. Does he judge for himself at the time? o; he would examine his goods, and form opinon of them beforehand.

93. Does he judge as to whether the goods go at that sum?—Certainly.

94. Is it always by his own bid?—Always is own bid.

95. Are many goods bought in by pawnrers themselves?—It varies very much with pawnbrokers themselves. We endeavour courage them to sell as much as possible.

96. Do the public (that is to say, some per other than the seller of the goods) chiefly the goods, or does the seller generally buy greater part of his goods?—By very far the er portion is sold to the public.

97. What do you think is the per-centage n all round, bought by the pawnbrokers selves, of their own goods.?—I have never e a calculation of the per-centage at all, but rough guess I should say certainly not more one-third, or perhaps not more than oneth would be bought in by the pawnbrokers.

98. Your communication with the pawnrers would enable you to judge pretty well ther the prices which they get cover their nces; what is your opinion, as the general lt of your communications with them, upon point?—I should say that the general result omething like a par. There would be cery no average profit, and there would be a iderable loss occasionally. At times some ls of course may bring a profit.

199. Then they have to bear all the expenses he sale, have they not?—They have.

200. And that would be a considerable reion, I presume?—Our terms are 5 per cent. awnbrokers. They prepare their own lists, forward them in manuscript ready to our d, and therefore we deal with them in a e liberal spirit than we do with the trade at e.

201. Are all their lots prepared for you?— their lots are ready prepared for us, and the is made out for our catalogue; therefore our rge is 5 per cent. for the goods sold, free of charge, except for the unsold, which is asionally 1 s. per lot, but as a rule 6 d. per

202. Do you sell many small pledges?—Yes; asionally the unredeemed lots come down as as 5 s.

203. You are obliged to sell every pledge arately, are you not?—Yes, certainly; that is say, the pawnbroker is obliged to make out a of his unredeemed pledges, each pledge being arate.

3204. I suppose it is necessary to get through sale of such small goods as that with conerable dispatch?—We sell about 100 lots an ur, and that is not so fast as many auction rooms London.

3205. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] That is nearly two minute, is it not?—Not exactly, it varies; netimes not more than 70 lots can be sold in an ur if they are important lots.

3206. Mr. T. Hughes.] You say that occanally goods are bought in by the pawnbroker; t I suppose when you say that they are bought in, you mean that a reserved bidding has been fixed before the auction opens?—Yes, as a rule, a reserved price would be placed upon the lots. It is at the pawnbroker's discretion whether he adheres to that reserved price or not.

3207. Then do you allow the pawnbroker to bid just as one of the public?—Exactly.

3208. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] What sort of people attend those sales; are they dealers?—Very largely dealers; but, as I have already explained, we have the public in general.

3209. But the great bulk of the articles, I suppose, are purchased by the trade; by dealers?—I should say that the larger portion would necessarily be so.

3210. And not by pawnbrokers themselves?—Certainly not. There is a point in my evidence with regard to the combination of dealers which is called the "knock out," as to how far that is affected by the public bidding in general. The power of the "knock out," that is to say, the power of combination of dealers to prevent goods fetching their legitimate price, is very small indeed. It is almost at an end; largely in consequence of our care in bringing buyers in, general shopkeepers and others behind the counter, to oppose them; and largely by the reserved price placed by the pawnbrokers on their goods, which prevents the goods being sold very much below their value; and largely from the general concourse of people in the room besides.

3211. We see many accounts in the newspapers of the public being prevented from going to purchase by people being stationed in the room to prevent them; that is not true?—That is not true in our room, certainly. The letters to which the honourable Member alludes have chiefly applied to out-of-door sales, at private residences, at which such a system is more possible though not usual at all where auctioneers conduct their business well. In our place it is simply impossible; the public could not be prevented from coming into our room, and they do come.

3212. Colonel Beresford.] Is the reserved price, as a rule, simply the amount for which the article has been pawned and the interest upon it?—I should say, as a rule, that would guide the pawnbroker; but if he were a good man of business his chief guide, I should say, would be the actual market value of the article which he has to sell.

3213. It would not be the rule then?—Certainly not, with a good man of business. It might perhaps influence the mind of a man who was not a good judge himself. The reasonable market price at a forced sale would be the price which should guide the pawnbroker.

3214. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Have you good means of knowing who buys for pawnbrokers at those sales. May not a pawnbroker send a stranger to purchase?—It is possible that he might do so, but I never knew of his doing so.

3215. But might it be done without your knowing?—Certainly it might.

3216. Is it not the case that at auctions, if an independent member of the public goes in to buy where the brokers purchase, the brokers combine in order to run up any article which the independent man may wish to buy, in order to deter him from returning to purchase?—I should say that it would not be very frequently done, though it is possible that it might be done. It would be very much to the prejudice of the dealers if they did it, because they would have to buy the goods at a very largely enhanced value. I have heard the insinuation before, but I am quite sure that there is no ground for it whatever, or so infinitesimally small a ground that it does not operate at all.

3217. Have you known such cases?—I cannot call to mind such cases.

3218. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I think I understood you to say, that most of your lots were above 5*s.*?—Certainly. I think the Chairman's question was how low did the lots go occasionally, and I cited the amount of 5*s.* in order to show that very frequently pawnbrokers lose upon their 10*s.* pledges. Of course an article must be above 10*s.* or of 10*s.* to be a pledge, but it is very seldom, fortunately for them and for us, that lots are sold at that small price.

3219. I suppose the pawnbroker is not compelled to sell all his low pledges separately, but he may combine two or three pledges in a lot?—In that case they would not be auction pledges in the sense of the Act.

3220. But the pawnbroker is allowed to put two or three pledges of 3*s.* or 4*s.* together to make one lot for you, is he not?—Those would not be actually auction pledges.

3221. But above 10*s.* they have to be sold separately?—Yes. Of course he would be at liberty to combine what we call low goods, the smaller class of pledges.

3222. In point of fact, he might throw three of these low pledges together, might he not?—Yes.

3223. Mr. T. Hughes.] But that is because they have become his own property, I presume?—Certainly.

3224. Chairman.] Does your experience in business enable you to tell us how much is considered the legitimate profit of a person dealing in second-hand goods, such as you sell by auction, to a retail dealer of such goods?—I think it is scarcely in my province; I could not form an opinion as to that.

3225. Could you form an opinion upon that point from your communications with dealers in second-hand goods?—I do not think that I could give an opinion which would be worth having upon the subject. I never follow the goods beyond our own house, and I do not know what becomes of them, so that I think that my opinion on the subject would be delusive.

3226. Mr. T. Hughes.] Your business must have brought you largely in connection with the pawnbrokers of London, I presume?—Very largely.

3227. For how many years?—For 15 years.

3228. Do you consider them, on the whole, a prosperous body, and a flourishing set of tradesmen?—That might open out a very long answer. I associate with them as men of business, and I find that in addition to being pawnbrokers, they deal largely in contract deposits, and they deal largely in the sale of goods. They have many businesses combined under one head, and therefore when I estimate them quâ pawnbrokers, I should say that they would not be a prosperous body of men; but finding them as I find them, I am fortunately able to say that they are a prosperous body of men.

3229. Do you not think that the pawnbroking business, pure and simple, is a paying trade?—I do not think it would be a very profitable trade; I should not like to embark in it myself if I were cut off from any other means of livelihood.

2230. Mr. Ridley.] Can you give any reason for its being a large trade, then?—I should give the reason which I have just assigned, viz. that they are able to do other trades in combination with it.

3231. Do you think that pawnbroking would enable them to carry on the rest of their business more advantageously?—I mean to say that two businesses would be more profitable than one.

3232. But if the one business is an unprofitable one, how does it assist the other?—I did not say that it was an unprofitable one, but that they would not be in so flourishing a position as they are, if they were not able to combine other businesses with it.

3233. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you mean that it would not be profitable to follow the pawnbroking trade simply?—It might be worth one man's while, but not another's. Fortunately, my friends are able to combine other businesses with it, and they are a prosperous class, I am glad to say.

3234. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You consider that the pawnbrokers are a prosperous class, but that they are not prosperous because of the pawnbroking, but because of the other businesses which they carry on?—I think that they are prosperous because of the businesses they carry on.

3235. Have you had occasion to investigate the books of pawnbrokers?—Very frequently for the purpose of the sale of their businesses.

3236. And you give that opinion because of the investigation which you have made, that the business is not profitable?—I did not say that the business was not profitable; I think that the Chairman would corroborate me in saying that these general questions are likely to lead to delusive answers. I have said that the prosperity of the connection for which I have the honour of acting cannot depend only upon pawnbroking, and that the fact of its being a prosperous connection is not altogether attributable to pawnbroking.

3237. Chairman.] Perhaps the best way of eliciting your opinion upon the matter would be this: do you think that anybody makes as much profit upon the best pawnbroking business in London, merely from his pawnbroking business as is made from the best retail businesses of other classes in London?—Certainly a pawnbroker could not make as much as is made in an ordinary retail business; in an ordinary retail business the profits would be very much larger in proportion to the amount of capital employed than in a purely ordinary pawnbroking business.

3238. Mr. Orr Ewing.] That is your opinion founded upon your knowledge of the two trades?—That is my opinion founded upon my knowledge of various trades.

3239. Have you any knowledge of the retail trade?—I have been called in to a good many businesses to examine books and make transfers.

3240. To what kind of businesses do you refer?—Silversmiths' businesses, and jewellers' businesses, and others.

Mr. ROBERT ATTENBOROUGH, called in; and Examined.

3241. Chairman.] WILL you be good enough give the Committee any information respecting e business of pawnbroking which you think ey ought to have?—I shall be very happy to so.

3242. Is there any particular point upon which u wish to give the Committee information?—I ill take the Bill, if you please, because although me portion of that, I think, would be good for e trade and good for the public, there are por-ons of it which I think would be very detri-ental to the trade, and would cause at least lf a million of money, if it were passed in its tirety, to be withdrawn from the trade forth-th.

3244. What would you make the limit?—I ink 2 l. would be a very good limit; but I would ot object to 5 l.

3245. Do you think that a person who carries a business under 2 l. should not carry on a siness above 2 l., and that a person who carries a business above 2 l. should not carry on a siness under 2 l. in the same shop?—Undoubt-lly.

3246. Would you allow him to do it in another op?—I should not have the slightest objection that.

3247. Then, in point of fact, you would re-uire him to have two houses side by side, instead one, would you not?—If he occupied them for oth portions of the business.

3248. But would it not be putting an extra harge upon the people who went to borrow oney, if there were the rents of two houses to ay and two establishments to keep up?—That ould depend upon how you are going to shape our Act. I am quite sure that the Irish rate is ot more than sufficient to pay the low pawn-rokers; but, supposing you let them make con-acts for any sum they please, it will be charged t such a price that I think it would be fully re-unerative; I am sure that it would be for 5 l. nd under, and I do not know that it would not e for 2 l. and under.

3249. What is the advantage to society which ou expect would arise from imposing upon per-ons who borrow money the cost of keeping up wo establishments instead of one?—The advan-ages would be these, to my mind: there are a ery great many highly respectable people who ome to pawnbrokers to borrow money. I per-aps may tell you that I have myself more than 00,000 l. employed in the business. I have one house the business of which is rather low, the average of which would be something over 1 l.; the other three are very much higher. I hardly like mentioning any particular party; but professional people and others (I might say Members of Parliament themselves, for I have had them) come to me to borrow money, and I am sure all those people, whoever they are, of that character, who have plate and jewels to pledge, would prefer to come to a silverbroker's: in fact, I have had it suggested to me myself. Such people would not sell clothes, or anything of that sort; they would have jewellery and plate in the windows, and, in fact, such houses as the higher classes would not object to come into; it would be much pleasanter to them to come to us, and we should be in a different position from what we are in now.

3250. You would like, in fact, that the house should have the appearance of selling valuable goods, so that persons who came in might be supposed to go as buyers?—Yes, they will do it, and you can scarcely have any idea of the extent to which it is carried.

3251. What is there in the present law to prevent you from doing that, if you please?—We are still pawnbrokers, as you see. If you let the pawnbroking license remain as it is, and make the silverbroking license double the amount, say 30 l. instead of 15 l. for the license, I should have no objection to that.

3252. Above 10 l. you may do whatever you like, without any license, can you not?—Anything which we like. I have heard a good deal about the Pawnbrokers Act; I look upon the Pawnbrokers Act as an enabling thing. It enables me to do what another man cannot do; but it does not prevent me, in my opinion, from doing anything which another man can do, although I am a pawnbroker. In fact, I might say, that when this new Act first passed, enabling us to lend money to any amount, for any time, it was the opinion of the public that we could not do it.

3253. The only thing which the law requires you now to do is to put an inscription over your shop, I believe?—"Robert Attenborough, Licensed Pawnbroker," and that is rather objectionable.

3254. The only alteration requisite in the law, to give effect to your views, seems to be that you should not be compelled to put that inscription on your house if you do not deal in pledges under 40 s. or 5 l., as the case may be?—Certainly; or whatever is your pleasure.

3255. But that is all the change that would be necessary in the law to enable you to do what you want to do without interfering with the wishes of other people who wish to do otherwise; is not that so?—Of course I would rather that there should be no inscription over the door.

3256. There is nothing else required at all, is there?—Not with regard to the title of the trade. I have no objection whatever to all the regulations; they are of no difficulty or trouble to me in any way.

3257. In those cases I presume you wish to make your own bargain for everything above the limit which you prescribe?—Not at all; I am quite satisfied with 15 per cent. per annum, as it stands now, whether you fix it for 2 l. or 5 l.

3258. On

Mr. Robert Attenborough.
7 July 1870.

3258. On transactions above the limit which you propose, do you think that the rate of interest is sufficient?—Quite sufficient; I think 15 per cent. per annum is quite sufficient.

3259. Mr. T. Hughes.] How do you mean that it is 15 per cent.?—It is 15 per cent. per annum above 2 l. 2 s. The Act of Parliament gives 15 per cent. per annum, which is 3 d. in the pound per month, and below 2 l. 2 s. it is 20 per cent. per annum, which is 4 d. in the pound per month.

3260. Chairman.] Have you considered the case of the people who do a very mixed business in the country, and would you leave them, if they pleased, to conduct both operations in one establishment?—I should think it would be very prudent in the country.

3261. Therefore, would you make it a permissive power for people who wish to do the higher business, that they should not be compelled to put the inscription that they were pawnbrokers over the door of their shop?—I think it would be very advantageous indeed.

3263. A week would be more simple, would it not?—No; it is not sufficient for the public. They have no business to be called upon to pay a month's interest for seven days; it is not right. By the same rule, I should regulate the higher trade as well; I do not wish to make one law for one, and one for another. Again, it has been suggested that you should mark the rate of interest upon the ticket; I think that would cause less dissatisfaction. If so, of course you must do away with what we call the "per annum." It would not be per annum. If you will allow me, I will illustrate it; 20 per cent. per annum on 3 s. for one month, is three farthings; for two months, although I multiply the money to give the right rate and say, twice three are six, it is five farthings; for three months, three times three are nine, but it is 2 d. It is those fractions and the 20 per cent. that confuse people; therefore I would give them one halfpenny, and a penny, and three halfpence per month, and not a multiplication of the principal sum to get at the 20 per cent. per annum.

3264. You would take the unit upon the month, and leave them to multiply it?—Exactly; and moreover it would be very profitable to them, because I have taken some pains to calculate it, and I am quite satisfied that the Irish rate taken up to the 1 l., as I suggest, would not be less than 35 per cent. per annum, instead of 20 per cent.; and I have no hesitation in saying that up to 2 l. it would be at least 30 per cent. per annum. When we get above 2 l. we do not take fractions.

3265. What do you think of the simplicity of having one halfpenny for half-a-crown?—I think it is not enough for them, and that it does not pay. It would do good to be more liberal for this reason: there are a wretched lot of dolly-shops, or wee-pawns, as they are called. Feeling that I might have the honour of appearing before you, I positively devoted Sunday morning to coming from where I live, for the purpose of looking at those houses. We have one between me, in Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square, and Mr. Dobree. I have been there nearly 40 years. There is a house that a man of the name of Abrahams keeps. He was in the New Road, and he had there nothing but a leaving-shop. He was prosecuted by the St. Pancras vestry for taking in some of the vestry apparel, and, finally, he left there; and now he has stationed himself in a back street called Cumberland-street, which runs parallel with Charlotte-street. That man positively tired my patience out. His shop was open and they were very busy; people were going in and out up to 12 o'clock on the Sunday. On the Monday morning I looked out that house in the "Directory," and found, to my horror, that he was a pawnbroker. He has endorsed himself as a pawnbroker, although, as he breaks the law, he might be punished for Sunday morning trading.

3266. Mr. T. Hughes.] Why does not your society prosecute him?—They ought to do so. They do not do half, I think, what they ought to do.

3267. And yet they come to the Committee to help them, when they might help themselves?—They ought to punish such men, and then I am satisfied we should root them out. This man has positively gone and taken out a license, and he is a pawnbroker. They employ only about 500 l. They do not take in anything but soft goods; for instance, wearing apparel; they do not take in any plate or jewellery; and, I daresay, by their charges they make 500 l. profit upon that, or very likely more.

3268. Chairman.] What is the occasion for the existence of those people?—They take in goods that we should not take in.

3269. You do not take in the goods, because it is not profitable to you to take them in under the Act of Parliament, I presume?—Not only that, but if I have a lot of low people in my shop, respectable people will not wait. If a gentleman comes into my shop to pledge a 20 l. or 30 l. watch, he will not stay beside a female of that class.

3270. The result appears to be this: that the law not allowing people to do what they want to do, they do it in spite of the law?—That is so; and then, again, they are open at all hours of the night.

3271. Is there not a remedy for that, by allowing people to do what they want to do?—If you come to the conclusion that there is to be free trade or free contract, you will endorse all those people who are now punishable.

3272. Would not the remedy be to allow the pawnbrokers to carry on the business in such a way as the community wish to have it carried on so that the public need not go to anybody else?—I do not quite understand you.

3273. You say that you do not do this business because it cannot be done profitably by you and therefore the business is done by other people, the legitimate pawnbroker cannot do this business

ness; is not that your statement?—They not do what is right, though that is a bold ng. I would not keep open my house a ent longer than the law allowed, and, in fact, not keep it open as long as the law does w. I open at eight o'clock, whereas the law seven o'clock; and I close at seven o'clock, reas the law says eight o'clock. There is a nbroker at the back of Mr. Dobree's, a highly ectable man, in Norfolk-street, who, no ot, would do the business if it was profitable, it ought to be done in the hours prescribed aw, and not on the Sunday.

274. Is your complaint confined to its being e on Sunday?—Not only on Sunday, but r the hours of business, and done in a way ch is thoroughly dishonest. They take things charge 6 d. for 2 s. 6 d. for a week.

275. Mr. Orr Ewing.] This gentleman whom refer to is a pawnbroker, is he not?—He has en out a license this year.

276. I suppose you agree with the right orable Chairman that you think a person er the Act ought to be punished for disying the Act?—Undoubtedly; I think the ce ought to punish such people. I wish our le would do it; but they do not, and for me, an individual, it would be very unpleasant to it.

277. Is it not the duty of the police to inigate those cases?—It ought to be so; but take no notice of it whatever.

278. Would you wish your trade to be put e under the surveillance of the police?—I uld not; if that was done I feel that at least a million of money would be withdrawn n the trade immediately, in London only.

279. Do you not think that the respectable nbroker has nothing to fear from being placed ler the inspection of the police?—Certainly

280. Whereas those dishonourable men, who a disgrace to the trade, would be pulled up punished when they broke the Act?—It uld be very objectionable to me, if policemen e allowed by law to come behind my counter look over my books. It would be very obionable to the needy genteel people who want pledge articles. I have a house in Duke-street, nchester-square, where we have beautiful dges, and I am sure my customers would be y sorry for a policeman to be allowed to come there and inspect the books.

3281. But the policeman would not know who se persons were; they never give their real nes, do they?—I beg your pardon. I know m all; my book contains their real names.

3282. Those pledges would be for very large ounts, would they not?—In all my pledges ve 10*l.*, I, of course, have to take care to ow who I am dealing with. In my ordinary siness we only take in perhaps 30 or 40 or 50 dges a day.

3283. I do not think that the police would be ry likely to trouble a respectable gentleman e yourself; laws are made not against the ll-doing, but against the evil-doing; and it is the purpose of restraining the evil-doers, that wnbrokers should be placed under the inection of the police?—I would not mind how ich you punished a man for doing wrong, but think giving a policeman the power to come o my house, and to go behind my counter, and o my warehouse, and to look at my books, would be very offensive to my feelings, and even though it might be done only once a year, I should say "Good-bye, I am off."

Mr. Robert Attenborough.

3284. If a robbery took place, and the police got information from the party who had lost the property that such a robbery had taken place, would it not be well that the police should have the power of going in to see whether any such property was recorded in the books, and if there was a suspicion that it was in the house, that they should have power to inspect the goods?—I think it totally unnecessary, inasmuch as any respectable pawnbroker would lend what assistance he could to detect thieves. If the police come to my house, as they do daily, and give us a paper, our business is first to see if we have those goods, and next to guard against receiving those goods. It may be right in Scotland, but I am sure it is unnecessary in London.

3285. Supposing that a pawnbroker were less respectable than yourself, might he not accept of stolen goods?—There is no man in London or the country occupying as much money in legitimate pawnbroking as myself; but there are plenty of pawnbrokers in London equally honourable and upright as myself; I hope there are hundreds.

3286. But I suppose there are some who are less honourable?—I fear there are, but I think very few; I should hope that there are certainly not 50 men in the metropolis who are doing business in any dishonourable or dishonest way.

3287. May not those 50 men do a great deal of mischief to the public interest?—Of course they might do mischief; but I hope there are not 10 such men. I am not speaking of my neighbour, Mr. Abrahams, and that class of people; but if you were to make free contracts, and if you were to throw the thing open, I am persuaded that there would be 500 pawnbrokers more in less than two years than there are now, and half of them Jews of the very lowest type in the metropolis.

3288. Mr. T. Hughes.] Does not the limit as to the hours prevent these from pawning?—I do not think it has that effect.

3289. Do you not think that being open all night would encourage pawning by thieves?—I would not have it open all night. I am in favour of from eight o'clock in the morning to seven o'clock in the evening all the year round.

3290. Then you approve of the present rule as to the limitation of the hours?—Not quite. I believe it is from eight o'clock in the morning to seven o'clock in the evening from Michaelmas to Lady-day, and from seven o'clock in the morning to eight o'clock in the evening from Lady-day to Michaelmas.

3291. But I understand you to be against taking away those restrictions as to hours?—No; I want it myself from eight o'clock to seven o'clock; I think that is quite long enough.

3292. Then do I understand you also to be in favour of a compulsory scale?—Decidedly; most assuredly; it is absolutely necessary.

3293. You do not think that absolute free trade would be beneficial?—It would be the most ruinous thing you could do, because, as I said before, I firmly believe that half a million of money at least would be withdrawn from the trade.

3294. May I ask whether you think that it would be a good thing to make the sale of pawntickets illegal, or to have some stronger law as regards regards the sale of pawnbrokers' tickets?—I do not think you could do better with it; you have already the 10*s.* limit; under that they are a low parcel of goods, and those they do not account for; above 10*s.* they are all accounted for.

Mr. Robert Attenborough.

3295. Your namesake, one Mr. Richard Attenborough, made a strong point of that; he thought that it would be beneficial to make the sale of pawn-tickets absolutely illegal; but you do not agree with him?—I did not understand the question; I should be very glad indeed if you would do so. With all we can do, we cannot avoid being "done," if I may put it pithily. In point of fact, I have no doubt that from 100,000 l. to 150,000 l. at the present moment is lent on pledges in the metropolis, all of which is pledged at a profit by those fellows who have no idea of ever taking those pledges out, and they go and sell the tickets. If once they were debarred from selling the tickets, the profits which they get on the goods would not be sufficient for them. It is not only the profit on the pawning, but there is a profit on the sale of the tickets as well. As a counterpoise to that, I think it would be a very good arrangement to introduce a clause whereby a respectable person having goods in pledge might give notice to the pawnbroker that he was not able to redeem them, and was not likely to be able to redeem them, and that he would feel obliged by the pawnbroker's disposing of them; thus stopping the interest and abandoning the goods, and making it imperative upon the pawnbrokers that so soon as they received that notice they should take the earliest opportunity they had of selling. I allude there more particularly to pledges above 10 s.

3296. If a man brought back his duplicate and said to the pawnbroker, "Sell the goods," you would suggest that they should then be sold forthwith?—Yes, at the very next sale. I do not say that he should have a sale on purpose. I myself sell with the gentleman, the Committee had before them just now, over 20,000 l. a year, regularly year after year; I sell a good deal more than that now, but I go into the City. There is a very respectable firm of auctioneers in the City, and circumstances have transpired which have caused me to send perhaps 10,000 l. worth a year to Messrs. Johnson & Dymond, in Gracechurch-street. They are equally respectable with Messrs. Debenham & Storr, and neither of them, I am sure, would be a party to anything wrong. If any low pawnbroker, or anybody else, were to attempt to have what I call a fallacious sale, and he were to give one of those gentlemen 50 l. or 100 l., he would not be a party to it; I am as confident of that as that I am now here.

3297. One of the former witnesses gave evidence as to what had taken place in Australia; can you give me any information as to that?—I cannot; but I have heard that the system there was a total failure.

3298. Chairman.] With regard to the expediency of shortening the time absolutely, do I understand you to say that you would leave it to the pledger to shorten the time?—No; the statutory rate must be defined, because there is no contract; but I rather differ from my friends in the higher class of business in regard to that; I am quite in favour of six months, with three months notice.

3299. Mr. T. Hughes.] So are they, are they not?—Not my more immediate friends; not the pawnbrokers who are employing large sums of money in the business.

3300. I understand them all to object to the year?—No; I know their object. There is a gentleman in the room at the present moment with whom I have had a great deal of conversation upon that. He says if you will let the pledges be sold at the end of six months, that will lessen the amount of capital that is required in the trade.

3301. Chairman.] I do not see that in the least; will you explain how that would arise?—I will take a 20,000 l. stock, for instance; that 20,000 l. stock would be pulled down to 15,000 l. directly, and the 10,000 l. to 8,000 l.

3302. It only represents the interest upon the interest, does it?—No, I have such an amount under six months, and such an amount above six months, in a 20,000 l. stock. I will take it for granted that I have 5,000 l. over and 15,000 l. under six months.

3303. Your profit consists in 15 per cent. per annum upon the capital, does it not?—Yes.

3304. The whole of that capital must be invested in order to give you 15 per cent., per annum, and therefore, whether the pledge is for three months or for one year, the thing is precisely the same, is it not, except that in one case you get interest upon interest, and in the other case you do not?—If you will allow me to explain. We have only six months' pledges in our houses. We do not want the capital. The capital must go away. I could work the 20,000 l. business with 15,000 l., if I had only to keep the goods for six months, without any difficulty whatever.

3305. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You have heard most of the evidence given before this Committee, have you not?—I have.

3306. I understand that you do not agree with those witnesses who state that the pawnbroking business has not been profitable?—I will tell you why it is not profitable, it is because they compete so much with one another; if they would but do all their business, every particle of it, to make it pay 20 per cent., that which is sold as well as that which is redeemed, I believe it would pay; but instead of getting anything by their out-of-date goods, in many instances they lose 15, 20, or 25 per cent. by them.

3307. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Then, an Act of Parliament would not do you any good, would it, even though we raised the rate, the competition being so great?—I am very much afraid that there would be more competition than ever; but still I am in favour of it, and I do really think that if the Irish rate was adopted up to 2 l., it would be an advantage. I do not myself think it necessary to have 20 per cent. higher than 2 l.; but I daresay that would not be acceptable, therefore I would agree to 25 per cent. up to 2 l., and 20 per cent. up to 5 l., but certainly no more than 15 per cent. above 5 l. By giving the monthly rate, to commence at the end of ten days (which is four days in their favour) and by doing away with the 25 per cent. per annum, which is really a serious thing, that is 10 per cent. in favour of them up to 1 l.

3308. You mean one halfpenny for 2 s. up to 2 l., one halfpenny for 2 s. 6 d. above 2 l., and a halfpenny for 3 s. above 5 l.; is that so?—It is hardly a halfpenny for 3 s. now, but it would so be, of course, under the new scale that I would suggest.

3309. Those are the three rates?—Those are the e three rates. My own opinion is, that it uld be hardly satisfactory without 20 per cent. to 5 l.

3310. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Is one of your tsons for desiring that the rate of interest ould be restricted, that the dishonest or the ver class of pawnbrokers might not be able to fraud the poor people?—Decidedly; I would ver go so far as to say that if you let it be e trade, pure and simple, from 1 s. up to 10 l., ere are not pawnbrokers who will never do the ket at the statutory rate. Some men would, doubt, charge 50 and 60, and even 100, per t. per annum, and those are the 500 people t we shall have coming into the trade, and o I am sure will turn out a great many respec- ble men.

3311. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You think that the ople who do business with pawnbrokers are not e to defend themselves?—Certainly not; I s very much astonished at an answer that was en this morning to a question which was put essively clearly by the right honourable airman to a witness respecting the essence of transaction in the mind of a party coming to row. Most certainly the essence of the trans- ion is the amount of money. If they can half-a-crown instead of two shillings, they l pay more for it. The great thing is to get a g price, and then they care not what you rge them. That is, no doubt, the very essence the low trade. In fact, I know what the re- t of free trade would be directly; 500 people uld come in, 300 or 400 of whom would be of lowest families of the Jew order, and the olic would be robbed desperately.

3312. You do not like the Jews, I fancy?—I like them; I like no men more; but I believe t the very lowest type of them will do things ich Gentiles will not do. At my house in City, I do a large business with Jews, and y are mostly respectable men.

3313. Do you think that the people who deal h the low pawnbrokers just now are able to ow that they are paying much more than the wnbrokers are at present entitled to charge?— t at all; you may rob them wholesale, if you e, and no notice will be taken of it.

3314. At the present moment you are of nion, therefore, that they may be greatly im- ed upon?—I fear that there are some pawn- kers who do impose upon them.

3315. I suppose that is principally the case in low shops?—Exactly; you see, the pawn- kers in London, as a whole, have nothing to with Glasgow; I should say that the Glas- w pawnbrokers and the Glasgow pawnbroking a different kind of thing altogether, and is much er in its character than the London trade. I uld myself think (though I do not know much ut it) that I occupy about as much money as whole of the pawnbrokers in Glasgow, or tainly as much as half of them, to put it hily. I am of opinion that the more capital put into the trade the more respectability l attach itself to it.

3316. Do you not think that, under those cir- nstances, it would be well if the law prevented advance to a pledger below 2 s. 6 d.?—I have doubt of it.

3317. Do you think that it would be a benefit the public?—I think it would; it would take ew weeks or months for the poor people to get o it; they would have to learn providence; week by week the women fetch out six or eight pledges, amounting to less than 1 l.; whereas, if once they could be made, by degrees, to keep the 1 l. that their husbands give them, and spend it during the week, it would be a great benefit to the trade, and it would be a great benefit to the public at large.

3318. Would you prevent body clothing and bed clothing from being pawned?—I would not; I would rather prevent a pledge being made below a certain amount.

3319. Do you think that the money that is obtained by pledging articles for those small sums is generally made an improper use of?—I do not.

3320. You have, perhaps, not very good means of knowing as to that?—Yes, I think I know a great deal of the trade; I have been nearly 40 years in the trade, and I have had a great deal to do with it; I should not be surprised if that was the case in Glasgow; they are a low class of people there, on the whole; there may be some few good respectable houses in Glasgow, but I know, as a whole, that the Glasgow business must be very low indeed.

3321. The pawning in Glasgow is principally by Irish people, is it not?—Of course that is very bad. The lower class of Irish pawning, I should think, would be very bad.

3322. Mr. T. Hughes.] You would not there refer to the Scotch, of course?—I hope you would not think me rude or personal; I have listened to the evidence as it has been given, and in fact, I am sure if you take the average of pawnbrokers in London and the average in Scotland or Glasgow, there would be a very material difference.

3323. Do you think that the system of pawnbroking might very well be done away with altogether in such a place as Glasgow?—I do not think so. I think that if you did so you would have a very great difficulty with the higher and middle classs of people.

3324. Where the average amount of pledges is 4 s., do you think that it can be of much benefit to the working classes to have the means of raising money for a temporary difficulty?—I think it is beneficial to a certain class of people. If they were to go to the Jews, and, as a natural consequence, had to sell their clothes instead of pledging them, they would not get anything like the amount for them to begin with.

3325. Do you not think that many a person would pledge an article that he could not make up his mind to sell?—No doubt; but that would be a desperate remedy to get money.

3326. Do you not think that though a pawnbroking system may be now and again a benefit to a person in distress, on the whole the evil attending it is much greater than the benefit arising from it?—I am quite satisfied that it is very great, no doubt.

3327. Colonel Beresford.] Have you looked at the schedule to the Bill?—I have.

3328. Do you agree to that schedule?—No.

3329. What is it that you object to in the schedule?—I object to any free contract under 40 s.; but I would sooner have it at 5 l. I heard some questions put by the honourable Member for Leeds, in reference to pledging a chair or a table, or something under 40 s. When you have got the rate up to 25 or 35 per cent., as you will do with the fractions, and by giving a second month for 10 days, I think it will be worth a pawnbroker's while to take in a chair for 5 s. or for 10 s., or a chest of drawers, we will say, for 1 l. I think 5 s. for 1 l. for a year is a very good rate of interest.

Mr. Robert Attenborough.

3330. Supposing that it is taken out at the end of the week, what would be the charge?—Then it would be 5 d., and 2 d. the ticket; but that is not the sort of thing that is brought for a temporary advance. They are very clever at that; they bring a wedding ring for a week, or some small article, in preference, a hundred times over, to a large one.

3331. Chairman.] Who do you think has the most intelligence in dealing with a transaction, and knows best the value of his goods; a workman pledging the coat he wears, or a gentleman of fashion or a lady of fashion pledging a diamond ring or a brooch?—They are very extravagant.

3332. Which do you think forms the best judgment of the value of their commodity?—Most assuredly the gentleman or lady of fashion, because they are more educated and qualified to do business.

3333. Do you think that a gentleman knows better the value of a diamond ring than a workman knows the value of the coat he wears?—A gentleman coming to me with a diamond ring worth 50 l. or 100 l. knows what it cost him. This morning I called in at Duke-street, and a gentleman was waiting there with a sapphire ring. The manager of the business was not able to take it in; the gentleman wanted 100 l. upon it, but he was told, "Mr. Attenborough will be here in a few minutes, if you do not mind waiting for him." I live at Hampstead, and I called on my way into town. He said, "It cost me 120 l.," and he told me where it was bought; he wanted 70 l., in fact, for a particular purpose. My manager had offered him 60 l., but I lent him 70 l. upon it. They know the value of the goods.

3334. Did he know the value of that ring in the trade?—No; he bought it at Hunt & Roskell's; he only knew what he had given for it.

3335. He had no notion of the value of the ring, I suppose?—No, I do not think he had, excepting that he knew that it cost him that amount.

3336. Now let us come to the workman who has bought his coat, and knows what he has given for it, and who has probably sold his old coat before; does not he know the value of a new coat?—Undoubtedly he is quite as able to bring intelligence to bear on dealing with his own wearing apparel as another person is upon plate and jewellery.

3337. That is exactly what I was asking you; is not a workman as good a judge of the value of his old coat as a gentleman of fashion is of the value of such a thing as you have described?—Exactly.

3338. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I suppose that the coat of such a man would be of more value to the man wearing it than it would be in the market?—Very much more; it is a very different thing buying from an old-clothes man and selling to an old-clothes man.

3339. Chairman.] A workman who probably buys and sells in that way would be a very good judge in the matter, would he not?—A pretty good judge, but not so good as the Jews.

3340. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you not think that the person who buys goods in the way the right honourable Chairman indicates is generally of a very low class, and a dissipated and worthless man?—I think not; I do not like to go so far as that, but I wish weekly business was done away with altogether.

3341. Chairman.] The question is rather, whether a workman who has, providently, bought a second-hand coat, and, when he has worn it, has sold it again, is not a good judge of the value of the coat that he wishes to pledge?—I think so, decidedly. The honourable Member for Dumbarton looks at pawnbroking in a very different light from what I do.

3342. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I beg your pardon; I am describing just now the man who is dealing with the pawnbroker, and not the pawnbroker?—I mean that the honourable Member thinks, or the honourable Member for Paisley thinks, that the pawnbroker is there; ergo, the man is taught to drink because he can go to the pawnbroker and get money; but I do not look at it in that light. No doubt there is a good deal of pawning for a bad purpose, but I think there is a great deal of it which is very provident.

3343. How do you account for the fact that pawnbroking is looked upon as a disreputable thing by the working classes themselves, as shown by the circumstance that you never can ascertain their names?—It is an unpleasant thing, if people want money, and they always feel some amount of shame about it.

3344. Did you not tell us that you get the real names of gentlemen pawning with you?—We get the names of those pledging above 10 l.; we do not have much difficulty in that.

3345. Do you not think that it is because the working classes are ashamed to get money from a pawnbroker that they do not give their real names?—There is no greater shame in that than in going to a banker.

3347. When a workman is dealing with a grocer or a butcher, he is not ashamed to give his full address, is he?—No.

3348. And he is getting credit there in the same way, is he not?—I feel it is the case that they are ashamed of being known to deal with pawnbrokers; I am well aware of it. I am not at all disposed to deny it, or to extenuate it.

3349. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is not your business exceptional to the general rule?—I have four businesses.

3350. But taking the one in the City; at that one shop how many pledges may you have under 5 s.?—That I could not tell. I could tell you what amount of pawnbroking stock I have, and I could tell you what amount of stock I have altogether, for I took the trouble to look before I came out. I could define the contracts from the genuine pledge stock. The proportion is not quite one-third.

3351. Can you tell me how many pledges you take ke in at the low shop, as you call it, during the ar?—About 48,000 or 50,000.

3352. Are these below 5 s.?—No, altogether.

3353. What proportion of those would be below 5. ?—I have no idea; but they will average mething over 1 l. each.

3355. I am desirous of knowing how far you e able to give an opinion in reference to what e call the low business: you have spoken of e low business at Glasgow; may I ask you ether the best of the Scotch pledges come to gland?—We have often goods sent up from dinburgh and Glasgow to have money advanced on them. A short time ago a lot of jewels ere sent up to me.

3356. You made use of this expression a short ne since in regard to parties pledging; you said at they might be robbed wholesale; now, do u gather that from your experience of the tter class of people pledging; or is it merely an inion which you form of the lower class of edgers, that they can be robbed wholesale when ey come upon this business?—I have no doubt hatever that they might be. If I were to arge my customers 20 per cent. instead of 15 r cent., I do not think they would object. That int is not raised at the time.

3357. But when you are taking a large pledge special contract, you agree about the interest, suppose, as well as about the sum advanced?— ndoubtedly.

3358. Then is it your experience, having re- rd to those who pledge for large sums, that ey can be robbed wholesale?—They are not bbed.

3559. But do they bargain at all as to the in- rest?—Not generally speaking; they do some- mes. I had an instance of it only about a rtnight or three weeks ago. As a rule, we charge 5 per cent. per annum; but there are gentle- en and others who will not pay that, and if I ill not lend them money at 10 per cent. or 12½ r cent., they will go elsewhere and get it with- it any difficulty. I have no hesitation in stating at I have at least 10,000 l. in one house, at less an 15 per cent. per annum, on plate and jewel- ry.

3360. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you never charge ore than 15 per cent.?—I would not say that have never done so; but if I take a large bulky undle of woollen cloths from the City, I might harge more. When money has been scarce, a w years ago, at 10 per cent. per annum, and en went down again to 5 per cent, I charged 0 per cent. for those bulky woollen goods; but en I did not raise a farthing upon plate or welry, which is the principal staple of the siness.

3361. Chairman.] I understand that your rate 15 per cent. per annum, and that if persons me and ask you to reduce it, and will not do e business unless you do reduce it, you some- mes do, and sometimes do not reduce it?—If it plate or jewelry, I do not send it away. If ou do business at 10 per cent. per annum, you ust not speculate upon the property you are lvancing on. Only a week or 10 days ago a gentleman brought me a tiara, and wanted 2,000 l. upon it. I could have sold it for 2,000 l., I dare say, to a diamond merchant, but I would not lend him that amount, because he was objecting to pay more than a certain amount of interest; therefore I said, "I will lend you 1,900 l. upon it, and if you like to pay a higher amount of interest I will lend you 2,000 l." He would not do so, and he went away.

Mr. Robert Attenborough.

3362. Was that because there would be a risk in keeping it?—There would be the risk of his not redeeming it. He was a foreigner, and I had a good introduction, which I generally do get if a stranger comes to me for large sums. He must be introduced by some person or other.

3363. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] In fact, you make a bargain according to the risk?—I never make any bargain except I am called upon to do so. I have at this moment a very large lot of plate and jewels, of one person, to the value of some thousands of pounds. He came to me and wanted me to lend him money at 10 per cent. per annum, and I rather demurred to that; but I found that if I did not do so he would go elsewhere, and I agreed to find him any quantity of money he wanted at 10 per cent. per annum; that was some years ago, and I have never charged him more than 10 per cent. per annum since.

3364. Supposing that I came to you with 1000 l. worth of plate, and asked 500 l. upon it, the plate being valued just at the value of the silver, I suppose you would lend it me at a very low rate of interest?—I would.

3365. Whereas if I asked you to lend me 750 l. upon it, you would ask me more interest?—Not if it was worth 1,000 l., or 800 l., or 900 l. either.

3366. Mr. Whitwell.] What would you call a low rate of interest?—I should do it at 10 per cent.

3367. You say that 15 per cent. is a reasonable rate for those high pledges, do you not?—Quite so.

3368. What charge do you impose beyond the actual per-centage?—You see there is a stamp for 100 l. or over 100 l., and I should perhaps charge 5 s. for the memorandum and entering into the contract.

3369. But supposing that it is not plate; do you charge anything for storage?—Not anything.

3370. Does the 15 per cent. cover the charge for everything, except the charge on the contract?—Everything.

3371. You said that you had taken woollen goods upon which you have charged 20 per cent.; did you charge anything on these woollen goods besides that 20 per cent.?—Nothing at all, excepting 2 s. 6 d. or 5 s., according to the amount.

3372. Have you a large number of woollen goods brought to you?—No.

3373. What per-centage would you advance on woollen goods?—At the present moment 15 per cent. per annum.

3374. What per-centage on the cost price would you advance?—The cost price is not the value, but it is what we can get for them; what they would fetch; what Mr. Storr can get for them.

3375. What per-centage would you advance upon what you appraise them at under Mr.

Mr. Robert Attenborough.

7 July 1870.

Storr's hammer?—I will lend 100 l. upon what I think will fetch 110 l. directly.

3376. I think I understood you to say that your capital in your business was 100,000 l.?—I have more.

3377. Taking it as at 100,000 l. for the purpose of calculation, and supposing that you have about 30 or 40 pledges a day at one house, does the 100,000 l. cover that small number of pledges?—No; I have four houses employed.

3378. What is the value of the pledges on an average left at the house where you only take 30 or 40 pledges a day?—We take in there about 1,000 or perhaps 1,200 a month altogether, speaking from memory.

3379. What is your capital in that establishment?—It is just upon 30,000 l.

3380. That would be about 12,000 pledges a year for a capital of 30,000 l., would it not?—Yes.

3381. The average of those pledges would be 2 l. 10 s.?—Yes.

3382. So that very very few of them would be small pledges?—They are not.

3383. Would not the bulk of them be large pledges?—Not large; there are a good many above 10 s.; amongst those 34 or 35 a day, do you include those pledges upon which you advance money under special contract?—Undoubtedly.

3384. Therefore, I am not surprised that the average should be large in value, because your special contracts, I understand, are very large sometimes?—Yes.

3385. Have you a form for your special contract?—Yes.

3386. Has it been handed in?—I have not brought it with me, but I will send it.

3387. Does it specify the rate of interest?—It does not, it leaves it open.

3388. But on the contract itself, does not the party who pledges know what interest he has to pay?—Before he signs the contract it is filled in, and he sees it.

3389. Do you lose much in the best of your shops upon the sales?—I have not lost much; since the year 1866 we have been very much troubled in realising on those goods; I do not wish for a moment to leave the impression that I have lost money, but I do not think that for the last two years I have got anything, and selling 20,000 l. or 30,000 l. worth a year and getting no profit is a very serious matter.

3390. Could you give me the number of cases where you have repaid the over value for which the article was sold?—I could not tell that; I should think I do not pay less than 500 l. a year.

3391. Do you pay as much as 500 l. a year?—I think I do.

3392. Would you have any objection to look at your books, and give the Committee further particulars upon that?—I hardly know how I should get that, because a good many pledges are sold at the request, or by the permission or consent of the parties.

3393. Can you lay before the Committee your sale book, showing the amount of the advances upon the articles put up for sale, and the amount realised?—That would include only pawnbroking. When I make that reply, I include contracts and everything. My sale book which I could show you for each house, and which is kept according to the Act of Parliament, would only show pledges above 10 s. and below 10 l.

3394. Have you any objection that the trade should be compelled to pay the overplus to a party who requested it, and in order to ensure that, that the trade should send a notice to the party who pledged an article, stating when that article was going to be sold?—I have no objection whatever to that, excepting that we could not do it, because they do not give us their right names.

3395. But presuming that a party did give you his right name and address, do you see any objection to the trade being compelled to send notice to such a party of the day on which the article would be sold?—I should be quite willing to do it; and I do have letters written to give them the information.

3396. You have taken some interest in those dolly-shops, have you not?—Yes. Those are shocking bad houses.

3397. You have told the Committee that in some cases they charged as much as 6 d. on 2 s. 6 d. week?—No doubt about it.

3398. In what way could the Committee ascertain the facts as to those shops?—I do not know. They buy the goods with the understanding that they are to be had again in a certain number of days, and that such a charge will be made.

3399. Seeing that your association has the means of getting information, cannot it in some form present this as a matter of fact before this Committee?—I do not see how they can get the information, because we are so distinct. We do not recognise them in any way whatever.

3400. Can you give any further information to the Committee with respect to their illegal proceedings?—I think everything they do is illegal. I am only sorry that the magistrates, when they have them before them, do not treat them more severely. I saw Sir Thomas Henry fine three or four of them 40 l. a piece not long since.

3401. What you say now is not evidence but only your own conclusion; can your association furnish the Committee with any evidence as to the facts from persons who have been so defrauded?—I do not think they could. The fact is, that the association has very little to do with the work.

3402. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you consider that it would tend to add to the respectability of the pawnbrokers and to the benefit of the poorer classes if they were obliged to take out annual licenses?—I do not think it would; but I allude more particularly to London. In fact, I had a county magistrate with me only yesterday, and we we were talking the matter over. You would give them a great deal of work, and I do not think they would be able to get through it; it would be decidedly unpleasant to respectable men, and I do not think it would do any good with the majority of the pawnbrokers in London.

3403. Do you think there would be any difficulty as regards respectable people?—No difficulty, but it is not that; I should not like myself to have to go to a magistrate every year to get a license.

3404. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You are obliged to go to the Inland Revenue, are you not?—Yes, they give us notice, and we pay.

3405. You get it easily enough, do you not?—Yes, they send us notice, and I send a cheque for the money, and it is paid; I have received notice this morning for two of my houses,

406. In the same way, if you were licensed he magistrates, you would get notice, and then would pay the money, and you would get the nse, would you not?—I think it is deroga- ; you are bringing us on a level with the hops, &c.; I apprehend they are obliged to o.

407. But even the most respectable hotels are ged to do the same, are they not?—I suppose are.

408. It is not derogatory to them, is it?—I ot think I should like it, and I do not suppose trade would like it at all; you would exclude tal by that means, in my humble opinion. ler the law, which is very severe in the pawn- king clauses, and which I do not wish to be at relaxed, the magistrates can punish them so rely, that if any bad man is doing wrong he be punished for it.

409. For instance, in the case of that bad whom you have described, next year his nse would be taken away from him?—I think ught to be, at all events. At any rate, I ld give evidence to have it withheld.

410. Would it not be an advantage if this could be turned out at the end of the year, e misconducted himself?—I hardly recognise , to tell the truth. I was surprised to find name among the pawnbrokers.

411. Still he is recognised by the Inland venue, is he not?—He is, unfortunately.

412. Colonel Beresford.] Have you worked the rate of interest in the schedule for sums ve and below 40 s.?—I have.

413. Do you know what the interest would nder the new rate?—If you adopt the new without contracts, doing away with half nths and giving a whole month at the end of days, in my own opinion they will get two antages. They first take two months at the of 10 days; and, secondly, a monthly rate 25 per cent. per annum.

414. How much would it be?—A halfpenny 2 s. I am quite an advocate for; a number of n would use it. Some would lend 2 s. 6 d. 1 d. probably; it is 1 d. directly you get over In fact, I am sorry to say that this new Bill rawn at a very great deal more than 25 per t. This Bill is drawn for a halfpenny under ; I am not in favour of that, but I am in ur of a halfpenny for 2 s. and under. The rest, taken at a halfpenny for 2 s. and under, ld come to over 40 per cent.; but I am in ur of the Irish scale (which I have seen) of alfpenny for 2 s. and up to 4 s. The Irish e will make 35 per cent., giving the month at end of 10 days; and instead of the fractions ch give such enormous trouble, you would e 2 s. 6 d., 3 s., and 3 s. 6 d., all at 1 d.; but must get to 4 s. before you get the 25 per t. per annum.

415. Mr. Plimsoll.] Do you not think that in t case it is a fallacious view of it to call this money rest, inasmuch as each transaction occupies time and attention of the tradesmen, and upies his place of business, and puts him to expense of gas, and is not a penny a small sum a tradesman to receive on a transaction of ; since, if he sells herrings, or cheese, or ter, he gets a very much larger rate of profit? Undoubtedly; they make a much larger rate of fit.

416. On the larger transactions, 40 per cent., even 20 per cent., would be a very handsome 108.

remuneration, whereas in this smaller transaction, it would be more for the trouble than as interest, would it not?—The only way to obviate that, would be by charging a larger sum for the ticket; I do not understand their way of calculating; I will take Mr. Dicker's paper, which I have at home; I do not approve of them at all; I think them quite fallacious.

3417. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do you mean those balance sheets which were produced?—I mean those balance sheets, A., B., and C.; I consider that they are very fallacious; what business have they to talk about every pledge costing them five farthings, and three halfpence.

3418. Chairman.] It was an arithmetical calculation that the expense of the shop was so much, and that so many pledges were taken in; therefore, the facts of arithmetic would be correct, would they not?—Yes; but you can see that this is the point. They go to show you what it costs for one pledge; but they lose sight of all the profit they get on the two months, and the three months, right up to 12 months, and the pledge which they deliver for 2 s. 6 d., and get 6 d. for at the end of the year, is only charged with five farthings.

3419. But that does not alter the fact that the expenses of the business divided into the number of pledges gives the amount there represented?—I cannot see it. There is a gentleman now sitting in this room who has given you evidence, and who calls out the loudest about the rate of interest, and wants free trade pure and simple, yet that very man, about two years ago, went and took a shop about one of the lowest he could take, and in less than 12 months he had taken another equally low. I should think he would be for winding up his affairs, and bidding good morning to such a trade as he talked about, rather than adding another shop to it; and I am bound to tell you, as I know him intimately, that he would take another very soon, if he had the opportunity. Therefore their deeds do not go with their words.

3420. What we understand from the evidence is that the expenses divided into the number of pledges represent the expense of conducting the business, and that the profit is made by the pledge remaining such a time as will yield more than the charge which they involve?—On a low business, with 5,000 l., I verily believe they can make 25 per cent. per annum.

3421. Net?—No, gross.

3422. Then you have to deduct from that the cost of carrying on the business, have you not?—I know it. If you look at Mr. Dicker's paper, first of all, if I recollect rightly, he takes off a third of his expenses for working a sale shop. Now, I know both of those houses. He does a pawnbroking business which brings him in 1,500 l. a year, which occupies one shop, and then he takes a sale business, where he actually makes more than 1,000 l. a year profit, and for that one he takes a quarter of the expenses. But he does not take in the capital at all; nor any portion of the goodwill which he paid for the business. The whole of his capital he charges to his pawnbroking business. I think that neither in A. nor B. does he charge capital to the pawnbroking business. He takes, I think, one-fourth, and he ought to take a good deal more than a fourth.

3423. You do not seem to recollect the accounts; he charges 3.000 l. for the capital of the sale stock?—I have some idea that in B. he does not; then he charges for goodwill again.

Mr. Robert Attenborough.
7 July 1870.

3424. The sale stock in B. is 2,870 l.; I am afraid you have not studied the accounts?—I have studied them well; but perhaps you will allow me to look at them again. I would not wish to say one word against the correctness of those accounts; on the contrary, Mr. Dicker, I believe to be a highly respectable man. The profit on the sale is 1,144 l., and the profit on the pledging is just upon 1,600 l., that is, inclusive of the tickets. Then he goes on and makes a gross profit of 2,744 l., then he goes on to take the expenses (of course those are the expenses of the whole establishment; he works them together) at 1,293 l., showing 1,451 l. profit, which is a little over 10 per cent. per annum on the whole amount. That is a calculation which I see is based upon the whole of the capital and the whole of the businesses. He then, after that, takes the pawnbroking alone, and he takes the interest and the tickets as before, then he takes the pledge stock, and he shows a capital of 14,217 l. He charges the whole of this capital, excepting the sale stock, with what he calculates as the expenses upon pawnbroking; what business has he to do that? He says, first of all, 8,919 l.; then for lease, 800 l.; that lease, I should have thought, was worth quite as much to his sale stock as to his pawnbroking, but that all goes to pawnbroking. Then he puts for premium on stock 890 l., and cash 573 l.; so that, in fact, he charges everything here to the account of the pawnbroking stock, with the exception of the actual sale stock; that can never be right. Why does he not charge half of his 800 l. to the account of his sale stock, which is the very least he could do, because a man could not be carrying on a sale business of 3,000 l. without some capital? Therefore a part of this 573 l., according to my opinion, ought to go to capital (explaining the accounts).

3425. Supposing that you took it in proportion to the capital, the capital of the pledge stock being 9,000 l., and of the sale stock 3,000 l., that would give one-third of the charges, which would be 2,000 l., and one-third of the 2,000 l. would be 666 l., so that you would have to increase the sale stock by 666 l., and lower the pawnbroking by the same rule, so that the amount would have to be adjusted by a sum of 666 l.; that would be a very small fraction indeed, and quite inappreciable, would it not?—I think the other account is open to another objection (explaining the accounts). He has taken too much money for pawnbroking, and too little for sale business, though I believe the account is as correct as possible, according to the books.

3426. Mr. Plimsoll.] Do you suppose the charge made by Mr. Dicker upon each pledge to be an excessive one, or are you prepared to deny that a very large number of small transactions must involve a considerably larger expense than a smaller number of large transactions?—They keep a different class of men. The expenses of working a business like that are not greater in proportion than mine for this reason. I remember what he said he had given to his foreman. I think he said 2 l. a week. I am obliged to pay more than double that to my principal man. I cannot make out his wages table at all. It appears to me to be monstrous. In fact it is a very high rate of charge for expenses no doubt throughout. In conclusion, I hope that if the Committee come to the determination of recommending free trade under 40 s., they will divide the trade altogether, so that we may remain in it, because if that were not done, the trade would be very much lowered if you recommend free trade.

Mr. WILLIAM SHAW, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Shaw.

3427. Chairman.] Do you occupy any position in relation to the trade of pawnbroking?—I was a pawnbroker's assistant for 12 years.

3428. Do you wish to call the attention of the Committee to the clauses which were introduced into the Police Act of 1840?—I do; by the introduction of those clauses the public were left entirely unprotected.

3429. What were those clauses?—The clauses which allowed an informer, knowing that a pawnbroker had taken more interest than he ought to have done, to inform against him; and, having done so, to receive half of the fine, the other half to go to the poor of the parish; it was usual at that time when an informer had got a number of informations to go to the pawnbroker and say so, and the pawnbroker would say, I suppose you only want 1 l., and would pay him. The trade, unknown to the public, got the clauses inserted in the Bill. The old Act of Geo. 3 was so altered by those two clauses that it entirely took away the power of the common informer in favour of the public. The common informer would get up this information; I do not say that he should do so exactly, but the public have no protection whatever without those informations. I know that informers, for their own profit, got up those informations, and the pawnbrokers used to compound with the informers, but the pawnbrokers got two clauses inserted, not only one to fine the informer 10 l. for compounding an information, but another one to give a magistrate the power to prevent his having any portion of the fine whatever. Consequently, the intention of the information was entirely done away with and ever since then the public have been entirely at the mercy of the pawnbrokers as regards low pledges.

3430. The effect of legislation was to prevent a person making a trade of information, was it not?—Yes, but at the same time it prevented the public having any protection whatever, because the public do not really know how to calculate interest.

3431. Is it correct to say that the public have no protection, when a penalty can be imposed still and a punishment inflicted for an offence?—I am sorry to say that the majority of low pledgers are so low in intellect that they do not know how to make an information.

3432. Still the same power exists, does it not?—Still the same power exists beyond a doubt.

3433. Do you also wish to call the attention of the Committee to the Act of 1860, by which pawnbrokers were allowed to charge a halfpenny upon a ticket?—Just so; that was another one-sided piece of legislation, inasmuch as the trade managed to explain to certain Members of the House that it was necessary for the great expenses that they were under at that time they

Mr. W. Shaw.

y had already the power to charge from 5 s. l upwards, whereas if the title of the Bill had n to charge one halfpenny upon every ticket ler 5 s., I very much question whether the olic attention would not have been drawn to 3434. Previously to that they were only al-red to charge one halfpenny, were they?—s, commencing at 5 s.

3435. If they thought that that rate was too to remunerate them they were compelled to use to advance money, were they not?—I ve been connected with the trade ever since, h as a master and also as an assistant, and I ver knew them to refuse a pledge.

3436. You do not believe the recital in the t, that a great practice had grown up of the r people going to other shops, because they ld not get advances at the pawnbrokers?—t at all in that respect; only after hours. The ving-shops, especially in the Dials, where I ve had reason to make inquiries, keep open till f-past 10, and I have no doubt that the goods dged there are goods which pawnbrokers uld take in, although they might be soiled ds. In the house which I was in first, we re not allowed to refuse soiled goods. I have en in a shirt full of fleas, and there was no ection to it by the master. In fact, we were pelled to do it, if it was well pinned up.

3437. You think that the business is more ofitable at a halfpenny?—Certainly, I think it is a great tax upon the poor pledgers when the te was made a halfpenny below 5 s. There has en a great deal of talk about flat-irons. A or ironing woman very often cannot get her ney from the woman she works for, who is a ndress, and to get a little supper she pledges r flat-iron for 4 d., upon which she will have to y a halfpenny, making it 4½ d, and on taking it t the next morning she would have to pay one lfpenny for it.

3438. And the pawnbroker is bound to keep e flat-iron nevertheless, for a year, is he not? Just so; and it would fetch 10 d.

3439. Mr. Plimsoll.] And he has the trouble taking it in and storing it, and finding it when e comes for it, has he not?—That would take out two minutes.

3440. Do you think that the halfpenny is an cessive charge for all that trouble?—I think at the 6 d. a year is ample, and shows an ormous interest.

3442. Chairman.] Do you think that there has en any change in the mode of conducting busiss in splitting up articles, or rather dividing ckages of articles, into several separate pledges?—Certainly. Directly the Bill was passed the wnbrokers of Liverpool especially refused to ke in baskets of tools, but they would split em up into ten sixpenny pledges, including the sket, if it was a good one, for 6 d., whereas ey would never have got 10 d. for 5 s.

3443. Do you know that the practice grew up consequence?—Certainly, and I will defy the ade to deny it.

3444. Were things which were in the nature of one package split into several pledges?—Yes; I may give you a case in point, which I know myself: in a house where I used to live there were two persons who used to live at Battersea, and they used to pledge from eight to ten or twelve parcels a week. They were all children's things; most poor people have two sets of children's things: they would come during the week and pawn, perhaps, eight parcels for 3 s., 4 s., or 5 s. a parcel. It was generally 4 s. Directly this Bill was passed, of course they were thrown up immediately, and as they were old customers they would not do it for less than 1 s., but the pawnbroker had the power of turning it into a sixpenny pledge, for the purpose of getting one halfpenny upon each ticket. It has been stated in evidence before the Committee, that the respectable portion of the trade do not charge that halfpenny upon the low tickets. I have some tickets in my pocket of some very respectable pawnbrokers, each of which has the halfpenny upon the ticket.

3445. Is it your opinion that it is more expedient to make one simple charge upon the transaction than to have a halfpenny interest and a halfpenny on the ticket?—I think the interest should be 4 d. in the pound, and no more. The Act states distinctly that you shall not charge more than 4 d. in the pound. The aliquot parts are all put up in the pawnbrokers' shops, so that anybody can see them, and there could be no difficulty whatever in having a scale in larger figures, which might be placed in certain parts of the shop, and in the boxes too, so that the pledgers might see exactly what they had to pay. In that case they would pay 20 per cent., but if the law were to give pawnbrokers the power to charge 1 d. for 4 s., of course that is 25 per cent. instead of 20 per cent. I have made a little calculation there (handing a Paper to the Committee), by which you will find that if a pledge is taken out every day, it is 75 per cent. per day; but if it is taken out once a week, as the trade admit that four-fifths of the pledges are, it will be 75 per cent. per week, including the ticket money.

3446. That would seem to be an objection applicable to every scale which proceeds by steps, and therefore if you take the lowest figures in the scale, it will be a very high rate?—Just so.

3447. Do you see any mode of remedying that? Only by sticking to the old interest.

3448. Supposing everything to be calculated at a rate per cent. of absolute equality, what would you do with all the odd fractions?—There is no difficulty about fractions, because the fractions are always taken in favour of the pawnbrokers.

3449. If we made the law, that the fractions should always be taken in favour of the pawnbrokers, and you considered that one-halfpenny was the mimimum rate, you would not object to that?—No.

3450. You do not think that farthings should necessarily be introduced?—Yes, I do; because on a number of small pledges to a poor person on a Saturday night, a farthing on each pledge comes to a great sum. I am sure that I cannot be contradicted when I say that directly that halfpenny ticket Bill was passed there were plenty of pawnbrokers in the trade who congratulated themselves that they should make 200 l., 300 l., or 400 l. a year by it, and they have done so; and a lot of them have told their young men to take more than they were entitled to.

3451. You would give the pawnbroker the benefit

Mr. W. Shaw.

7 July 1870.

benefit of the fractions up to a farthing?—Yes.

3452. And when it came to more than the farthing you would make him pay and receive in farthings?—Yes; and I would not do away with the half months. That is merely an attempt to please the Committee; that is all nonsense. It is very fair upon both sides.

3453. Then do you think that any facilities should be given for making special contracts for particular articles?—Certainly not.

3454. What would you do for those articles?—The effect of that would be, if you were to grant it, just this; that a person in difficulties might bring in a loo-table to a pawnbroker's shop, and supposing that this Act had passed with this special contract, the trade would immediately meet, and they would arrange that everybody should charge the same interest, so that the person in difficulties would take this loo-table, supposing that he could get 50 s. upon it (and there are plenty of loo tables upon which you could get 6 l. perhaps), and pay a man 1 s. to take it to the pawnbroker's; when they got there the pawnbroker would only make a certain special contract. When that was the case the man would take it to another, and would find it just the same; and so he might take it all over London. Again, if you take a feather-bed to a pawnbroker, beds, bolsters, and pillows always fetch their price. In fact, if I was a person who had such a thing to pledge, I would rather sell it, and it would fetch a better price.

3455. Would you be able to buy it back again at the price at which you sold your bedstead?—One could scarcely think that, because the purchaser must have some profit upon it.

3456. Could you buy another at the same price?—Not at the same price, because the persons attending sales are nine-tenths of them dealers.

3457. But I presume that a great many people buy articles at sales?—Yes, I have bought hundreds.

3458. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you think that if for the article put up for sale there was a purchaser from the general public, the seller would get a fair price for it, and that the seller might get a similar article at the same price?—Precisely so.

3459. Chairman.] Do you think that in London you can buy and sell at the same price?—As a rule.

3460. Then, in point of fact, all the tradesmen in London live for nothing, I suppose?—Hardly so; I am talking as a private buyer.

3461. Do you think that it is really and seriously consistent with the ordinary proceedings of life, that every person who wants to dispose of his commodities finds a private individual equally ready to take them to his hand in the same way as a pawnbroker is ready to his hand to receive them as pledges?—Certainly not; but I am talking about a public auction.

3462. But the comparison is between the person being ready to receive the goods when a man wants to sell them, and the pawnbroker, who is always ready to receive the goods when he wants to pledge them; do you think the person ready to sell goods would find a person equally anxious to buy them when he wanted the money?—I think he would.

3463. Do you think a dealer in furniture would buy the goods at the same price as he would sell the goods at, being a person always to be ready to sell?—I do.

3464. In fact, then, you think that furniture dealers make no profit at all in business?—Yes they make a very handsome profit.

3466. What we want is to institute a comparison between two things which are similar, and a comparison between two things which are not similar is of no value: if a person who has a commodity wants money, he must either sell it or deposit it; to do that, you must either assume that there is some tradesman ready to buy the goods, or that there is a tradesman ready to take them in on deposit; when he wants to redeem the goods he must either buy the goods, or he must go to the pawnbroker and redeem them; must that not be so?—Certainly; or to a public sale.

3467. Therefore, must he not pay the difference between the price which is charged for selling goods and the price which is charged for buying goods?—Of course he must; the dealer must have a profit.

3468. Have you any idea of what that profit is?—The profit upon all furniture pledged is, I am convinced, very high.

3469. Can you tell us what it would be if a man took a bedstead to a dealer?—Bedsteads will not fetch anything. You may buy four-post bedsteads at 4 s. 6 d. a piece. Of course, if it was a handsome French Arabian bedstead, with iron and brass about it, it would be worth more.

3470. For an ordinary workman's bedstead would he have to give money when he bought it?—Of course he would; but no pawnbroker would take in an ordinary workman's bedstead.

3471. What would a workman give for a ordinary bedstead, second hand?—He might give 4 s. 6 d. for it.

3472. What would he get for it if he went to sell it at a sale of second-hand furniture?—Perhaps 3 s. or 3 s. 6 d.

3473. Then he must necessarily sacrifice out of his 4 s. 6 d., 1 s. 6 d. absolutely in this transaction must he not, if the law prevents his borrowing money upon the bedstead?—Yes.

3474. Do you think that that is a fair representation of common furniture, such as chairs, tables, and other things?—No, I do not; because chairs and tables, and all that kind of furniture are very different things from bedsteads.

3475. What would a man be able to buy half-a-dozen second-hand chairs for at any shop?—He can get half-a-dozen good new ones for a guinea.

3476. What could he sell them for at the broker's?—Fifteen shillings.

3477. Then there would be to him an absolute loss of 5 s., would there not?—But the pawnbroker would not take in the goods at all.

3478. If the pawnbroker would not take them, ould the man, on a transaction of 1 l., be com-lled absolutely to sacrifice 5 s.?—Yes.

3479. He would be obliged to sacrifice 4 d., ould he not, under the present law?—Four-nce, and 2 d. for the ticket.

3480. Do you think it would be a benefit or injury to the working man if, instead of sacri-ing 5 s., he had the option of sacrificing some-ng between 4 d. and 5 s.?—In the way you t it, it would be an injury if he had not the tion.

3481. Is not that a reason for giving the rking man a law which would prevent his ng so injured?—You will not find a pawn-oker who will take in half-a-dozen chairs of it kind.

3482. That is because the law is such as to vent him, is it not?—The special contract, I lieve, is to be for not less than 2 l.

3483. But supposing that the workman, know-g the value of his chairs by what he had paid them, and knowing that 4 d. was the rate, re allowed to pay the pawnbroker 6 d. more keeping them, would it not be a benefit to him allow him to get money for 10 d., instead of mpelling him to sacrifice 5 s. as the law now es?—Certainly, if the pawnbroker could take the goods.

3484. Is there not some amount short of 5 s. ich would induce the pawnbroker to take in e six chairs?—I do not think there is.

3485. Do you think that there is no pawn-oker who would take in any commodity for a eek, or a fortnight, or a month, if he were paid l. or 1 s., or 2 s.?—No; I do not believe the de would do it.

3486. Yo think nothing will induce them to do —I do not believe it would.

3487. Nor any commodity which is bulky?—er the 2 l. I believe he would.

3488. Mr. Orr Ewing] I suppose a pawn-oker is guided as to the amount of the advance ich he makes upon anything which is pledged, what he thinks it will bring by auction?—ecisely so.

3489. Therefore the pawnbroker would not e him a higher advance upon any article than thinks it will sell for by auction?—Certainly.

3490. Is it your opinion that that class of peo-e would do better to sell any article which they re compelled to part with in the market, in the pe that they would ever get the money to re-rchase it upon better terms, than by pledging with the pawnbrokers?—It is; because no ubt if you are once in the hands of a pawn-oker, you are always in the hands of a pawn-oker; people who once begin to put their ngs in pledge on the Monday morning, and e them out on the Saturday, can never be rich, less they are wonderfully provident people.

3491. I suppose that you found when you were the business, that the class of people you deal th were very poor and improvident?—Cer-nly not improvident; but on Easter Monday d Whitsun Saturday you will find some im-ovident persons who must have some liquor.

3492. Are they poor people?—Yes, they are or people, who have nothing beyond their ekly wages, and they want something to drink, d they will pledge the last thing they have to t drink.

3493. How was it that they became so poor, they were not improvident?—Because when they first got married they went to the pawn-broker.

3494. Then do you look upon pawnbroking as being very injurious to the well-being of the community?—Oh, no; plenty of people would starve if it was not for the pawnbroker.

3495. Do you think that the system which keeps people constantly in that poor state is a good system?—No, I do not; but they cannot get out of it unless the law compels them to put by 1 s. or 2 s. a week.

3496. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You said that they were not improvident; if they are not improvident it is possible that they may get out of it, is it not?—When they got married they had not a cage to put the bird in, and they went to the pawnbroker for every article they wanted.

3497. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Supposing that there had been no pawnbroker at all, and they could not get money to begin housekeeping, would it not be better to have waited a little until they had earned a little money?—If you could get them to do so, certainly it would be better.

3498. From your experience is it the case, that if a man begins with a pawnbroker he never gets clear of him?—He never gets clear of him. The man never goes to the pawnbroker, it is the woman who goes, the man is ashamed to go.

3499. Do you think the business is demoralising?—I think not.

3500. I fancy, after all your admissions, you will have a little difficulty in coming to that conclusion?—Of course there are times when men will have things pledged by their wives for drink, and women will pledge for drink, and the women will take up a tally bill and take it to the pawnbroker's.

3501. Would it not be well that there should be a law which would regulate those things?—Yes, if you can suggest anything to do so.

3502. As to the amount, would it not, in your opinion, be a good law to prevent a longer sum than 2 s. 6 d. being given upon any article?—No, certainly not; if you did so, the greater portion of the poor people in London would starve; they would go to bed without their supper.

3503. Do you think that those people can afford to pay this heavy interest for a temporary loan?—They are compelled to do so.

3504. Would it not be better if they could be more frugal?—Yes, I admit that.

3505. You only support pawnbroking on account of the present state of society?—Just so.

3506. But you would wish to see society rather raised?—By all means.

3507. But you are not prepared to indicate what you would do to attain that desirable state of things?—I have thought of that, but I cannot see my way.

3508. Mr. Plimsoll.] When were you in business?—About 25 years ago; I was an assistant.

3509. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Were you ever in business on your own account?—Certainly not.

3510. Mr. Plimsoll.] In that case, why are you here as a witness?—I wished to say a few words on behalf of the poor pledgers; I had heard a lot of ex parte evidence, and I should say that some members of the trade allege that I look with a jaundiced eye towards the trade, but it is not so. I have no animosity against the trade; I think it is a very good trade, and a very profitable one, too.

3511. You spoke of one instance in which a half-penny

Mr. W. Shaw.

halfpenny was charged for 4 d., and you spoke of it as an example of the excessive charges to which the poor are liable; of course, if a person pawns a thing one day and takes it out on another, it comes to an annual sum of 4,562½ per cent.; but do you not think that it would be a fallacious thing to speak of the halfpenny as being 4,562½ per cent.?—I do not, indeed, because I am sure in the metropolis there must be from 700 to 1,000 pledges put in in the morning and taken out at night. In fact, I have myself delivered a pledge over and over again, where a person pawned a blanket in the morning and fetched it out at night. If you throw off the odd days altogether that person paid on that blanket 12 s. 6 d. per annum, and now she pays 25 s. if she does the same thing.

3512. You do not seem in that to take any account of the trouble of those daily transactions, for you insist upon regarding the sum paid by the customer as interest alone?—I have had the pleasure (if pleasure it was) of throwing down 2,000 pledges on a Saturday night, and my master has delivered the same; there has been a great deal said about expenses in the trade, but I deny it altogether, there was one master and one servant, he paid him 5 l. per year, and he eventually paid him 7 l. 10 s., and I have over and over again thrown down 2,000 pledges on a Saturday night, the majority of them being small pledges bearing an interest of 40 and 50 per cent. and more per week.

3513. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You were kept all the week for the sake of the benefit which you could do your master on Saturday night, so that your wages should not be reckoned as the wages of half a day but the wages of a week, should they not?—Yes.

3514. If you have never been in business for yourself, how can you give such confident opinions in regard to its paying or not paying?—From continual inquiries into the business and taking a great interest in it.

3515. Have you ever been a householder?—I am a householder now.

3516. Do you know the value of a bedstead?—Rather.

3517. You say that the ordinary value of a bedstead for a working man is about 3 s. 6 d., is that so?—For 4 s. 6 d. he can buy a wooden French bedstead.

3518. I am not asking what a bedstead can be bought for; I am asking whether the average price which a working man gives for a bedstead is 3 s. 6 d.?—From that to 4 s. 6 d. for a wooden one.

3519. I am not asking you what you can buy a wooden bedstead for; I understand you to say that the average price paid by the working classes for a bedstead was 3 s. 6 d., is that so?—From that to 4 s. 6 d. I said that he could get 3 s. 6 d. for it.

3520. The question is not what he can get a wooden bedstead for, that is nearly worn out, but what is the average price paid by a working man for a bedstead?—I should say 4 s. 6 d.

3521. What is the average price a working man pays for a chair?—From 1 s. 9 d. to 3 s. 6 d.

3522. Then he pays as much for a chair, according to your experience, as for a bedstead?—Just so, because the article is more saleable, and not only that but the chair is a new article.

3523. Do you give that as your experience as a householder?—Yes.

3524. Are you a householder now?—I am, and I have been for nearly 25 years.

3525. I understood you to say that the people were not all improvident who use the pawnbrokers?—Certainly not.

3526. Then I take it that the majority of them, or at least a large number of them, may in case of any difficulty, make use of the pawnbrokers, just as a person in a higher position in life may make use of his banker?—Certainly.

3527. And that there need be no more reflection on the one than on the other?—Unfortunately it is different. The person who visits the pawnbroker has a great degree of shame, and does not want to be seen.

3528. I ask you, as a man who has considered this question thoroughly, is not a man as likely to be dependent who once gets into the hands of his banker as a borrower, as a man who gets into the hands of a pawnbroker, both of them being improvident men?—That all depends on how the speculations in which the gentleman interested turn out. The gentleman who goes to his banker and borrows 10,000 l. is very different to a man who goes and lays out 10 d. What can a man lay out 10 d. in to get thousands by? But a man who borrows 10,000 l. can buy railway shares, perhaps he may make a deal of money with it.

3529. Mr. Whitwell.] If I understand you rightly, you say that a man who borrows money of his banker is in a different position from a man who borrows money on his goods?—I do.

3530. Does the man who borrows money from his banker wish to get money to trade, in addition to what he has?—Certainly.

3531. Does the man who goes to the pawnbroker take something which he had bought, and which he thought he required, and sacrifice very often what he is in immediate want of?—I does.

3532. He takes what he can ill spare, with the view of getting money to buy food or drink, does he not?—Yes.

3533. In that respect, do you not think that a man who goes to a banker to get money to trade with is different from one who goes to the pawnshop and puts away what he can ill spare?—Just so.

3534. In what part of London were you when you knew the pawnbroking trade?—Chelsea, Lambeth, Islington, and Clerkenwell.

3535. How many years have you been in the pawnbroking trade?—About 12 years, and have been intimately connected with it ever since.

3536. Is the law different now from what it was when you were in business?—Yes, wonderfully so.

3537. Is the law improved?—I think not.

3538. In what way is it not improved?—Although I do not like common informers, as I said before, I think there ought to be some supervision. I think it was stated by some witness, that there is no supervision by the police, neither can there be any supervision.

3539. When you were in business was there more supervision?—Certainly, the informers were at work then; but there was no supervision by the police beyond the lists of stolen articles.

3540. When you were in business did the police inspect the shops more than they do now?—Not at all.

3541. Were pawnbrokers more brought before ore the magistrate to give evidence with pect to stolen goods than they are now?—; it does not appear in the newspapers, but pawnbrokers who are brought up for stolen ds are generally brought up on account of en cloths.

542. You know the evils which follow a man o begins to pawn his goods?—I do well.

543. And you do not know of any means by ich that can be avoided?—No.

544. Would you limit the amount for which an should pawn to any particular sum?—Not ll.

545. You would let a man pawn a shilling cle for sixpence if he chose?—Certainly, by means; I have known a pledge as low as a penny.

546. Then would you recommend that there uld be a fixed rate which the pawnbroker uld not exceed?—Yes; I think the present is ample, and a splendid consideration for the ey lent.

547. Would it not be a great advantage to pawner to have the rate clearly defined and le?—That might be done by an extra list of rmediate sums being placed in the boxes of pawnbrokers. I have here a list prepared he trade themselves, giving the benefit of the tions to the pawnbroker, and if they were pelled to put that up in the legal figures e would be no difficulty. It has been said the poor people have a difficulty in calculat- these amounts; they calculate it for them.

548. Do you believe that the persons who n are a defined class of people?—Yes; the omers are always known as well as possible.

549. Is it not better to have a rate of a penny, easing by one halfpenny, than increasing by farthings, because what the pawnbroker lost on one occasion he would gain on another?—I do not think so; because on the rate laid down in the Bill he must continually lose.

3550. He would not lose on the higher sum of any particular grade, would he?—The highest pledgers can take care of themselves; it is the poor pledgers who need protection.

3551. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I inferred from your answers that you thought that the pawnbroking business was a very good one?—I do; for instance, the first master with whom I was, although some gentlemen have said that it was a very losing trade, has now three houses instead of one.

3552. Do you not think that you are very much to blame for having left it?—Certainly not.

3553. You have had some conversation with the honorable Member for Kendal, upon the question of banking and pawnbroking; do you not think that a person who borrows from a banker without security is more dependent than the man who borrows from his pawnbroker with security?—No, certainly not; you might just as well compare him with a man who takes 10,000*l.* worth of bills on to 'Change, and gets them done for 4,000*l.*

3554. Do you think that he is less dependent in borrowing without security than he would be with security?—He goes merely with a piece of paper, and a poor man goes with all he has got.

3555. The poor man may not go with all he has got?—Well, with a portion of what he is worth.

3556. And he chooses rather to part with that portion than to be dependent?—Because he cannot help it.

3557. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you know many bankers who lend without security?—Only upon signatures.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir THOMAS HENRY, called in; and Examined.

Sir T. Henry.

3558. Chairman.] YOU are the Chief Magistrate of the Metropolitan Police Courts, are you?—I am.

3559. Are you aware that an application has been made to Parliament to alter the existing law relating to pawnbrokers?—Yes, and I see that the Bill has a threefold object: first, to enable the pawnbrokers to alter their rates of interest; secondly, to enable them to make special contracts; and thirdly, to shorten the time for forfeiting pledges from twelve months to six months. Those appear to be the three objects of the Bill.

3560. Have you had any opportunities of forming an opinion upon the operation of the present rates charged by pawnbrokers?—I have had 30 years' experience of the working of the Act.

3561. But have you had brought before you many questions relating to the rates of charge during that period?—Occasionally there are complaints of more interest being charged than the Act allows.

3562. Have those complaints been numerous?—Not of late years. The rates of interest are very well understood by the poor, and there are very few overcharges, I think, of late.

3563. What was the nature of the overcharges in respect of which complaints were formerly made?—They arose generally from some carelessness on the part of the assistants in calculating.

3564. Were the amounts large?—They were not large.

3565. Do you mean that it was a question of the calculation of small fractions, or something of that kind?—Yes. Some years ago there were common informers, who used to pledge articles with the pawnbrokers on purpose to lay traps for them, and if a farthing too much was charged they laid an information, and there were many such cases; but then an Act was passed to enable us to deprive them of any part of the penalty, and their occupation ceased as soon as they found that we would not allow them any share in the penalty.

3566. Is it your opinion that those were not cases of accidental extortion or overcharge, but that they were contrivances of the informers?—They were very much contrivances on the part of the informers, I think.

3567. Do you know whether, under the existing Act, there are some difficulties in dealing with fractional parts of a farthing?—I believe that occasionally there are; but I do not think that that prevails to any great extent. I think it is very well understood, and that all the assistants are very well able to calculate it, and that the poor also know pretty well what they ought to pay.

3568. Have you any means of judging what is the cost to the pawnbroker of taking in the smaller pledges?—The pawnbrokers do not like the small pledges, of course, so much as large pledges, but they are obliged to take in all. It very much depends upon the neighbourhood in which their shop is. Of course, if a pawnbroker opens a shop in a poor neighbourhood, he must expect to have chiefly poor pledges; but then he gains not only by the interest, but also by the forfeited pledges, because all pledges under 10*s.* are forfeited at the end of 12 months; and it constantly happens that the poor do not take them out, and then they are sold, and the pawnbroker derives all the profit from that.

3569. Do you know whether, as a rule, pawnbrokers make a profit on selling forfeited pledges?—Yes, I have no doubt but that they do; but better evidence on that point could be given by Messrs. Debenham & Storr.

3570. Have you any means of judging whether they do or do not make a profit on those transactions?—I know that the sales are very large. Messrs. Debenham & Storr, who sell for them, could give the Committee more information on the subject.

3571. What is your view with reference to the time of redeeming the pledges?—I think that it would be very objectionable to shorten the time.

3572. Have you ever had the subject of time brought before you in the exercise of your duties?—Constantly.

3573. What is the nature of the complaints made before you?—The poor omit to redeem a pledge for a few days after the 12 months, sometimes forgetting in fact the exact day, and when the pawnbroker refuses to give up the pledge they come to complain, and we are obliged to point out to them that the law is so, and that the pledge dges become forfeited, and we cannot assist m.

3574. Have you many complaints of that t?—A great many.

3575. How many such complaints do you nk there are in a week, or in a month?—Lat-ly there have not been so many I think as re used to be, but I should say there are half dozen in a week.

3576. What is your opinion upon the subject special contract?—I am decidedly opposed to it.

3577. On what grounds?—I think that it uld be dangerous to allow pawnbrokers to arge any amount of interest they pleased, and t to keep any books, because I see by this ll they propose to repeal that clause of the t which requires them to keep books; books a most wholesome check.

3578. Is it proposed to repeal the whole of the t requiring them to keep books?—In all cases ere they are to make special contracts. Pawn-oking is a trade which I think ought not to be e. It is not free in any other country, and in t it is not allowed in France, but it is altoge-r prohibited. There they have the monts de té, where the poor can have loans, but then len goods are never offered there.

3579. Will you explain what is your objection a person making a contract to borrow money on his goods?—That the pawnbroker would e advantage of the necessities of the poor ople and charge an exorbitant rate of interest.

3580. How could he take advantage of their cessities if they were not compelled to go to n?—Of course if one pawnbroker did it others uld do the same, and then the poor would be their mercy.

3581. Supposing that a man is now virtually ohibited from obtaining money on a large class goods by reason of no person being allowed to d money upon them at a remunerative rate, w would he be more at the mercy of the pawn-oker by his being permitted to do that than he now?—Now he knows that up to 10*l.* he can and borrow, and that the interest is settled by t of Parliament.

3582. But he also knows that nobody can ord, at the rate prescribed by law, to lend him ney upon certain sorts of goods, does he not? That I do not admit. I think they can afford 3583. Do you think that a man can afford to ke in a bulky article and keep it for a year for penny?—I think that taking the whole trade gether we generally find that the pawnbrokers ve a very good trade.

3584. Do you know anything of their profits? It is a matter of common repute that some of em make large fortunes.

3585. Have you at all considered or inquired to the probable cost or expense of lending ney upon a large class of goods which are called agile and bulky?—There is a little more ware-use room required probably for large articles, t they must take large and small just as they me.

3586. Are you aware, as a matter of fact, that London people cannot borrow upon bulky ods, because nobody can afford to lend upon em?—I am not aware of that; I have never ard a complaint of the kind.

3587. You are not aware that it is a fact?—I n not.

3588. Mr. Hambro.] With regard to the working of the Act of the 22nd & 23rd Vict., which did away with the common informers, do you think that it was a considerable advantage to the pawnbrokers when the system of information was done away with?—I think that they were very much harrassed by the informations which used to be laid by certain common informers; and I think it was a very right thing to alter that law.

3589. Do you think that those common informers detected a considerable amount of irregularity in the business of pawnbrokers which now goes unnoticed?—I think not; I think that the poor are able to detect for themselves very well; they are very intelligent with regard to the amount which they have to pay.

3590. Therefore do you think that the passing of this Act did not destroy a protection to the public?—I think not; they have quite protection enough now. If they have any doubt the police court is always open, and they can come and ask the magistrate whether the charge is too much or not, and we always give them information.

3591. Would you see any objection if freedom of contract was allowed to limit it to any sum over 40 s., for instance?—I am altogether opposed to allowing pawnbrokers to charge whatever they think fit; I think there ought to be a check upon it, and, as I said before, I go further. I think that the French system works best for the suppression of crime.

3592. From your great experience, are you of opinion that the present rate of interest which pawnbrokers are allowed to charge is amply remunerative, and as much as it is fair to ask poor people to pay?—Yes, I think so.

3593. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Have you many instances of pawnbrokers having stolen goods in their possession?—Every day; there is scarcely a case of larceny in which there is not a pawnbroker's assistant as a witness to produce the stolen property in court, and in many cases there are as many as half a dozen pawnbroker's assistants, or I might say a dozen, for I have known as many as a dozen in one case. A thief is taken up, and upon him are found sometimes 20 duplicates; the police are ordered to inquire into all those cases, and they very often produce half a dozen or a dozen owners of the property to which those tickets relate. Therefore all those witnesses are bound over and go to the Sessions; and any judge at the Sessions, such as the Assistant Judge at the Middlesex Sessions, could tell you whether, in all cases that he tried, there is not almost always a pawnbroker's assistant as a witness to produce the stolen property. Of course they receive it unknowingly; but still they receive it. There is the opportunity of converting stolen property into money.

3594. Do you find that that exists amongst the lower class of pawnbrokers?—More so among the lower than among the higher class, but still the very highest in the town sometimes receive very valuable articles which have been stolen.

3595. Is that frequent amongst the higher class of pawnbrokers?—Not so frequent as in the smaller class of pawnbrokers, and in the lower parts of the town, but occasionally it is so.

3596. Do you find that the pawnbrokers give facilities readily?—The pawnbroking business is carried on a great deal by young assistants in the shops. The principals are very frequently absent, and the business being carried on by young assistants, they take in pledges without exercising sufficient care, without asking the question which they ought to ask, and without taking with sufficient correctness the address of the person who pledges, and in that way facilities are given.

3597. My question referred more to the facilities given to the discovery of stolen goods; what is your view as to that?—I think there are not sufficient facilities given to the police, or at least, the police frequently inform me that they have difficulty in obtaining an inspection of the goods of which they are in search. Whenever a magistrate sends to a pawnbroker, I must say that the pawnbroker always gives every facility he can, but when officers of the police go, they complain that they do not get facilities.

3598. Could you make any suggestion by which an improvement could be made in that way, so that they would be obliged to give facilities for the discovery of stolen goods?—I think that when a police officer goes to a pawnbroker's shop, any article about which he inquires ought to be shown to him; if he is in uniform that ought to be sufficient, if he is not in uniform he can produce his certificate that he is a police officer, and it is to be assumed that he is on duty; if he misconducts himself by making improper inquiries he can be dismissed.

3599. Mr. T. Hughes.] You would limit that as to specific articles, I presume?—Yes, of course, and generally when he had the ticket.

3600. Mr. Hambro.] You stated that pawnbrokers were continually mixed up in cases which came before you, with regard to stolen goods, but we never see any reports of those cases in the papers; is it the fact that those cases are not reported?—The great majority of the cases are not reported. In every police court there are 50 or 60 cases in a day, and the reporters, perhaps, select the one case which would be most likely to interest the public; but they do not report the larceny cases, and they never think of reporting the evidence of the pawnbrokers' assistants unless there is something very remarkable in it. They have not space for that.

3601. Then, the persons who gain their information only from the public papers can know very little about it?—Very little, indeed.

3602. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Have you any means of knowing the system which prevails in France?—I know that there is in every arrondissement in Paris what is called a mont de piété, which is an establishment conducted by Government officers. They charge nine per cent., and any person can go there and obtain loans upon property; but that is an office which is always held in places where police officers are also stationed, and the consequence is that thieves in Paris do not venture to take stolen property to the mont de piété, and, therefore, the larcenies in Paris are very much fewer than they are here.

3603. Are there no private pawnbrokers' shops?—No, they are not allowed; the trade is prohibited.

3604. Do you know what is the practice with regard to pawnbroking in Belgium?—I believe it is the same as in France.

3605. Do you know what it is in Italy?—In Italy it is the same, also, I believe.

3606. Do you know anything about pawnbroking in the United States?—I do not know what the practice or the law is in the United States; I have never been there.

3607. Do you consider it to be an advantage to the poor to be able to raise small sums upon bedclothes?—I do, I think they could hardly get on without that facility.

3608. Would you limit the amount lent?—I think the amount named in the Pawnbrokers' Act now is too low, and that the Pawnbrokers' Act ought to extend to 20 l. instead of 10 l.; above 10 l. the provisions of the Pawnbrokers' Act do not apply, but I think that is rather too low a sum.

3609. Do you consider that it would be any advantage to the community at large if pawnbrokers were obliged to take out annual licenses the same as the publicans do?—I do not think that is required: they take out licenses now, but I think it is hardly necessary to go the length of giving a discretionary power to magistrates.

3610. Mr. T. Hughes.] Your point of view, I apprehend, is the suppresion of crime?—No doubt.

3611. Looking at it from that point of view, would you prefer some system analogous to the French system rather than ours?—I should, and therefore I cannot afford to give up any of the checks which we have now upon the pawnbrokers' trade.

3612. Have you ever heard complaints as to the present rates from the pawnbrokers or from the poor?—I believe that the poor think the rates are quite high enough.

3613. Do you agree with them?—I do, because I know that the profits do not depend merely upon the rates of interest, but, as I said before, upon the amount of profits arising from the forfeited pledges.

3614. We have had considerable evidence going to show that the sales are on the whole barely remunerative; that is not your opinion?—I have not had the opportunity of seeing the evidence which has been given, and therefore, of course, I cannot express any opinion upon it; I do not know whether the Committee have examined Messrs. Debenham & Storr.

3615. One of the partners was examined, and his evidence was, I think, that the sales were barely remunerative, or that they did just turn the corner, but that was all. I suppose that your knowledge upon the subject is simply confined to common report?—It is very much hearsay.

3616. With respect to special contracts, I understand you to say that you think that the Act ought to be extended up to 20 l.?—I think that would be an advantage, but subject to all the provisions of the present Act.

3617. I presume that that would make it considerably more difficult for the pawnbrokers?—The pawnbrokers would probably object to that.

3618. The object of the pawnbrokers, so far as it has appeared by the evidence before us, is to extend free contract; and if they cannot get free trade altogether to take it as low as 40 s.; do you agree with that?—I am altogether opposed to that; I think it would be very mischievous indeed.

3619. Your opinion, as I understand, is that the trade is one having special temptations, and therefore that it ought to be under statutory regulations?—Precisely. I could not express it better than that.

3620. Is it your view, therefore, that free trade would, in the case of such a business, probably work rk unfairly and injuriously to the public?—ry injuriously to the public interest.

3621. Do you think that the length of time redeeming the pledges ought certainly not be shortened to six months?—Certainly not. ere are great complaints already that the poor not able to redeem their goods at the expi- ion of the 12 months. That is a subject of quent complaints. The poor have great diffi- ty in raising the amount of money which they e borrowed, and I should be very sorry indeed interfere with that. I am certain that the mber of forfeited pledges would be greatly reased, and that very great hardship would ue if the times were shortened, as proposed.

3622. The pawnbrokers say that the fashions nge so rapidly, and so on, that at the end of 12 months the pledges are much less valuable them; are you aware of that?—Very likely y are a little less profitable to them; but, on other hand, the poor are very glad to get ir own articles back if they can; they do not h to have them forfeited.

3623. Do you think that with respect to any ther facilities to the police in making the rch, it would be quite sufficient if it were the e that an officer should have the right to see article specifically named by him?—Yes, I nk that would be sufficient: what is required that the police officer should have the oppor- nity to inspect articles alleged to have been len, with a view to identify them.

3624. In fact, the present pawnbroking trade rds fair facilities?—I think so. I venture to that I think it is an unwise move on the part the pawnbroking trade to have started the l. In their interest I should have thought t it would have been better to have remained iet under the old law.

3625. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You think it unwise the part of the pawnbrokers, but it may be se on the part of the public?—I think it uld be injurious to the public if this Bill were ssed.

3626. Chairman.] You used the words "any lice officer" in one of your recent answers; do u wish the Committee to understand that any stable is to be at liberty to go to a pawn- ker and to make his demands?—When he is charge of a case.

3627. Do you mean by that, that when he is tructed in a case he is to go with the autho- y of a superior officer?—Yes. When cases remanded they are generally remanded for purpose of enabling the police to inquire out the duplicates found on the person, and the lice have orders to go and make the inquiries.

3628. Then he would go by the authority of ne responsible person?—Yes, of his inspector.

3629. Mr. Ridley.] What is your practice with gard to affidavits when duplicates have been t?—We have very numerous applications, many ndreds, in the course of every day, taking all police courts together; the poor, unfortunately, e their duplicates in a most careless manner, d they are obliged to obtain forms of declara- n, which they bring to the police courts to have ned by the magistrates. You would scarcely lieve the number which we have to sign every y; there are 40 or 50 at every court.

3630. And I suppose they are signed as a atter of course?—They are always asked the estion whether they are the owners of the operty, whether they lost the ticket, and whether that is their handwriting, if they can sign, or whether it is their mark, if they cannot sign. All those questions are distinctly asked, and, upon their answering the questions satisfactorily, the declaration is signed.

3631. Do many instances occur of false affidavits being made?—Very few, in London.

3632. Do you think that there is any practical inconvenience or injustice in the working of the present system?—I think not. Sometimes it has been said that there is a little collusion; that parties lose a ticket, and then come and make a declaration, and that ticket is afterwards found in the possession of another person, who goes and claims the goods; but I do not think that those cases are frequent; I think it is generally a bonâ fide loss. A woman pledges her shawl; she takes the duplicate, and goes into a public-house, and drops the ticket, perhaps, and then she has to get a form of declaration. They have no place in their lodgings in which to keep tickets, or things of that kind, and so they are lost in various ways; but there the pawnbrokers get some profit, because they get a halfpenny upon the form.

3633. Mr. R. Arkwright.] You said that you had many complaints from poor people that their pledges were forfeited; do you not think that if the time were shortened they would be more likely to remember when the time came to an end?—I think not. Their difficulty is that they have not been able to raise the money. They require a long time to raise a sum which is at all considerable. If a woman pledges something to enable her to buy a mangle, when the year is nearly expired she, perhaps, has not quite enough to redeem that article. If you shorten the time that difficulty would be very much increased.

3634. Mr. Ridley.] Do you think that they go on for some time saving the money?—They put by a penny a week, or something like that, and that is the way they raise it.

3635. For the purpose of redeeming the pledge?—Yes.

3636. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Then it is not so much the forgetfulness of the sum as the difficulty of raising the money?—Just so. Sometimes it is ignorance of the law. They do not all draw the distinction as to a pledge being above 10 s., when the pawnbroker is obliged to account for the surplus, if there is a sale; and that works particularly hardly upon the poorer classes.

3637. Then the value of a mangle would be above 10 s., would it not?—It would, probably, be so; but I did not mean that that was the only instance.

3638. Have they any idea of the three months' grace?—They have, and they constantly resort to that, and that fortifies me in saying that the twelve months' is not too much. They call it "backing the ticket."

3639. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You stated, did you not, that the poor people are very well acquainted with the interest which they have to pay upon pledges?—Yes, I think they are.

3640. Do you judge from the parties who come before you disputing the interest which they have been charged?—Yes.

3641. May you not presume that the people who dispute the interest which has been charged are the more intelligent portion of the people who pledge?—We have frequent opportunities of hearing what the poor say about it.

3642. For instance, in granting those certificates

Sir T. Henry.

11 July 1870.

cates for lost pledges, is it not the case that in the majority of instances the people are unable to sign their names?—A great many of them are.

3643. The majority?—Possibly it may be a majority.

3644. Do you think that in that case the people who cannot sign their names are likely to be able to calculate interest?—They talk it over with others.

3645. Can they talk it over intelligently?—They can.

3646. Even to fractions?—It is wonderful how very sharp they are. Money is such an object to them; and even a halfpenny is such an object to them that they become very sharp and intelligent upon matters of that kind.

3647. Then their knowledge of arithmetic is better than their knowledge of writing?—It is. If you give them less change than you ought, they will find it out in a moment.

3648. Just now the pawnbrokers receive a license from the Inland Revenue, but the Inland Revenue never inquire, do they, into the character of the person receiving the license; their interest being to obtain the money?—No doubt.

3649. Is it not the case that in the city, with which you are so well acquainted, there are men who are very respectable in the trade of pawnbroking, and others who are very much the reverse?—No doubt there are various classes of pawnbrokers.

3650. Would it not be well that as regards those disreputable characters who will do any kind of business, the Inland Revenue should have a knowledge of the character of the parties before they grant a license?—They would have no means of ascertaining.

3651. Would it not be well that you or some body of magistrates who are acquainted from their connection with the police with the character of the parties who come before them, who do a disreputable business, should be consulted before the Inland Revenue grants a license?—I think that where a pawnbroker has infringed the Act, and acted illiberally and unfairly towards the poor in many instances during the course of the year, there would be no great objection to letting a magistrate have the power of putting a veto upon the renewal of his license.

3652. Would you not go a little further than to say that there would be no great objection, and say that it would be really a benefit to the public if those parties were driven out of the trade who so misuse it?—If they misuse it, yes.

3653. In other words, do you agree that the licenses of pawnbrokers should be given by the Inland Revenue after being reported upon by a magistrate, or some one in authority, who may, from his connection with this class of people, have the power of knowing their characters?—But in the first instance we should have no opportunity of knowing the first year that an application was made for a license, and the Inland Revenue would have no opportunity of knowing the character of the person applying.

3654. I do not suggest that it should be done to-day, but that it might be done in the course of time, when a thorough knowledge was obtained of the parties in the business. You say that some pawnbrokers do not give proper facilities to the police to examine their books or premises when a robbery has taken place?—I have said that the police have complained to me that some of the pawnbrokers do not give as great facilities as others, or as much as they should like, and as they think necessary for the ends of justice.

3655. Do you find daily that pawnbrokers are giving evidence as to property being stolen?—Every day, as I said before, in almost every case of larceny.

3656. Those cases which are being tried are merely accidentally discovered by tickets being found on the person of the thief when he is apprehended, I presume?—Just so.

3657. May there not be, therefore, a great many more cases of stolen goods in pawnbrokers' establishments where you have not had the good luck to come across the person who stole the property?—No doubt.

3658. Do you not think that it would be for the interest of the public, under those circumstances, that the police, or the detective branch of the police force, should have the power at all times to inspect the books and premises of a pawnbroker without receiving a warrant from a magistrate?—The police are in the habit of circulating lists among the pawnbrokers' shops of all stolen property, and they rely upon the pawnbrokers reading those lists, and giving them information if they have any property of that kind in their possession. Whether all the pawnbrokers really deserve that confidence or not I should not quite like to say.

3659. I have no doubt that the more respectable portion of the trade will act honestly, but laws are made not against the respectable portion of the community, but against the vicious; and while there may be honest men (as I believe the great majority of them are in that trade) still, in order to detect a black sheep in the trade, when they have the opportunity of so frequently taking in stolen goods, would it not be wise, for the protection of the public interest, that the police should have the power which I propose?—I think it would be an advantage.

3660. Although the pawnbrokers do not give facilities to the constables at present, they give great facilities to you, do they not?—Perfect facilities. I have no complaint whatever to make personally of the pawnbrokers.

3661. You have the power of granting a warrant if they do not give you facilities, have you not?—Yes; I must say that all the pawnbrokers in the various districts which I have known treat any message from a magistrate with very great attention, and afford every facility they can.

3662. It is of great consequence in detecting crime, is it not, to have an opportunity at once to search for it?—No doubt; a search warrant is of no use unless it is applied for immediately after the theft: the fact is that search warrants are of very little use now, and they are very seldom granted.

3663. Have you made up your mind, from your observation, as to what is the effect of pawnbroking upon the poorer classes?—It affords very useful accommodation very often, but it also affords great temptation to drink; there is no doubt that a great number of the women in this town go into a pawnbroker's shop and pledge a shawl to get 4 d. to enable them to go into the public-house; that is a very common occurrence.

3664. Do you not think that the fact of so many pawnbroking tickets being lost, almost invariably arises in the way which you have stated, i.e., that from the pawnshop they go to the public-house, and they get into a state in which they lose the tickets?—I have taken great reat trouble to find out how it comes to pass at so many tickets are lost, because certainly ere are several hundreds in the course of every y, and I have inquired from the most intelligent icers, and their explanation was what I have ven to you: that women chiefly pledge for all sums, and very frequently to enable them go to the public-house; they have a child in eir arms, and they give the ticket to the child play with, the child drops the ticket on the or, and the woman walks out forgetting the ket.

3665. Do you think that a system which leads such results has not a demoralising tendency on the lower classes?—There is no doubt that has.

3666. Do you not think that while it may do od in some instances, pawnbroking for small nounts is really a vicious system?—I think it

3667. You seem to be well acquainted with e pawnbroking upon the Continent; do you prove of the monts de piété?—Very much; d there they do not lend under 3 francs, I lieve.

3668. Do you not think it would be wise in is country to limit the amount under which no edge should be taken, to the same amount of s. 6 d.?—I incline to think that it would.

3669. Would you not go even a little higher? -No, I know the necessities of the poor, and I ould be afraid to go higher than that.

3670. Are not those necessities often created a vicious system?—No doubt sometimes they e: but still there would be cases where it ould be a hardship not to be able to raise that nount, I think.

3671. Do you not think that the cases are so w, and the evil so great, that it would be wise do away with it altogether?—I think that if ou said that 2 s. 6 d. should be the lowest, that ould meet the objection.

3672. You, at all events, would like to begin ith that, in imitation of the French system?— es, in that respect, I should.

3673. Do you not think, that even for a higher m than that, it would be well if we could con- uct some national system like the monts de été, so that it might be rather a charitable in- itution than a trade for making money out of e very poorest class?—I think it would be very seful if we had Government establishments of at kind. You have now Post Office savings' anks, where the poor can deposit their money, nd that has become a most useful institution; nd if you had places where the poor could go and orrow money it would be also very useful, and hen there would be a perfect check that the oney was lent upon property which was not olen.

3674. At present, I believe, it is almost im- ossible for a pawnbroker to obtain the proper ddress of the parties with whom he is doing usiness?—He relies very much upon the word f the person offering the pledge, which after all s no security, for of course if a thief goes in to pledge property he is sure to tell a falsehood, and ive a wrong name and address.

3675. In France they are very careful as to dentity, are they not?—Yes; the money is not ent on the same day as the property is taken; hey take time to inquire.

3676. Therefore, in the case of a man who was nxious, because of thirst, to pledge for a small sum in order to get money to drink, if he had to call again the following day, before he got the money, his thirst might cool?—No doubt; but that could not very well be done by the pawnbrokers, as they now carry on their business.

3677. It would not prevent the really necessitous poor from being relieved, but it would prevent the vicious from being enabled to gratify their appetites; and it would also prevent stolen property from being so often pledged, would it not?—Of course I am in favour of anything which will check that.

3678. The pawnbrokers, as a rule, in London have two trades: they have sale offices and pawnbroking establishments in the same house, have they not?—Yes.

3679. Do you think that it is a wise thing that those two businesses should be allowed to be conducted on the same premises?—I am inclined to think that it is not, because, undoubtedly, there is an opportunity of transferring from the one to the other.

3681. When a theft took place, they would have the means, would they not, of entirely preventing the chance of its being detected, because no one has the right to go into their sale shops? —No.

3682. Therefore, they conduct business under what they call freedom of contract?—We have had cases in which there have been very large robberies, in which the value of property pledged with pawnbrokers was very considerable.

3683. Have many cases come under your observation of servants, butlers, or others, having made a temporary use of their masters' silver plate, and pledged it?—Several cases of that kind have come before us.

3684. Do they frequently occur?—I think we do not hear of them, because they are able to redeem and restore the plate more frequently than perhaps you might be aware of.

3685. But you have cases of that kind?—We have. Generally speaking they come before us where the servant has been unable to redeem, and where he has absconded, sending the tickets in a letter to his master.

3686. On that plate were there crests and initials?—Yes; there is no doubt that crested plate of that kind is taken in, even by some of the most respectable pawnbrokers.

3687. Does not that fact go far to satisfy your mind that when respectable pawnbrokers are so careless as to take in silver plate with crests and initials, they are not very scrupulous as to the nature of the property which they take in pledge? —The answer which they give to that is, that it happens occasionally to very respectable people to be obliged to pledge their own plate, and that they are satisfied with the answers given. Butlers go and give their masters' names, and pass themselves off as gentlemen, and impose, no doubt, upon the pawnbrokers.

3688. But would it not be a wise thing, before taking in that property, for an honest man to put himself into communication with the party who was said to be the owner?—I think it would be a very prudent thing on the part of the pawnbroker to do so; but if it were found that questions of that kind were asked at one pawnbroker's, thieves would very soon find that out, and they would take take care to go to another shop where such questions would not be asked, so that it is the competition in the trade which creates the difficulty.

Sir T. Henry.

3689. Do you think that a respectable man takes in that kind of property because he knows that there are other men in the trade less respectable than himself, and that if he does not wink at this there are other parties who will be less scrupulous?—That is the result.

3690. Mr. Plimsoll.] You have spoken of the cases in which pledges have been forfeited by lapse of time, and the pledgers have come to renew them; have you been able to form an opinion as to the number of those cases?—They would be a small proportion.

3691. You spoke also of the intelligence of the poor, and of their being so well able to calculate the amount of interest to which they were liable; does it not occur to you that that knowledge and intelligence would be sufficient to enable them to protect themselves against unfair charges in freedom of contract as to fragile and bulky goods?—Probably they would know the amount of interest which they would have to pay under special contracts, but I think power ought not to be given to charge any amount of interest the pawnbroker pleased, but that the rate of interest ought to be fixed by Act of Parliament.

3692-3. Supposing the case of a person who wanted to pledge, say a chest of drawers, the rates being such that the pawnbrokers found such pledges so troublesome that they refused that kind of pledge, do you not think that the alternative is that the would-be pledger has to sell it outright, and so to incur a greater loss than he would sustain by the pawnbrokers' charges?—But I do not admit it. I think that if a man has a chest of drawers and wants to raise money he can get that money from the pawnbrokers. Some pawnbrokers may not like it as well as others, but there are plenty of pawnbrokers to take it in.

3694. You have spoken of the hardship to the poor to leave their goods, and their reluctance to leave them; are you aware that the bulk of the evidence given before us shows that from 2½ to 7 per cent. seems to be about the amount of unredeemed pledges at the end of the year?—That must be calculated upon one particular shop; it cannot be calculated upon the whole trade.

3695. Chairman.] Why not?—I do not suppose that all the pawnbrokers in the kingdom have met together to calculate the exact amount of all the forfeited pledges. We could ascertain it in London pretty well by the sales. Any one pawnbroker may have said that, and it may have been carried out as regards his shop, but it does not follow that that would be correct as to the whole trade.

3696. Mr. Plimsoll.] The licenses to pawnbrokers by the Inland Revenue department are granted, I presume, exclusively with reference to revenue, are they not?—I have no doubt that they are.

3697. And with no view to protecting the interest of the poor?—No.

3698. And therefore there would be no more ground for giving the magistrates power to interfere with pawnbrokers' licenses, than there is in regard to a tea dealer or anybody else?—Perhaps that might be so.

3699. Do you not think that it would be a very dangerous, and almost a tyrannical thing to give to a police magistrate, or a police contable, the right to inflict domiciliary visits upon any class of tradesmen, unless upon a sworn information; such power, for instance, as that which has been pointed at by some of the questions which have been put to you, by which a police constable would have the right of going to a pawnbroker to make those inquiries, the magistrate having the power, after the pawnbroker had been in one or two instances proved to have been guilty of some dereliction, to withhold his license?—I think not more than is the case at present; and it is absolutely necessary for the police to have that power. All, or nearly all, stolen property in this town is taken to the pawnbroker.

3700. If nothing more is sought than exists at present, I should have no objection, but the question seemed to point to additional power on the part of the police?—I think that the majority of pawnbrokers give facilities to the police officers when they go to make inquiries; but there are some who are not disposed to do so; I only intended to convey that.

3701. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Have you very often occasion to summon a pawnbroker before you for refusing to give facilities to the police?—I have frequently had to send to them.

3702. Have you ever been so dissatisfied with a pawnbroker as to feel it necessary to send for him for the purpose of reprimanding him for not giving facilities to the police to find out stolen property?—Our practice is to send one of the officers of the court to the pawnbroker, desiring him to see the principal, and to say that, no doubt, it has been the act of one of his assistants to refuse to give the police officer the information he required. We request them to do it, and they always act upon it. We are not in the habit of granting summonses against pawnbrokers, because there is no occasion for it; all they want is an intimation that the act is authorised by us, and that is conveyed to them through one of the officers of the court.

3703. You have spoken of the French system; are you aware that, in different districts of the City of Paris, there are agents who receive property from parties in their neighbourhood with a view of pledging it at the central office?—But that is with the knowledge of the police.

3704. But are you aware that there are agents who convey the property from the outer districts to the general office?—I am not aware of that.

3705. Do you think that if it be the case that such agents being appointed independently of the central office, there may not be as great facilities for pledging stolen property in Paris as in London?—Not as great.

3706. I understood you to say that you were not in favour of what we have called "free contract"?—I am not.

3707. What is your objection to what is called "free contract"?—I think that pawnbroking is a trade which ought to be under regulations; it is a privilege to have it in this country at all.

3708. We have evidence that where the article is too bulky, and the pawnbroker cannot receive it, it is usual to take it to a dolly shop or a broker's shop, are you aware of that?—I do not think that dolly shops deal in articles of that kind generally.

3709. Supposing that a person had a bulky article in his house, and wanted money, he must either part with some of his wearing apparel, or with some of his blankets, or with a bulky article which

Sir T. Henry.

11 July 1870.

hich the pawnbroker, without a special contract, ould not take; do you not think that it would e an advantage to him that he should be able to rt with his bulky article?—Certainly; speakg of those bulky articles (like a piano, for stance) which are above 10 l. in value.

3710. But the working man is not likely to ve a piano; I am speaking of an article much ss valuable than a piano, which would not fetch, will say, more than 1 l.; the man might feel me objections to parting with his clothes, or rting with his furniture, and he would rather ke some bulky article out of his house; as you they are very sharp in reckoning, and that ey cannot very well be imposed upon though ey are ignorant, why should they not by special ntract take an article of that kind to the pawnokers?—I think that it would be very danrous to throw open to the whole pawnbrokg trade the power of charging whatever they eased.

3711. Do you mean that to apply to amounts ove 10 l. as well as below 10 l.?—I think, as I ve said before, that 10 l. is too low a sum; but t is the sum named in the present Act.

3712. Would you restrict pawnbrokers to a rtain amount of interest for articles of 10 l. and to 20 l.?—I would.

3713. Would you do the same with a person o discounts a bill?—That is a different trade ogether.

3714. It appears to me that the principle is ecisely the same?—No; my object is to take e of the poorer classes.

3715. A poor man might want to discount a l of 10 l., might he not?—My object is the supession of crime, and also to take care of the inests of the poor.

3716. Chairman.] Is it upon the principle of otecting the interests of the poor that you wish raise the limit to 20 l.?—I think there are ocsionally poor workmen who, from long illness, e obliged to pledge articles above 10 l., and to om it would be an advantage if the provisions the Pawnbroking Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, were plicable to cases up to 20 l.

3717. An honourable Member asked you ether it would be an advantage to have a law de by which a person borrowing money on his rsonal security should be brought under the ury laws?—The usury laws were discussed ne years ago, and it was thought expedient to eal them. I would not venture to give an inion after the action of the Legislature upon t point.

3718. Do you think that if a man borrows at y rate of interest without security, there ought t to be an usury law, but that if he borrows on the security of his goods there ought to be usury law?—I say that the Legislature have ought so, and I do not wish to give an opinion to the wisdom of their proceedings.

3719. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Are you aware t people often pledge for the purpose of asting themselves in their business?—No doubt.

3720. Suppose that a cloth manufacturer, for stance, took half-a-dozen ends of cloth to a wnbroker, would you restrict the pawnbroker to any interest which he might agree to charge keeping and warehousing those goods?—Yes, would, because if I once opened the door he uld do it in every case. If you were to pass s Act, and give pawnbrokers power to make ecial contracts, there would be scarcely anything but special contracts, and I should think the pawnbroking trade would have reason to regret it; because they would have much more competition than they have now.

3721. Colonel Beresford.] With the advantage of your long experience, do you know of any pawnbroker in the trade so disreputable that you would refuse him his license at the present time?—Of course I shall not name anyone, but I think I have known pawnbrokers against whom there were so many complaints that if I had a discretionary power, I should say "You cannot have your license next year." But such cases have been very few.

3722. Mr. Whitwell.] It seems important that as it is a vital part of the Bill whether freedom of contract should be introduced, we should have your opinion clearly and definitely. You propose to raise the amount to what sum?—To 20 l.

3723. And that no person should make a contract under 20 l. with a pawnbroker, except on a schedule of rates?—Just so; the present schedule in the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, of course raising it up to 20 l. in similar proportions.

3724. You are aware that the rate of interest which the pawnbrokers can now charge upon small pledges is 50 or 60 per cent.?—It is not as much as that, I think.

3726. Then if a person wished to pledge a gold watch, and could get an advance upon it at the rate of four or five per cent. from a pawnbroker, should he not be allowed to do it?—I should not object to that.

3727. Then you still allow freedom of contract?—It would not be freedom of contract if the Act names it. My objection to the special contracts is that there is no limit.

3728. Then, even for goods above 10 l., is it your opinion that there should be a prescribed rate at which a pawnbroker should advance money, and below which he should not be called upon to go?—Just so.

3729. I think you were asked whether there was any reason for dealing with pawnbrokers differently from other trades, in the way of granting a license?—Simply that their transactions are very much with the poor people, and that there ought to be certain restrictions.

3730. Is there not a reason why they should be an exceptional trade, inasmuch as they are the chief depositories of stolen goods?—No doubt that is the main reason. It is incidental to the trade; they do not do it knowingly, of course, but they do it.

3731. You stated, did you not, that there was a good deal of fault by shops being managed by an assistant instead of a principal?—By a number of young assistants, who sometimes give uncivil answers to the poor people and do not take sufficient notice of the persons who come to pledge, and when they are called forward as witnesses they do not recollect. That is most inconvenient, although the pledge was only taken in yesterday. Sometimes we have assistants coming forward producing the stolen property, and saying that they have no recollection whatever of the person who pledged it. That is a want of care and attention.

3732. Is it not an actual failure of memory

Sir T. Henry.

11 July 1870.

with them?—I daresay it is; they are only thinking of taking in the pledge, and getting as many as they can of them. We do not find that so much the case when the principal himself takes in a pledge; he generally pays more attention to it.

3733. But if 1,600 pledges are taken in in one day, how can a person remember the people pledging?—I do not mean to say that he can remember every one; but still there are remarkable instances of plate and things of that kind pledged, and within a day or two they have not the least recollection of the person who pledged it, and they are constantly found fault with at the sessions. If you examined Sir William Bodkin, he would tell you his opinion upon that point.

3734. In your opinion, then, has a failure of justice often been occasioned by the want of proper recollection of the pledger?—Very often indeed.

3735. With regard to pawn tickets: in your opinion do the certificate or affidavit presented to you, and the order consequently made for the pawnbroker to deliver the pledged article, constitute any legal claim against the pawnbroker on the part of any other person owning the pawn ticket?—No; it is a good answer on the part of the pawnbroker to say, "There is the declaration upon which I gave the article out of pledge."

3736. Then you have ruled on occasions that that is the law of the case?—Yes, that is a good answer; if anyone has made a false declaration he can be indicted for perjury.

3737. When you stated, in answer to the question of an honourable Member, that it was undesiderable to shorten the time for which pledges are held by pawnbrokers, had you in view the fact that woollen articles of clothing are pledged in the month when the weather became warm, and that they are much more valuable when the weather begins to be cold again than at the twelvemonths' end?—The poor person can best judge of that himself; it is to his prejudice if it is left too long, but they would be very sorry to have the time shortened.

3738. You stated, did you not, that there were cases where, if you had a discretionary power, you would withdraw the license from a pawnbroker?—I said that there had been such cases in the course of my experience.

3739. Are you aware that that is a power which is entrusted to justices in New South Wales?—I was not aware of that fact.

3740. And also in Victoria, ever since 1849?—I was not aware of that fact.

3741. Would you recommend that the sale of articles under 10 s. should be done by an auctioneer?—I really think it would be a fair thing; I could never see why there was that distinction, and why, if they fetched more than the principal and interest, the poor person should not have the benefit of that, although the pledge was under 10 s.

3742. Have you ever had any person apply to you for the restoration of the value of an article sold over and above the amount for which it was pledged?—Yes, but such applications are not so frequent as might be supposed, and I believe that a great many persons are not aware of the clause in the Act which gives them the right to inspect the books and claim the surplus.

3743. Could you recommend any alteration in the law with the view of protecting persons who have pledged articles which are afterwards sold?—The law is so, above 10 s., but the misfortune is, that people have not always the opportunity of knowing what the law is; Acts of Parliament are not made sufficiently public.

3744. Would you think it unreasonable that the pawnbroker should be compelled to give notice to a person whose article was going to be sold if it was above the value of 2 l.?—There is nothing unreasonable in that, but there would be a great difficulty, because the people who pledge nine times out of ten give a wrong name and a wrong address, and therefore the pawnbroker would have no means of communicating with them.

3745. Mr. T. Hughes.] As to the time of opening, what is your opinion?—I think the present hours are very good.

3746. Do you think it advisable to let pawnbrokers keep their shops open as long as they pleased?—No, I think the present hours work very well; they are late enough on Saturday nights, but that of course was an object for the poor, and I see no reason for altering them.

3747. Mr. Orr Ewing.] But why should they be open later on a Saturday night?—Because the poor people get their wages at a late hour very often, and then they are able to go after they have received their money and take their article out of pledge; and the articles taken out of pledge on the Saturday night are much more numerous than on any other night on that account.

3748. Is it the case in London that masters pay their workmen late in the evening?—Yes there are some now who pay on Fridays, but not so many as there ought to be.

3749. Would it not be well to change the law and make them pay earlier?—That is a different question altogether, but no doubt it would.

3750. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you think that in many cases you would be able to get the men to work on the Saturday mornings if you paid them on Friday nights?—That is another question.

3751. Mr. Hambro.] Would you extend the provisions of the Factory Act to children employed in the pawnbroking trade?—No, I never had any complaints of the assistants being in bad health; they look very well when they come as witnesses.

3752. Chairman.] Do you see any particular use in placing great restrictions upon obtaining goods by pledges, especially if the goods are always abandoned after the pledge, whilst every one is at liberty to sell goods freely without pledging at all?—I do not want to impose any restrictions which are not necessary to assist the officers of justice in the discovery of crime.

3753. There are no special restrictions upon the sale of second-hand goods, are there?—No.

3754. Then what is the difference between the obtaining of money on the pledging of goods which are not redeemed and the selling of the goods?—The facilities for pledging at pawnbrokers are much greater than the facilities for selling.

3755. What is the difference between the facilities of taking the goods to a pawnbroker's and having to give your name and address and other matters, and taking them to a person who buys and having to answer no questions at all?—that person who buys is discovered he will be indicted as a receiver, and that is the protection which which the pawnbrokers have. The pawnbroker can set up the privilege of his trade to take in articles, and therefore we cannot indict him as a receiver well knowing that the property was stolen; but if we find it in the possession of a man who buys it without asking questions, it is a totally different thing.

3756. Do I understand you then that it is your view of the law, that a man can be indicted as a receiver of stolen goods who buys goods brought to his shop, he having an open shop to buy goods?—If he buys them incautiously it will be for a jury to say whether he did not receive them under such circumstances as that he ought reasonably to have suspected, and if he did he cannot set up the answer that a pawnbroker would be able to set up.

3757. Do I understand you that it is your view of the law, that a man is bound to take any more care in buying goods in an open shop than a pawnbroker is for the goods which he may take in pledge?—I do; because in the first place it is not in the custom of the trade to buy in that way.

3758. If there is an open shop to buy a commodity, is not a man entitled to buy goods in the way of his trade in a shop which he keeps for that purpose, and is it the law that that man can be indicted for receiving stolen goods?—I cannot answer that without knowing what were the circumstances, what was the article, and at what hour of the day it was sold; if the circumstances were sufficiently suspicious, then I would let a jury determine that point.

3759. The question assumes that a man keeps an open shop for the purpose of buying goods, and that in the way of his trade a person offers those goods for sale; do I understand you to say that if a man buys those goods without taking down the name and address of the person who sells, he is liable to be indicted for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen?—I cannot answer that general question, because if it is in the way of trade that would make all the difference.

3760. Supposing that pawnbroking were put an end to, and that trades were established for the buying of commodities in open shops, would it not be the right by law of every person to buy goods which were offered him for sale?—The question would be, whether he used due diligence in the purchase according to the custom of the trade, or whether he really gave facilities for a man to part with the property which he had, and which did not belong to him.

3761. Colonel Beresford.] No man in that position would buy without asking the name and address of the seller, I presume?—Of course not.

Sir T. Henry. 11 July 1870.

3763. Chairman.] That is buying and selling in the way of trade, is it not?—No doubt; in that case there would not be sufficient to convict him.

3764. Nor in any open trade, supposing that there were no pawnbrokers?—When that time arrives I shall be ready to answer the question.

3765. If you take to a man who deals in second-hand jewellery, an ordinary ring, for instance, is he bound to verify your name and address, and to send to your house, and so forth?—I must hear all the circumstances under which he bought, and if they were suspicious, then it would be for me to determine whether a jury ought to be referred to in a matter of that kind.

3766. Did you ever know a jury to convict a man receiving goods knowing them to have been stolen, when he bought goods over the counter for their fair value?—No, not for their fair value; that is always an ingredient; but if he bought very much under the value, the case would be different.

3767. It requires a special fact to be shown, does it not?—It is not necessary to establish the special fact. If he bought the articles so incautiously, and made such a profit by them as to leave no doubt upon any reasonable mind that he must have suspected that they had not been honestly come by, a jury would be entitled to find him guilty, and they have done so very often.

3768. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I suppose that you would like those shops put under the inspection of the police?—They are. The leaving shops are a very great evil. I have drawn the attention of the Inland Revenue to them, and they have been prosecuted within the last year several times at my court for infringing the Pawnbroking Act. There have been several convictions, and the full penalty has been inflicted upon them.

3769. But have the police the power of entering those shops whenever they think fit?—Yes; they go into them, and treat them almost as if they were pawnbrokers. They know them very well. But I must say that those shops deal in a very small way, and generally with very poor people, who do not like to be asked even the questions that are asked in pawnbrokers' shops.

3770. They are not men of capital like pawnbrokers?—No, they are in a very small way of business; but they are a great evil, and we are doing all we can to put them down.

Mr. William M'Donald, called in; and Examined.

3771. Chairman.] What are you?—I am at present practising in the minor courts in Edinburgh.

3772. As a writer to the signet?—As an assistant in cases both civil and criminal for the poorer classes.

3773. Is there much pledging in Edinburgh for very short periods?—A very great deal. The bulk of the trade is of that description.

3774. Are the pledges of very small amount?—Most of them amongst the poorer classes are so.

3775. Do they generally redeem the pledges?—Mostly weekly.

3776. Do you mean that a great many people are in the habit of pawning at the beginning of the week and redeeming at the end of the week?—I should say thousands in Edinburgh.

3777. What is the purpose for which they do that?—They have got into the habit of it, but how I cannot say.

Mr. M'Donald.

11 July 1870.

3778. What is the object of their doing it in that way?—I believe that they are improvident people that have begun it. It is taken out to go out on the Sabbath day. It is their Sabbath-day clothing that comes in on the Monday morning and is redeemed on the Saturday night.

3779. To what amount do they repeat this operation weekly?—I believe, on an average, to 5*s.* per week in each family.

3780. Then the possession of 5*s.* would enable them to dispense with this practice, would it not?—I believe the possession of from 5*s.* to 10*s.* would have that effect.

3781. What is the reason that they cannot get possession of 5*s.* or 10*s.*?—I believe that socially they have travelled out of their depths, and cannot get to the ground again.

3782. Do you mean that their wages are so small that they cannot accumulate 5*s.*?—I do not mean exactly that; I mean that they have embarked in weekly payments which cause a continual drain upon their wages, and which are gradually making the people less and less able to save. For example, there is the "tally" system, which is very largely carried on in Edinburgh; that is, buying goods on credit and paying at the rate of 1*s.* a week; the man calls weekly for 1*s.* I know some working men's wives who have from six to eight of these men to meet weekly, and two is a very common number.

3783. You mean that those people are always in a state of indebtedness?—They are always in debt; and most of them the moment a pawn shop opens raise money on a Monday morning to meet those men; Monday is the busy day.

3784. And therefore they will never take the trouble to pay their debts and save 5*s.*?—There are so many of them that I cannot account for the reason; but such is the fact that there are thousands in Edinburgh engulphed in it.

3785. Do you think the cause of this extraordinary indebtedness of the poorer classes is, that that there is in Scotland the law of arrestment of wages?—I believe this Bill which is now passed will be a check to them. In the Justices of the Peace Courts, of which there are two in Edinburgh; one called the County Court, and the other called the Burgh Court, where the County Justices and the Burgh Justices sit, and which courts are held every Monday, my own experience has convinced me (in fact I am speaking from my knowledge of this) that on an average tallymen alone have 50 cases weekly. The great bulk of their payments have within the last three to five years been principally collected by the Justices of the Peace officers; because the moment the poor people fall into arrear, say 2*s.* or 3*s.*, the summons is served. These small debts have, a great many of them, been contracted without the knowledge of the husband; the summons is left at the house; the husband is at his work, and he knows nothing about it, or about the debt having been contracted at all; a decree goes in absence, and the wife never takes the trouble to go to the court. The arrestment then goes on to the man's wages, and he knows nothing of it until the arrestment comes in, and by the time the arrestment comes in he has no power to act in the matter, because the Justice of the Peace Act says, that when 10 days have expired after the charge, the whole thing is closed and cannot be opened again. Then when his wages are arrested he has no salvation; the debt must be paid then, just or unjust.

3786. He has no choice, but either to abandon his occupation altogether or to submit to this arrestment?—Yes.

3787. And, therefore, he is left in great straits, is he not?—Yes.

3788. It would seem that the embarrassment results from the great facility the tallymen and others have of enforcing their rights by the arrestment of wages; is that so?—Yes, they sell the women goods in the absence of the husbands, and just immerse the poor people in difficulties that they cannot extricate themselves from.

3789. Then you think this pressure necessitates their resorting to pawnshops to obtain the funds that they absolutely require?—To a very great extent it does; I was also employed for several years on a popular paper in Edinburgh among the working classes, called the "North Briton," to pay attention to the habits and customs of the working classes; and I made it my business to watch the doors of pawnshops in Edinburgh on the Saturday nights and Monday mornings for three years (not constantly every week, but very often throughout the year), and I came to the conclusion, from the notice that I paid to them at those times and throughout the week, that there was far more business done on Saturday night and Monday morning (on Saturday night by taking out, and on Monday morning by taking in) than was done all the rest of the week. I do not speak now of the respectable pawnbrokers, such as the Equitable Loan Company, managed by Mr. George Russell; I believe business is conducted there fairly and honestly.

3790. You say that by the company of which you have just spoken, the business is conducted fairly and honestly; what is the unfairness and dishonesty in the transactions to which you have referred?—Some years ago there was a system very largely carried on in Edinburgh called the "Wee pawn" system, to which the police directed their attention, and directed it so forcibly that those "wee pawns" were ultimately put down by the police to a very great extent; they do like every other evil, crop up now and then, in spite of the best efforts of the police.

3791. But what is the unfairness and dishonesty in the other transactions to which you referred?—The greater number of "wee pawn" keepers, when they were driven out of the "wee pawn" system, took out what is called the 7*l.* 10*s.* license, and became pawnbrokers. There are now a number of them who are pawnbrokers, and I do not consider that the getting of the license, made those men what I would call moral, because I do not think a moral man would have gone into the "wee pawn" trade; and they still take every advantage that they possibly can of the poor. For instance, Mr. Russell, the manager of the Equitable Loan Company, deals in farthings, and I find that the more respectable part of the pawnbroking trade are desirous to obey the Act; but the lower the pawnbroker is the less is his desire to obey it, and he will not keep a farthing in his place. He deals only in halfpennies and pennies; that is one act of dishonesty, because it is charging interest beyond what the Act prescribes.

3792. Is there anything else?—I do not believe that they give those facilities to the police for the discovery of stolen goods which they are bound to do.

3793. But with reference to those particular pawnings; do they commit any other acts of dishonesty dishonesty or unfairness?—Yes; they get a halfpenny for every ticket under the recent Act, of which I suppose you are aware. If a poor woman goes in with her husband's Sunday suit, the coat, vest, and trousers, those unscrupulous pawnbrokers split the pledge and make three pledges of it; the coat is a pledge, the vest is a pledge, and the trousers is a pledge; she has thus three-halfpence instead of one halfpenny, supposing that a lesser sum is to be advanced upon an article than would entitle him to one penny on the ticket. Of course those clothes are not very good clothes, and they do not get very much on them. I have known a suit that could not command 5 s. being split into three pledges.

3794. That is not illegal, is it?—That is not illegal, but I do not think it is fair.

3795. In what does the unfairness consist?—If the woman goes with her husband's coat, and vest, and trowsers, of course the very fact of her requiring to go there proclaims her need, and the one bundle would hold the whole; I think she is not a fit subject to rob of a penny.

3796. But if the law allows a person to lend money under a particular condition, and he lends it under this condition, what constitutes the unfairness?—Supposing the woman goes with a suit, I consider the suit an article in one sense, although it is three in another; her intention is to pledge the suit. That would only give the pawnbroker a halfpenny for his ticket, and I would give him no more for his interest either, at the end of the week, if the pledge did not exceed 5 s.; but he splits it into three, and then he has a halfpenny for each ticket and interest on each article; so that supposing those articles are pledged on the Monday morning and lifted on the Saturday, he would have the 5 s. being advanced, he would have the halfpenny interest on each article and a halfpenny for each ticket, which gives the pawnbroker 3 d. instead of a penny.

3797. But if it be a perfectly lawful transaction, and if it be competent to the person who tenders the pledge to tender it, what constitutes the unfairness?—I cannot make the thing more clear. It is lawful for a publican to fill a man drunk, but it is not fair to do so, although he can legally sell the drink.

3798. Is it lawful for a publican to serve a man who is drunk with more liquor?—No; but if he comes in sober it is lawful to allow him to drink until he goes away drunk; he may supply a man with as much as he likes, provided he can go away.

3799. What is there wrong in a man having as much beer given him as he calls for, provided that he is not drunk when he calls for it?—What I wished to make clear is, that while it is quite legal for the pawnbroker to charge this halfpenny, it is not fair, because he could have made the pledge one bundle, which was the woman's intention, but he makes three of it for the purpose of paying himself better.

3800. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You believe that it is within the letter of the law, but not within the spirit of the law?—That is so.

3801. Chairman.] What makes you infer that it is within the spirit of the law that a person is at liberty to put as many articles as he pleases together, and to insist upon the pawnbroker advancing money upon them as one pledge, because that would be the consequence of your view?—The only thing I can say to make it more clear is this: that when a poor woman goes to this pawnbroker with her husband's clothes, I believe that the woman has no other intention but to consider that as one pledge; and I believe that when she puts that pledge in on the Monday morning with the intention of taking it out on Saturday, she thinks she pays quite enough when she pays a halfpenny interest and a halfpenny for the ticket; the pawnbroker thinks otherwise, and he thinks that he may legally convert this transaction into a 3 d. transaction, and that he will take a halfpenny for the vest, a halfpenny for the coat, and a halfpenny for the trousers, both for tickets and for interest; and my simple meaning when I say that it is not fair is, that it is not exactly in accordance with what the woman intended.

3802. I understand you now to mean that the woman going into the shop intending to make a bargain one way, and the pawnbroker offering her a bargain in another way, she accepts the pawnbroker's bargain rather than her own bargain?—Just so.

3803. But she perfectly understands the two views of the bargain, does she not?—Perfectly.

3804. There is no doubt about it, is there?—There is no doubt about it.

3805. Is she not doing it with a perfect consciousness that if she could get her bargain she could do it for 1 d., but that if she does it at the pawnbroker's way she does it for 3 d.?—That is it.

3806. Rather than go out of the shop and go elsewhere she gives the 3 d., does she not?—Just so.

3807. Is it your opinion that it would be desirable to pass any law to prevent this system of repeated pledging of articles of small value for small sums?—I have often thought (though of course I merely give it as my own opinion) that were it possible to prevent pawnbrokers from taking in pledges below 2 s. 6 d. it would be a great benefit to what I would call the lapsing classes. I believe that were this the case when a child got a frock or a pair of shoes, or whatever it might be, it would be able to keep it; but still there is one thing to be borne in mind, and that is, that unless this was done very carefully it would have no good effect upon the poor. For example, I have already illustrated to you how one pledge can be made into more articles than one, and the pawnbroker could get over the Act by putting a lot of articles together to make a pledge exceed 2 s. 6 d. To prevent that I would suggest that no pawnbroker be allowed to advance a sum less than 10 s. upon anything that was not a single article. I think that had we those checks the poor would be able to keep their clothing. I do not blame the pawnbrokers for taking them, but still I think it is very desirable that some means should be adopted whereby the unthinking portion of the people should keep their clothing.

3808. You have stated that the people are so thoughtless that they buy goods when they cannot afford to pay for them, what would they do with regard to selling their goods if they were compelled to have money, and they could not pledge them?—I do not know what the law in England relative to that is, but in Scotland it is only brokers who do buy goods, and the law relative to brokers is, that they cannot even buy a piece of old rope, value one halfpenny, and sell it again within seven days; so that I think that a sufficient check. The husband could look after that.

3809. Is it your opinion that the improvidence which has induced people to buy goods when they cannot pay for them, would not induce them to sell goods when they absolutely wanted the money to be got for them?—I believe that when the article is put in pawn for the purpose of procuring drink, parties such as those would take any means within their reach of parting with their goods.

3810. Therefore the difference would be that they would sell the clothes, or whatever it might be, to dealers in second-hand goods?—Yes.

3811. Then all that we should have got would be selling in exchange for pawning, would it not?—Yes, but there would be a check upon that in this way: that those second-hand dealers (I speak of Edinburgh only) have to get their license every year from the police judge, and whenever the superintendent of police discovers parties purchasing in any way that is not what he thinks proper, he reports it, and the license is not repeated.

3812. Would there be any impropriety if a man came to sell a suit of clothes, or a coat, or a part of a suit, in buying them at the value that was bargained between the two parties?—There would be no impropriety whatever; but if a broker was once detected in purchasing the articles of a household from a drunken wife with his knowledge, I do not think his license would be repeated.

3813. But supposing the case of a sober wife or a person not drunk?—That is taking cases of extreme poverty, which I believe it is impossible to speak upon.

3814. With reference to the other class of people who do not pawn for drink, but who are involved with the tallymen, what would happen to them when they were pressed for money, and with arrestment of wages, and so forth?—The working classes of Edinburgh are a most respectable class of men, taking them as a class, and although the tally trade is a very large trade, I believe that the most part of it is carried on by women, who have got into habits not altogether right, and who contract those debts without the knowledge of their husbands; I do not think that there is one out of every ten of those debts contracted with the knowledge of the husbands.

3815. But what would be done when the pressure came, and they were not allowed to raise money by pawning; would they sell their things, or what would they do to get out of their troubles?—I believe they would sell.

3816. Then, again, we should substitute the selling of goods for pawning them?—But there seems to be a movement afloat in Edinburgh to a large extent. There is a society in Edinburgh at the present moment called "The Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor." They lend money to the poor, after making inquiry into their circumstances, and ascertaining that it is a proper case for a loan, and they neither need to pawn nor sell in those cases.

3817. But that is merely a benevolent society spontaneously acting from charitable motives, I presume?—Yes.

3818. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do they charge interest?—No.

3819. Chairman.] I am speaking now on the assumption that people are exercising their legal rights of doing as they please within certain limits. I understand you to say that they would have to sell their goods; and that they would sell them?—After many years' experience among the working men of Edinburgh, my own impression that once a great number of the evils that surround them at the present moment were removed (and I consider taking in low pledges one of them), all those things would go away. I believe this Arrestment of Wages Bill will annihilate the tally system altogether; and while there may be cases of extreme poverty where people would have to part with their goods for honourable purposes, I know of no other thing that they could do than to sell, if they had not a place to pawn.

3820. Then it would seem, in your view of the present condition of society, to be rather a choice of evils; that a person must either pawn or sell; and the greater evil, you think, is pawning, and not selling?—I believe that even parties who are in the habit of pawning at present, knowing that they can redeem, would not always sell. The very fact that a man knows that he can get back an article that he has pawned, in the course of a week or a year, encourages him to put it away. If he knew that it was totally sold, and he could never get it back again, he would think twice before he parted with it.

3821. But I understood from your previous evidence, that the workman is in circumstances of necessity by reason of his misconduct, or that of his wife?—Yes; but the working men of Ediburgh are very well off; they have capital wages.

3822. Then in those cases there would be no necessity to pawn or to sell, I presume?—The working men of Edinburgh do not, as a class, patronise pawn shops.

3823. Then we have one man in necessities arising from credit too easily obtained, and another man who is addicted to drinking, or who, or whose wife, gives way to dissipation?—Yes.

3824. And you think the dissipated person would just as soon sell as pledge, if he could not pledge; and that the man who is in a state of necessity must sell if he could not pledge, because he cannot get out of his difficulties otherwise?—I believe the dissipated man rather than want the drink would sell; but I believe he would think twice before he parted with his article.

3825. Do you think it desirable that there should be any change in the relation of the pawnbroker to the police; and that there should be greater facilities given to the police to detect theft?—In Edinburgh the practice is, that there is an officer set apart by the superintendent of the police for that special duty.

3826. Is there any Local Act with reference to that?—I think it is the Edinburgh Police Act of 1848. At any rate, I know it is a fact, that for many years a man has been appointed by the superintendent of the police for the special duty of the inspection of pawn shops, and it is his duty to go round those pawn shops regularly, inquiring after stolen property; but I do not think that that is an effectual method.

3827. What method would you suggest?—I would suggest, though it might cause trouble to the pawnbrokers, that instead of the police supplying them every morning with a list of articles, icles, they should keep a cheque book, some-ing like a banker's cheque book, with perfo-ed holes, and that one part should be the ket given away to the pledger, and that the maining piece should be the property of the lice, and should be sent to the police every ght. Then the police would have a knowledge every article pledged, and consequently of ery stolen article pledged.

3828. That is to say, a daily report of all the erations of the pawnbrokers?—Yes.

3829. And that the police should keep a gister, and so know everything that was done? Yes, it would not be so great an exposure as e present system.

3830. Then you would, I presume, have some rticular officer of police who would keep this gister, so as not to expose it generally?—Yes, would never be seen but by the police; it ould be a less exposure than the present system, cause by the payment of 1 d., any inquisitive curious person can inspect the pawnbroker's oks, and see the names of all who have pledged at month.

3831. Do you mean that he can make a general spection of the books?—Yes.

3832. Under what law?—Under the Pawn-okers Act. Supposing that I am inquisitive, I ve just to go and say that I want to look for article, and pay the 1 d.

3833. Must you not produce the duplicate?—o, it can be done on payment of 1 d.

3834. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Are you certain that?—I am certain that on payment of 1 d. ou can inspect a pawnbroker's book at any time; pposing the article to have been sold, you just ay the 1 d., and you name the month in which e article is pledged, and the pawnbroker hands ou the book.

3835. Chairman.] That is the case with goods elow 10 s. being sold by auction, and the person aying a 1 d. is entitled to look at the particular ntry relating to his goods?—Yes, and of course ll the other entries are there.

3836. But he is not entitled to see them, is e?—He is entitled to look at the book; I nerely say that it gives access to the book.

3837. Mr. Mills.] He has to give his name and he date, and so on?—Yes, but still he sees the ook; I mean to say any pledger can look over ne pawnbroker's books.

3838. Chairman.] He could go and see the ntry respecting the sale of his own goods?—Yes, o doubt, but he can go over the whole book, if e is an inquisitive man.

3839. But where is the law?—The book is here.

3840. He is not entitled to see anything more han that particular line, is he?—But if he can-not give the proper date the pawnbroker lays down the book, and he looks it out himself.

3841. But that is not the law, is it?—I can ssure you that it is done.

3842. He must give all the details, and then he particular line, showing the sale of his par-icular article, is shown to him, and no more; is not that so?—If he cannot give the particular dates the pawnbroker lays down the book for him to look up his own article; that is the custom in Edinburgh.

3843. Have you any further suggestions to offer to the Committee to prevent the pawning of stolen goods?—There is one thing which has always struck me as somewhat peculiar with reference to the pawnbroking trade, that they all have private boxes for their customers. A pledger comes in and opens a door, and shuts himself inside, and, in a sort of whisper (because it is not done in any way like other business), the pawnbroker, or his assistant, and the pledger transact the business. I cannot see why, if pawnbroking is a fair and honourable trade, it should be done in this way, or why they should not have open counters like other tradesmen; I know it is said that it is out of consideration for the feelings of honest people, whose necessities may drive them there; but, while it does that, it considers the feelings of the thief also, who has the opportunity of secrecy.

3844. Do you think that a man is bound, if he wishes to have dealings with another person, to deal in the presence of any audience that may happen to be around?—I know of no place in Edinburgh, at any rate, where stolen goods can be got away with such secresy as at the pawnshop, because in a broker's shop there is an open counter; in any dealer's shop there is an open counter; but in the pawnshops there is a little door behind which the thief can shut himself in, and there is no one there except himself and the pawnbroker or his assistant, and there is no speaking loud enough for anybody to hear, and thus the stolen article is got rid of at once.

3845. Supposing that a man sells goods in a shop, is he bound to make his bargain in the presence of anybody, or may he go into the back shop and deal in private?—He may.

3846. Does not he do so?—I have known men make private bargains in that way.

3847. Mr. Orr Ewing.] As a rule, however, business is done openly, is it not?—As a rule business is done openly, unless there is something they do not wish people to know; and, I think, the fact of these boxes being there suggests that there is something in the transaction which either the pledger or the pawnbroker, or both, desire to conceal. I would suggest that the pawnbrokers should have open counters, as they have in other businesses.

3848. Chairman.] Do you think the pawnbroker would have those boxes if it was not for the sake of his customers?—Perhaps not. A pawnbroker's business is a fair and honest business, and with many of them it is so.

3849. Do you not think that they do it to suit the convenience of persons pawning?—I do not know; but I know that it gives facilities to the thief that he has not elsewhere.

3850. Do you think that any inconvenience arises from goods being sold in pawnbroker's shops?—Yes; most of the pawnbrokers in Edinburgh have what they call their sale room and their pawnshop together; and this, at present, is giving rise to some evils. There are men in business in Edinburgh who have occasionally to pawn a part of their stock to meet immediate necessities. I know of a schoolmaster who does it frequently, and the pawnbroker with whom he deals has his sale room and his pawnshop both on the same premises. I know for a fact that this pawnbroker, when a purchaser comes in for a pair of boots, if there is not a pair in the sale-room to fit, that purchaser goes to the unredeemed pledges of this shoemaker that are in his pawnshop, and picks out a pair and sells them, although they are not redeemed; and then he sends word to, or tells, the shoemaker that he has sold a portion of his pledged goods, and he gives him the price of them, less his profit upon the transaction, and then a ticket is given for the quantity left on hand. I think that the very fact of that being the case is good ground for asking that their premises should be separated.

Mr. M'Donald.

3851. Does that occur very often?—I am told that it is getting very common; so common that I know a shoemaker in Edinburgh who supplies four pawnbrokers with ready-made boots for the purpose of selling to the public as unredeemed pledges.

3852. I understand you to say that those sales take place with the consent of the person who pledges the articles?—Yes.

3853. That is a perfectly legal transaction, is it not?—I do not think it is legal, according to the Pawnbrokers Act.

3854. What clause do you think makes that illegal?—I have not read the Act recently, but I know the pawnbroker is not allowed to buy and sell in his pawnshop.

3855. Have you any recollection of the provision which makes it illegal for him to sell in his pawnshop?—I have not, but I know that his pawnshop is simply a place for taking in and giving out the pledges.

3856. Would it not be a benefit to the man who was pledging goods if the pawnbrokers could sell them for him, if he got a price that was satisfactory to the pledger, and they were bonâ fide sold in open market to customers?—If once you allow a principle of that kind, the spirit of pawning departs entirely.

3857. But is not the specific transaction a benefit to the person who pledges the goods?—It might be.

3858. The specific circumstance of having an article sold to a customer for him for its full value in the market, with his consent, must be of necessity an advantage to him, must it not?—That I do not know, because you would have put away a party's stock in the pawnshop for relieving some immediate want. I do not suppose the pawnbroker would give him more than cost price.

3859. That would depend upon the bargain between them, would it not?—Just so; but I think that that is likely to be the end of the transaction. It would be cost price to the shoemaker, a profit to the pawnbroker, and a new ticket for what was left.

3860. You are right. There seems to be this provision in this Act: "Nor shall any such person taking or having any goods or chattels in pledge make, or cause to be made, any contract or agreement with any person or persons offering to pledge or pledging the same with the owner or owners of the pledge, for the purchase, sale, or disposition of the said goods and chattels before the expiration of one whole year from the time of pawning or pledging the same"?—That is what I referred to.

3861. Then the Act seems to prevent two people who are perfectly intelligent from making an arrangement for their mutual advantage to sell the goods?—The Act strikes at that.

3862. Have you known cases where the names have been very illegibly written on the duplicates, leading to difficulties in the prosecutions?—I am sorry to have to refer to the Act so often without being able to give the Committee the clauses; but there is a clause which says, that on the tickets issued by the pawnbroker must be legibly written the name of the pledges, and also the name of the article, and whether the pledger is a householder or a lodger, and his or her address, as the case may be; and there is a penalty. In the event of its not being done, the party for prosecuting such cases, who is in Edinburgh the procurator fiscal for the burgh, would intervene, and cases of that kind are tried before the Justices of the Peace. Some months ago (within 12 months, I think, at any rate) a number of pawnbrokers were brought up in one day charged with this offence, and other offences, such as taking in pledges from children under the appointed age; and I recollect one case where an Irishman who had at one time kept a "wee pawn," and whose premises at that time were in Cowgate, one of the lowest localities in Edinburgh, was charged with issuing tickets not legibly written. A ticket was produced, and the clerk of the court attempted to read it and could not read it, and none of the gentlemen on the bench could read it. The pawnbroker himself was called forward to read it and he could not read it. His clerk was then called forward by him to read it, and she could not read it, and nobody has been able to read it yet. The "clerk" was a little girl that he called his "clerk." The result was that he was fined.

3863. Have you considered at all the expediency of not putting any name or address, or description on the duplicate which is given out, so that no person could know what the goods in pledge were, or deal with the pawn-ticket?—I think that the pawn-ticket cannot be too distinct, because you will observe that if a pawnbroker wishes to act wrongly, if he does not make the ticket clear and distinct, the criminal officers cannot trace the thief; they do not know where to go.

3864. If they got a ticket, and had the right to obtain information from the pawnbroker, they would only have to send to know what the article pledged was, would they?—But they would not get the thief if the ticket was so written that nobody could read it.

3865. They only get the ticket by finding it on the thief or in his custody, do they?—A great number of tickets are sold; parties commit a theft, and pawn the article; they may not get as much at the pawnshop as they would get by selling it, but it is a ready market.

3866. Would not that facility be prevented if the articles were not specified in the tickets, so that the purchaser could not purchase the ticket in that way?—I do not see of what use the ticket would be unless the article was specified in it. It is a duplicate of what the pawnbroker has got, and without the name of the pledger how would you know what it is pledged for, supposing the pledger died the next day.

3867. Mr. T. Hughes.] If you had the ticket you could go and say, "I wish to redeem that pledge," could you not?—Yes.

3868. That throws it upon the pawnbroker to produce it, does it not?—I do not see how, unless the name of the pledger was on the ticket, the pawnbroker would know what you came for; he might know by the number.

3869. Chairman.] The business of the Post Office is done upon that principle in remitting money, is it not; disclosing the name and address in the money order?—But there is a letter of ice.

3870. The person into whose hands the money er arrives does not, on the face of the order, get name and address of the sender, does he?— but I think that every one of those transac- is is done by numbers.

3871. We assume that there would be a cor- ponding number or indication on the ticket, would it not be a protection not to have the ne and address on the duplicate?—I do not that it would be any protection. It might vent people purchasing pawn-tickets, but I do see any other good which it could effect.

3872. Mr. T. Hughes.] What is the meaning "wee pawn;" is it an illegal pawn?—It is an gal pawn; a man opening a shop and lending ney on goods without any licence at all.

3873. Then he can be prosecuted criminally, he not?—He can.

3874. Is that system still in force in Edin- gh?—It was carried on very largely in nburgh at one time, but it is not so prevalent ; the police have, to a very great extent, put own.

3875. Mr. C. H. Mills.] You said that the ne amount was pledged every week, did you ?—Perhaps nearly the same amount; I say t the average amount of the pledges of the rer classes at the pawnshops would be about weekly.

3876. You attributed pledging to the payments he tallymen gradually reducing the working ses, and you said that that must go on increas- the amount they pawn; what did you mean that?—Of course, they will go and come, and l rise and fall, like others.

3877. But the weekly payments are fixed pay- nts, are they not?—Yes.

3878. If they absorb more of their wages than y actually want they must every week be reasing in the amount they pawn, I suppose? Yes, they are; and I believe they are often ven to terrible straits to meet those emer- ncies.

3879. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You say that the rking men of Edinburgh are in receipt of good ges, and do not do business with the pawn- ps?—The great bulk of them are, and do .

3880. I suppose it is the poorest and most im- vident classes who deal with them?—Yes, nerally what are known as the lapsing classes; ple gradually sinking.

3881. The generally vicious and intemperate? Mostly.

3882. Do you know how many pledges there in Edinburgh in a year?—I do not know; t I know that there are from 32 to 34 pawn- kers in Edinburgh.

3884. Can you tell us what the average value pledges in Edinburgh is?—No, but I know t there are, I would say, five times more low pledges than high ones, and perhaps more than that.

3885. What do you think is the effect of pawnbroking upon the lower portion of the community in Edinburgh?—I believe that they become poorer, and I believe that the man who gets their means is gradually becoming richer; I believe that the effect of pawnbroking upon the poor is to sink at last into pauperism those who indulge in it.

3886. You think that the influence of it is evil?—Certainly.

3887. And almost in no instances good?—I never knew anything of which it could not be said that there was some little good in it; I believe that there are times when even drunken people who make a practice of pawning for the purpose of getting whiskey, may pawn an article for a proper purpose.

3888. At all events, have you made up your mind that pawning for sums below 2 s. 6 d. should be illegal?—I have made up my mind that if it were possible to do away with pledges below 2 s. 6 d., it would be a great boon to the lower classes, provided that those pledges were made up of only one article.

3889. Mr. Plimsoll.] You have spoken of the money raised for the purposes of drinking as being raised for an improper purpose. Perhaps it would be better that they should not have the money for that purpose, but has it not occurred to you that all that money has to be taken back, and something with it, to the pawnbroker, shortly afterwards, so that if you deprived the pledger of the opportunity of getting the money by pledging, at least he would have the money with which he afterwards redeemed the pledge?—I scarcely understand the question.

3890. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You speak of the practice of splitting the pledges, are many of the pawnbrokers in Edinburgh accustomed to split pledges in the way that you have detailed to the Committee, with the view of extorting from the poor people more than they would otherwise get?—I do not know how many make a practice of doing it, but I believe that I shall speak within the truth when I say, that every pawnbroker who is now a licensed pawnbroker, and who has hitherto kept a "wee pawn" shop, is in the habit of doing it.

3891. How many of those are there in Edinburgh?—I do not know, but I know two myself.

3892. You think that a person who has kept a "wee pawn" shop would not deal honestly as a pawnbroker?—I will give you a case which came under my own personal knowledge. There is a man who kept a "wee pawn" shop in a village called Stonebridge in Edinburgh, and he is now a licensed pawnbroker in that same village; there was a woman who got into difficulties, and required to raise 5 s., and to get the 5 s. she carried a satin dress to this pawnbroker; she was unable to redeem it by the time the 12 months had expired, and she got it what is called "marked," and secured it for another three months; when she went back to redeem the dress, the pawnbroker told her that she had been tampering with the ticket, and that he had sold the satin dress, and he said that she could not get it. By my own advice she summoned him (because she had the ticket) to the justice of the peace court, where to her astonishment, the pawnbroker produced this satin dress, and gave it up to the woman by the order of the justices. He had already said that it was sold. He is a licensed pawnbroker at this hour in Edinburgh, who kept a "wee pawn" before he got a pawnbroker's license.

3893. Is that one of the two of whom you spoke?—Yes. Another who does it is the man who said in the Justices of the Peace Court that he could not read writing.

3894. You spoke about the privilege of inspecting the pawnbroker's books; is not that privilege restricted to pawns above 10 s.?—Yes, I think it is.

3895. Is not a pawnbroker bound to keep those pledges above 10 s. in a separate book, and separate and distinct from all other pledges?—Yes; but you will observe that it gives any inquisitive man who may say he wants to see what his article was sold for, the power to see all the articles sold in that month.

3896. He may see an article above 10 s., and all articles which may happen to be in that book, but that does not give him the privilege of inspecting the pawnbroker's book, because it merely refers to the pledges which happen to have been sold by auction?—Clearly.

3897. Colonel Beresford.] With regard to the division of the clothes, is the sum lent divided over the three articles, or is a lump lower sum given for the three articles?—It is divided over the three articles, and by that the pawnbroker gets three separate interests.

3898. But he divides the money?—Yes.

3899. Is it a common practice for working men to send their Sunday clothes as you call them to be pledged week after week all through the year?—I know women in Edinburgh, not a few who go as regularly to the pawn shop every Saturday and every Monday as the children go to school.

3900. Then at the rate of 3 d. a week the 5*s.* borrowed would cost 13 s. in the year, would it not?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HON. ACTON SMEE AYRTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. FRANCIS TURNER re-called; and further Examined.

Mr F. Turner. 14 July 1870.

3901. Chairman.] HAVE you any observations to offer upon the section of the Act relating to the forfeiting of pawned goods at the end of the year?—Yes. As regards goods above 10 s. it is clear that the pawner has the right to redeem, and the right to the surplus on sale; but on the wording of this Statute there is a doubt as to whether goods under 10 s. are or are not absolutely forfeited. Taking this section and the 20th section together, I think it is quite clear that after sale the pawner has no right to expect an account of that sale, because the matter would be of such small value that it would not be worth while to keep the rigid account which is required as to other pledges; the expense would be too great. But a doubt arises as to whether a pawner, going on the day after the year has expired, the pledge being still in the pawnbrokers' possession, is entitled to demand that pledge on the payment of the principal and interest. By the common law undoubtedly he would be so entitled, but on the wording of this section there is a doubt, and manifestly a doubt, which Sir Thomas Henry shared, as I gathered from his evidence, which I heard when the Committee last sat; and I know that it is pretty generally acted upon in practice. The notion is that there is an absolute forfeiture of goods under 10 s. My view of the law is, that it is not so; but if that be so, I should suggest that it would be desirable expressly to point it out by legislation, rather than leave it to implication, as it is now. You will see that the 17th clause is, "That all goods and chattels which shall be pawned or pledged shall be deemed forfeited, and may be sold at the expiration of one whole year, exclusive of the day whereon the goods and chattels were so pawned as aforesaid, and that all goods and chattels so forfeited, on which any sum above 10 s., and not exceeding 10 l., shall have been lent, shall be sold by public auction." That prescribes the mode of sale, but it does not, to my thinking, take away the pawner's common law right to redeem, supposing the pledge to remain in the pawnbroker's custody unsold.

3902. The difference would seem to be, then, according to your view, that goods under 10 s. may be sold by private contract when forfeited, but that goods above 10 s. must be sold by public auction, but that the legal incident as regards the goods is precisely the same?—Yes; and then the 20th section prescribes that the pawnbroker shall keep an account, and so on.

3904. What is your opinion with respect to sections 18 and 19?—Those sections direct that certain goods shall be sold separately, and they direct that, on notice being given, the pawnbrokers shall retain the goods for three months. This hardly seems to me to be necessary now. I think that, as to the 18th clause in country districts, that is practically a dead letter, although in London I know that it is not so. Then, as to the 19th clause, giving a three months' period of grace; that is, of course, subject to the same remark as I have made as to the daily periods of grace in regard to months.

3905. It makes everybody pay something, as it were, for a speculative right, instead of everybody paying for his own bargain if he wishes it? Just so.

3906. Your view is that if he wishes to make a new contract for three months' more, he ought to come and pay for it?—Yes, quite so; all those things tend to complicate the dealings between the parties. Of course the theory in all those provisions is, that it is necessary to take special care of the pawner.

3907. Then, would you have it left precise and absolute, so that each party should have a definite position?—Yes; and you might have the three days of grace as I suggested, with respect to the other matter.

3908. What should you suggest with regard to the 20th clause which relates to the keeping in a book an account of the sale of the goods by a pawnbroker?—The only thing which occurs to me upon that is that the pawnbroker should, I think, have expressly given to him the right of retainer or set off, so that if he has two pledges from the same person, and both those pledges have been sold, on one reading this section the pledger has a right to come and inspect the books, and if he finds a surplus on one and a deficit on the other, he is entitled to demand from the pawnbroker the payment of the surplus and leave the pawnbroker to get his deficit how he can. Of course the pawnbroker's right to the deficit remains at common law, and the pawnbroker could could sue the pawner for that deficit, and the pawner would be undefended with respect to it. Therefore, no injustice would be done by expressly giving the pawnbroker the right of set off.

Mr. F. Turner.

3909. Does the legal right of set off seem to be taken away by this section?— My notion is that it is not; but very recently, at Bow-street, before Mr. Vaughan, Sir Thomas Henry's colleague, the question arose, and Mr. Vaughan held that, although on principles of abstract justice there was no objection whatever to allowing the right of set off, yet he thought that the words of the Statute made each transaction separate and independent.

3910. Does the statutory set off apply to proceedings before magistrates?—His view was that it did not.

3911. That is generally admitted, is it not, by the law?—I should hardly go so far as that.

3912. Is not the law of set off a statutory law?—Yes, applying to all cases of mutual credit in the same rights.

3913. Does not that apply to proceedings before magistrates?—I am not aware that it has been held that it does not; and my theory would be that, as this is substantially for the recovery of a debt, all ordinary incidents regulating debts between parties would apply.

3914. Then, in your view, the magistrate's decision was wrong?—It is so, and the matter stands for argument before the Court of Queen's Bench, being still sub judice. I may say that different magistrates in the metropolitan district have come to diametrically opposite conclusions about it.

3915. You would have that cleared up, and if a party had had several dealings with a pawnbroker, you would have all those dealings thrown into a general account, the same as in ordinary dealings between bailees and mortgagees?—Yes. It seems to me, that if the pawner can pay, it is doing him a service rather than otherwise, to allow the pawnbroker to retain what the pawner is bound to pay, and to do it without the expenses of legal proceedings; because he has only to take out a summons in the county court. Provided that he has the pawner's address and can get at him in that way, he would get the money without any difficulty; but at an additional expense to the pawner.

3916. Your view of the law would carry the thing much further, because, if you put it on the same footing as the transactions of ordinary bailees of this kind, whenever there was a surplus, and the pawnbroker had any goods in pledge, he would be entitled to hold the goods in reduction of the loss on the other pledge, would he not?—No; because the surplus or deficit is not ascertained until after sale. It does not go so far as to allow the principle of tacking the security.

3918. With reference to clause 21, prescribing that the pawnbroker is not to purchase goods which are in his custody, has your attention been drawn to the provision in it which prohibits the pawnbroker from making any disposition of the goods whilst he holds them in his custody, though the pawner himself is not in a position to be the purchaser of the goods?—The intent is undoubtedly to prevent any evasion of the Statute, and to prevent any temptation on the part of the pawnbroker to violate his trust. The sale must be that of the pawner, but not of the pawnee.

3919. You mean that the pawner may sell his duplicate if he pleases, but he cannot have the goods sold through the agency of the pawnbroker during the 12 months?—Not through the agency of the pawnbroker; but I can see no objection to a transaction of this kind: the pawner comes into the pawnbroker's shop with his duplicate, bringing with him some person who wishes to purchase the goods; let those two come to any bargain they may wish to make about it.

3920. You will observe that this could not be done according to this Act, because the words are, that not merely "taking," but "having" any goods, he shall not make any disposition of them except by the act of the redemption of the pledge?—The words of the section are, "make or cause to be made, any contract or agreement with any person or persons offering." The pawnbroker simply standing by would not make, or cause to be made, any contract; he would simply produce the goods to the pawner, as he would be bound to do, and the pawner, and the purchaser from him standing by, would make their bargain.

3921. I wish to call your attention to the language of the section, "Nor shall any such person taking, or having any goods or chattels in pledge, make, or cause to be made, any contract." Surely it would be a violation of that law if the pawnbroker were having the goods in pledge, to be a party to a contract by which the pledger came there and caused the goods to be sold to third parties?—I do not think it would.

3922. Mr. T. Hughes.] At any rate, it is quite clear that the best way would be to allow the pledger to redeem, if he wishes to do so, and comes with a friend, and that leaves the present law as it stands, and is more simple, is it not?—That is so.

3923. Chairman.] Have you had your attention drawn to the French law, by which exactly the reverse is thought to be for the protection of the pledger, namely, that he should be at liberty during the duration of the pawn, to give notice to the pawnbroker to sell the goods for his benefit?—I have not had any special attention called to it.

3924. Which do you think would be the better arrangement, to keep this prohibitory law, or to introduce the French law?—I have not considered that.

3925. Does any question arise as to pledges not being taken from persons under 12 years of age?—I think the age should be uniform throughout the country; it is one age in London by the Police Act, and another age in the country, by the Pawnbrokers' Act.

3926. What limit of age would you suggest?—Perhaps, fourteen.

3927. Have you anything to add upon the clause requiring a pawnbroker to place a table of profits in the view of the parties?—I think we have ve anticip ated that in what I said as to placing e table upon the duplicate.

3928. Then you would have such a table as ople could clearly understand, and could im- diately apply the same as on the duplicate?—es.

3929. I think you desired to make some ob- rvation on clause 28?—Clause 28, as to urchwardens and overseers prosecuting, seems rdly necessary now; that is almost in total suse, I think.

3930. Chairman.] Clause 29 which disables tain persons from informing has been virtually pealed by the Evidence Act, has it not?—It has.

3931. With regard to clause 30, which enacts, at the Act ought not to extend to persons lend- g money at 5 per cent. without further profit, ve you any observation to make?—Of course, at was passed during the existence of the usury ws.

3932. That becomes unnecessary now, does it t?—Yes.

3933. Have you any observations to make with gard to clause 31?—You will find in many aces in the Act that this is repeated as it were. is said again and again of the executors, admin- rators, and assigns, and so on. That is by the neral clause, and then there are repeated actments to the same effect in the body of the ct itself. The Act might be very much short- ed if the penalties were put into one clause, or to a schedule.

3934. Have you considered the question, now at we have instituted county courts capable of aling with all transactions under 10 l., whether is desirable that the magistrate should have risdiction, or whether those cases should be eated as civil cases and disposed of in the county urts?—Where the object is simply for the re- very of money and goods, I think there would e great advantage in sending such cases to the unty courts, because, then you would get rid of l the difficulty of conflicting jurisdictions; and the county courts this question of set-off, of hich I speak, might be raised.

3935. Is this an exclusive jurisdiction given to ie magistrates?—No, it is not an exclusive risdiction.

3936. At present the county court has juris- iction as well as the magistrates?—Yes, but no wner having any cause to complain of a pawn- roker goes to a county court; he would go to a agistrate partly because it is quicker, and also ecause it is considerably cheaper.

3937. Mr. T. Hughes.] In certain cases the agistrates have criminal jurisdiction, have they ot, which the county court would not exercise?—Just so; therefore, whenever there is a penal lement in the offence charged, such as the im- roper detention of goods, that is quite proper o be within the jurisdiction of magistrates.

3938. Chairman.] Passing on to the Act of the 9th & 20th of the Queen, what observations ave you to make as to that?—Simply that that hould be incorporated with the new Act. That s the Act called "The Dolly Shop Act," for xtending the provisions of the Pawnbrokers Act o leaving shops.

3939. Do you understand that the effect of his Act, and the principal Act is, that no person, hough he be a pawnbroker, can carry on any usiness of lending money upon the security of oods deposited with him under 10 l., except in he manner provided by those Acts?—Yes.

3940. Neither a pawnbroker nor anybody else has any option of carrying on business in any other way under 10 l.?—I think so. Of course it would not apply to a person lending money casually, as one friend might lend to another; but whenever there is a carrying on business, it would apply.

Mr. F. Turner. 14 July 1870.

3941. The definition, I think, is, that of exercising the trade or business?—Yes.

3942. Mr. Whitwell.] That is to say, he must "keep a house, shop, or other place, for the purchase or sale of goods or chattels, or for taking in goods or chattels by way of security for money advanced thereon"?—Yes.

3943. Chairman.] Single transactions by a person who has no shop can be carried on, I presume?—Yes. A question might possibly arise something like what occasionally occurred under the old Bankruptcy Act, whether a man was a trader or not; whether he had sold some trifling article for profit, and so brought himself within the definition of a trader; but I do not think that any case of that kind has ever arisen in practice.

3944. Have any questions arisen respecting the responsibility for preserving against fire, goods which are pledged?—Yes. At present the pawner can only insure his own interest in the goods, the amount of principal which he has advanced, and the accruing interest, the consequence is, that whenever there is a fire, the pawners lose their property altogether, and there is frequently a distress and complaint about it. I may say that I have been asked three times this week by professional friends with respect to a fire which has occurred, I think, somewhere in the east end of London within the last few days. At present it is utterly impossible for the pawnbroker to take any care of the pawner's interest in the thing pledged.

3945. How would you deal with that: would you make him absolutely liable for fire, and leave him to insure with a certain addition for the supposed margin?—I would make it optional to the pawner whether he should have his goods insured or not.

3946. But if it be optional with the pawner, how is he to fix a value for his goods?—It must be done, I think, in some such way as this: let there be an insured and an uninsured rate upon each pledge, the insured and uninsured tickets being of different colours, so that there might be no mistake about it. Then, if the pawner chooses to insure, let him have the option of doing so.

3947. But how is the value of his pledge to be ascertained?—I think he would have to declare it at the time of pledging.

3948. But would it be right that the person pledging should have a right to fix his own value without the pawnbroker having any opinion in the matter; might not that lead to very serious results?—It might; but, at the same time, there would be this safeguard against it: the higher the value that the pawner declared, the more he would have to pay; and it would not be like the case of a person insuring for a large amount for the express purpose of committing arson himself, because he would have to take the chance of some other person, whose interest was directly the other way, committing arson.

3949. Still it would involve all those difficulties?—It would involve those difficulties; the matter has been more than once considered, and I believe the fire offices themselves are very much much opposed to it, because they say that it would make so many openings for fraud; at the same time one hears so much of the sufferings of the pawners in such cases, that one wishes to see some plan devised for preventing them.

Mr. F. Turner.

3950. Might not the amount insured be limited to some per-centage upon the amount advanced? —Possibly so; not exceeding, in any instance, double, as I should apprehend that the value of a thing pledged to the person who pledges it, is generally something like twice the money value advanced by the pawnbroker, with a view of selling it at second hand.

3951. Mr. Whitwell.] Then what security do you give to the pawner if the pawnbroker should not insure after having received a premium for insurance, and if a fire should come and destroy the property?—Then the pawnbroker would be absolutely liable.

3952. Chairman.] I suppose that the insurance office would take an insurance for 1,000*l.* from a pawner if he only borrowed a small sum upon it?—Yes, the insurance company might take large risks under special circumstances; but with the class of risks of which the majority of pawnbroking transactions consist, they would not be inclined to grant the policy.

3953. That would not apply to pawnbroking proper?—No.

3954. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Are there many fires in the year in the pawnbroking trade?—I am not aware; but my impression is that there are very few. Speaking simply from memory, I do remember reading of more than two; but I have never had them brought formally under my notice.

3955. It is not a very important question, is it?—Not as regards the number of instances; but whenever a fire does occur, one hears a wail from all the poor pawners in the neighbourhood.

3956. Chairman.] Have you considered the expediency of a provision allowing parties to make special contracts, apart from any general system of rules of pawnbroking?—I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of freedom of contract. At different times I have had under my notice (not in connection with pawnbroking) the difficulty which exists in disposing of bulky articles like furniture. From cases which I have known of warehousing furniture, it is manifest that the pawning rate is insufficient to cover the mere expense of warehousing, and therefore I think it would very often be an advantage to the pawner if he could make a special contract with a pawnbroker for that purpose; of course it is quite open to the pawnbroker to refuse to take them in, those bulky articles; and then, supposing that a man has a little furniture upon which he could raise money, the only thing that he could do with it would be to sell it outright to a broker, who would generally deal with him more hardly than a pawnbroker would, because it is the pawnbroker's interest to lend as much as he can, in order to make as large a profit by the interest as he can; in a sale, of course, a man has parted with his property altogether, and if he is better off next week than he was this, he must pay the retail profit upon the purchase of his own goods.

3957. Have you considered the best way of carrying out that opinion by legislation?—You might possibly start at a certain amount, and say that there should be no freedom of contract under 20*s.*, and then there should be some attempt at defining the class of articles with respect to which a special contract might be made. When you begin to consider the definition, then I admit that your great difficulties would begin; but you might say that an article of more than a certain cubical content should be dealt with by special contract.

3958. You would have, however, some sort of definition, like that which has been attempted in various ways as regards railway carrying and otherwise?—Yes, I quite admit that it is a matter of considerable difficulty, and that it would require very careful consideration before you could hope to frame a satisfactory definition.

3959. Do you know the provision in France by which persons are allowed to travel with a certain amount of baggage in their hands free? —We have something like that in England. Every third-class passenger is allowed 56 lbs. of luggage.

3960. That is his luggage; but I am speaking now of that which he is allowed to take himself free, apart from the weighted amount: are you aware that in France there is hung up in the railway stations, over the weighing place, a bag of certain dimensions, with a notice to the effect that you may take a package of that size?—I have never noticed that.

3961. Do you think that some attempt might be made at a definition on the principle of the Carriers Acts, or those Railway Acts which profess to regulate exempted goods?—Yes. Of course, it would be necessary to guard those special contracts in some way; and I think they should be exempt from stamp duty, or else if you make every one of them subject to a 6*d.* stamp duty, you will practically exclude all but practically large amounts.

3962. Mr. Whitwell.] Has your attention been drawn to auctioneers who, having periodical sales, receive goods during the interim, and make advances upon those goods; and do you consider that those persons are liable to the Pawnbrokers Act, and require a license?—That being a matter beyond 10*l.*, it does not come within the Pawnbrokers Act.

3963. But are you not aware that it is done under 10*l.* in all towns?—I hardly think that would be so. It might be a question of some nicety. On a number of facts taken together, it might possibly be held that the auctioneer had brought himself within the Pawnbrokers Act.

3964. Supposing that an auctioneer had given to him bonâ fide to sell in the course of his business two or three articles, and that he were to pay money on account of what they were to sell for, do you think that that would be a transaction within the Pawnbrokers Act?—Certainly not an instance of that kind; but there might be a course of dealing on the part of the auctioneer which would bring him very dangerously near the wind.

3965. Chairman.] If it was colourable for the purpose of making advances merely, and the goods were not delivered for present sale, do you think that it might come under the Act?—Yes.

3966. But if the goods were delivered for present sale, and money was advanced until the purchase money was received, then it would not be a colourable transaction?—No.

3967. Mr. Whitwell.] If an auctioneer advertises furniture sales, collecting goods in the mean time, advancing a certain portion on each article rticle which comes into his possession, obtaining reimbursement on the sales, and paying over ne balance to the individual, would he have been ble to do that under the auctioneer's license hen it was payable, or must he have had a awnbroker's license?—I do not think that ould have come within the Pawnbrokers' Act.

3968. Chairman.] Have you anything else to dd with reference to these Acts?—It is a ques- on before the magistrates whether the pawn- roker himself should not be a competent and ompellable witness. The proceeding is in all ases against the pawnbroker, and it may very ossibly be that the pawnbroker knows nothing bout it; yet the pawnbroker being possibly in ne position of a quasi criminal, cannot give evi- ence.

3969. If a suit or question arose in the county ourt, he could be examined as a witness, could e not?—Yes.

3970. And because the suit is carried on efore the magistrate, he cannot be examined as witness?—Quite so.

3971. And you would have that anomaly leared up?—Just so.

3972. Mr. C. H. Mills.] With regard to the ate which you have suggested, of a halfpenny er month for each 2 s. up to 1 l., that would be ncreasing the pressnt charge by 25 per cent., ould it not?—It would; only that the increased implicity, at any rate, for the smaller amounts, ould compensate for that.

3973. But might you not make it up to a half- enny on 3 s.?—Then it is not quite so con- enient an unit, I think.

3974. If you have a halfpenny on 2 s., and 1 d. or the ticket besides, it makes a very heavy harge for a small amount, does it not?—It oes.

3975. That would, in fact, make it 50 per ent. instead of 40 per cent.?—Taking the harge for tickets all round, of course there is a onsiderable reduction.

3976. On transactions up to 1 l., charging one alfpenny for 2 s., would come to 5 d. instead of d., and therefore it would be 25 per cent. in- rease upon the present charge, would it not?— t would be so.

3977. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You are the stand- ng counsel, I suppose, of the Pawnbrokers' As- ociation?—No, I am not. My practice from he pawnbrokers is very small; and anything vhich I have said has been the result of my un- iassed opinion.

3978. I suppose you have come here at their equest?—I was requested to attend, and I nderstood that my name had been mentioned o the Committee as having written a book which ad been placed in the Committee's hands, and hat the Committee had expressed either a wish r a willingness that I should be examined.

3979. Your evidence is quite in accordance with the views of the pawnbrokers?—I do not, in any degree, speak as their mouthpiece, nor even by consultation with them or any member of their body. The suggestions which I have made out are my own suggestions, whatever value or want of value they may have.

3980. Mr. C. H. Mills.] Would there be any objection to the pawnbroker taking out a more open or general policy under which any pledger might claim to declare his goods?—It would have to be done in some such a way as that.

3981. The pledger, of course, paying a pre- mium upon the excess of the pledge over the amount which he wished to declare?—It would have to be done by a floating policy of that kind, and the insurance offices do not look very favour- ably upon that kind of policy.

3982. But it is freed from that chance of arson, as you have pointed out, because the person who has the interest cannot get at the goods?—That is so; nevertheless, I believe that the offices are not at all favourable to such policies.

3983. Therefore the rate of insurance probably would be very high?—I think very probably it would.

3984. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I understand that you are against freedom of contract below 10 l., except as regards bulky articles?—Yes; I think on the whole the balance of testimony is that way.

3985. And you are in favour of freedom of contract with regard to bulky articles, because the present rate charged for them does not pay for the storage; is that so?—Exactly so, and therefore I believe they are seldom taken as pledges by pawnbrokers; but in cases apart from the pawnbroking which have come under my notice, I find that the mere charge for ware- housing is very much greater than the pawn- broker's charge for interest. I have one case in my mind at the present moment, where a good house of furniture, better than that of most pawners whose cases we are now considering, was stored, and I think in six months 50 per cent. of its value, or some very enormous proportion of its value, was eaten up by the mere charge for warehousing.

3986. Was it put in the hands of a pawnbroker? —No, it was merely stored and the charge for storage was enormously in excess of what the pawnbroker's charge for interest would have been.

3987. Was that by contract?—There was no special arrangement before the depositing or storing, and the depositee therefore charged what he thought reasonable. There was a dispute about the amount, and as is general in such cases, there was a quantity of evidence from the par- ticular trade to show that the charge was per- fectly reasonable.

3988. Was it taken into court?—It has not been taken into court, but it may be possibly.

3989. Do you not think that that was a robbery?—It was an exceedingly high charge, but the way in which it is put is this: those goods take up so much room; that room, if other- wise occupied, we could do such and such things with.

3990. What was the value of the furniture?— It was worth about 200 l.; that was the new value.

3991. I suppose that 200 l. worth of furniture would be stored in a room, not a tenth part of the size of the room in which we are now sitting?— I have not seen the room; it would depend upon the way in which it was packed.

3992. Then one of your reasons for supporting the better payment of the pawnbrokers is because 50 per cent. is charged for storing furniture in six months?—I do not quite say that; in the first place I say that I do not bind myself to the 50 per cent. I say that the charge was a very high one, but I do not pledge myself to the exact amount. Then I say that that is one case which has come under my knowledge; but I do not mean to say that such a charge is usual.

3993. I think, from your evidence at all events, it appears that, as the rate which the pawnbrokers get just now for storing furniture is not equal to what would be charged by a mere storekeeper we may assume that you would consider that the rate allowed for bulky articles should be double what it is; 20 per cent. for storing and 20 per cent. for interest?—I have not considered the exact amount.

Mr F. Turner.

3994. I think your evidence goes to show that the pawnbrokers do not get so much for interest as would pay for storing; and, therefore, if they were to get what they should get for storing and interest, besides, it would amount to 40 per cent.?—I do not pledge myself to 40 per cent.; I say that there must be some extra charge for storing, and that I should say the parties might be left to settle between themselves. I do not pretend to say what the amount would be. If you take a man's watch, for instance, the warehousing of that is a very small matter; but if you take a chest of drawers it is a very serious matter.

3995. You say that the pawnbrokers have no doubt the power to refuse it?—No doubt.

3996. And your evidence is on behalf of the party pawning; that if the pawnbroker refuses the pawner has no other recourse, if he wishes to have the money, than to sell?—Exactly.

3997. But you say that the person purchasing would deal hardly with him?—Yes, at least, so far as I have had an opportunity of observing.

3998. That party purchasing has freedom of contract, has he not?—No doubt.

3999. And you say that he would not do full justice to the party selling?—I do not say that; I say that it is more for the interest of the person who wants to raise money for a temporary purpose, that he should be free to pledge as he is now free to sell. By refusing freedom of contract in making a pledge, you do not prevent freedom of contract altogether, because you do not exclude the owner of the property from selling it. My observation goes to this: that by refusing to allow freedom of contract to the pledger you drive him to sell, and therefore you put him in a less advantageous position than he would otherwise be in.

4000. Then, although they do business with a gentleman who has freedom of contract, you have no confidence that that gentleman having freedom of contract would do justice to the person selling?—Each man makes his own bargain; but there is no friendship in business. There is this difference, that the purchaser acquires an absolute property in the goods, whereas, if the goods be pledged, they remain the property of the pledger, and supposing that the pledger does not get so large an advance as he is intitled to, it is all the easier for him to pay it back; but if he once sells the goods for less than they are worth, all his claim to them is gone.

4001. You say that parties purchasing under those circumstances would deal hardly with the seller; is it not the fact, that the pawnbrokers advance on every article according to the value which it will bring in the market?—No doubt.

4002. Then do you think that any person dealing with a pawnbroker, or dealing with a man who is under freedom of contract, would be placed in a worse position?—That is a matter of practice about which each man must, of course, be guided by his own observation. I can only say that, from such matters as have come under my notice, the forced sale to a broker is much less advantageous to the person wanting money for a temporary purpose, than a transaction of pledge.

4003. Mr. Whitwell.] Do you not think that you have exhausted the subject, and that all you want is to get an additional number of persons introduced who shall make a bargain under freedom of contract?—That is all I advocate.

4004. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Are not all auction sales of pawnbrobers forced sales?—Yes; but the pawner has 10 or 15 months to turn himself round, and find means to redeem the pledge. Evidence has been given before this Committee to show that 95 per cent. of the pawners do redeem within the time. Therefore, while 5 per cent. of the persons might suffer, 95 per cent. would be benefited by it.

4005. But do you not think that when a party is obliged to raise money upon an article upon which he is paying 40 per cent. interest, it is better to sell it at once?—I think it should be left to the party to elect which is most to his interest. By allowing him to pledge you do not take away his right to sell, but you give him an additional remedy.

4006. Do you not think that people often get into difficulties by a false hope, which is never realised?—I am afraid that is so.

4007. Do you not know that gentlemen of landed property who get into difficulties and begin borrowing, and paying 5 per cent. for their money, sometimes find that they exhaust their principal, and have to sell their estates?—Yes; but they would feel it a very great hardship if you said, "You shall sell your land and not mortgage it."

4008. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Taking this principle which you have just been arguing, if it was carried out according to the idea of the honourble Member for Dumbarton, that is to say, that it is dangerous to lend money for fear that it should have evil consequences, it would stop pawnbroking and mortgaging altogether, would it not?—Yes.

4009. Supposing that that principle were to be applied to the working classes, do you not think that it should be applied to the upper classes as well, so as to prevent a man borrowing money on his estate?—Certainly.

Mr. Robert Bruce Johnston, W. S., called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. B. Johnston.

4010. Mr. Whitwell.] I believe you are a Writer to the Signet and Procurator Fiscal to the city of Edinburgh?—I am.

4011. Will you inform the Committee what are your special duties as Procurator Fiscal, so that they may be acquainted with the circumstances under which you have been brought into connection with the pawnbroking trade?—I am Procurator Fiscal, or Public Prosecutor, in Edinburgh in all criminal cases of more importance than mere police cases; but I am also Procurator Fiscal in the Justice of the Peace Court, and under the existing Pawnbrokers Acts any prosecutions against pawnbrokers for contraventions, have proceeded at my instance as prosecutor in the Justice of Peace Court.

4012. Then, do all breakers of the law under the Pawnbroking Acts in Edinburgh come under your our notice in one way or the other?—I can arcely say that; I should think that a very nall proportion of them ever come under my tice; and I have only prosecuted in those ses which have incidentally been brought under y notice as public prosecutor in criminal mat- rs. I have never prosecuted any pawnbroker cept when a contravention came under my tice incidentally as prosecutor in criminal tters.

4013. Mr. Orr Ewing.] That is to say, the wners would never give any information when ey had been imposed upon?—I cannot say that her. I have had several complaints made by wners, but the difficulties attending prose- tions in such cases are so great, that I have ver taken up any of them.

4014. Mr. Whitwell.] Will you define more rticularly in what cases you are engaged in nich the Pawnbroking Acts come under your tice?—Cases of theft and robbery.

4015. In those cases of theft are the pawn- okers often brought into court?—Not so fre- ently in Edinburgh as appears to be the case in lasgow from the evidence of a previous witness, think Mr. Hector, but they are to a great ex- t.

4016. Do you find that in Edinburgh as in ner places stolen goods are habitually taken to wnbrokers?—I am quite satisfied that they are a very great extent.

4017. In the prosecutions in which you are gaged, the pawnbrokers you say are not often lled as witnesses? — Whenever the article len has been recovered from a pawnbroker, he his assistant necessarily is a witness; there are ny cases, however, in which incidentally it trans- res that stolen property has been pledged, but that len property may not be the subject of the pro- cution then under investigation, in which case course the pawnbroker or his assistant is not a tness.

4018. The chief police magistrate for London e other day stated, that never a day occurred which pawnbrokers or their assistants were t called as witnesses in cases of larceny before m; I suppose that does not occur in Edinburgh the same extent?—I believe it does in the lice court, but of that I have no cognisance. ll cases are remitted from the police court to e as procurator fiscal, in which two previous nvictions have taken place, and also all serious ses; but all the thefts when the conviction is for first or second offence, and more petty offences, finally disposed of in the police court, and I ow nothing of them.

4019. Do you consider from your position as ocurator fiscal, and from your acquaintance with e law, that there are certain parts in the law nich require alteration?—I do.

4020. Will you point them out?—I may state at I have had considerable opportunity of ob- ving the practical working of the pawnbroking stem in the capacity which I have mentioned, d particularly in its bearing upon the social d moral well being of the community. I, my- f, believe that next to compulsory education, ere is no measure which will have greater effect diminishing intemperance than the prohibition all small pledges.

4021. To what amount would you limit the wer of pledging?—Personally, I think it would no harm to any class of the community if you were to prohibit all advances under 5*s.*; but I would be content if 2*s.* 6*d.* or 3*s.* were made the minimum.

4022. On what grounds do you recommend so great an alteration in the law?—For one reason, I think that no one's necessities can be so great as that they can possibly be relieved to any ap- preciable extent by so paltry an advance as 2*s.* 6*d.* I am quite of opinion that the pawn- broking system is a great benefit to the country at large, and is a necessity. If rightly worked, it is a benefit even to many of the better classes, and it is a benefit to the labouring poor; but if there is any honest and industrious person who requires an advance because he is temporarily out of em- ploy, I cannot conceive that he has not at least so much property as will enable him to ob- tain an advance of more than 3*s.* Of course I do not speak of England at all, and I believe to a certain extent the habits of the people differ from those in Edinburgh, but in Scotland there is no doubt that criminal authorities know well that the great bulk of the advances obtained under 3*s.* go to the public-house, or is the produce of stolen property.

4023. That is a conclusion which ought to be based upon information or evidence, ought it not? —If you mean statistical information, I think it is impossible to obtain it. I come to the conclu- sion for this reason: I observe that previous wit- nesses in London, especially in the trade, have commented upon the actual proportion of the stolen property which has been recovered, or rather which, as they say, has been pledged with them during a certain period. One gentleman, Mr. Dicker, says, that out of 1,334,011 pledges in seven years, 53 only were cases of stolen pro- perty; and another——

4024. Would you state that the relative pro- portion of stolen property pledged in Scotland was very much larger than what it is represented to be in England?—Certainly, and for this ob- vious reason; those figures are given as the result ascertained only by the amount of stolen pro- perty recovered. That forms an infinitesimal proportion of the actual stolen property pledged. I argue in this way; it is well known that the vast proportion of cases in which information is given to the police, is not followed by a conviction; in other words, in Edinburgh, in cases in which information has been given to the police, only about 20 per cent. result in convictions. In addi- tion to that, from general observation as public prosecutor, I am quite satisfied that there is a very large number of cases in which no information is ever given to the police, for various reasons, either because the fact of the theft is not dis- covered by the owner of the property, or being discovered, he will not be bothered in the mat- ter, or does not wish to expose the delinquent, and declines to give information ——

4025. Do you mean that the pawnbrokers of Edinburgh refuse to give information?—Cer- tainly not; I make no imputation against them; I speak of the party whose property is stolen; and it is well known that a great proportion of articles which form at least the subject of small pledges, are un-identifiable, and cannot be distin- guished from others, and therefore cannot possibly be recovered from the pawnbrokers; we have such cases constantly before us.

4026. Might it not be a natural conclusion, that if only 20 per cent. are convicted, those arti- cles are not pledged at the pawnbrokers, but are disposed of another way?—Not necessarily for the reasons which I have stated.

Mr. R. B. Johnston.

14 July 1870.

4027. Are there not a number of receiving shops in Edinburgh which receive those small articles?—There are what are called small brokers, or "wee pawns," but by the Act of the 19 & 20 Vict., as I read it, they are in the position of pawnbrokers, and are subject to all the provisions of the Pawnbroking Act. By the Police Act they are not bound to keep those goods for more than seven days, and in point of practice they very seldom do so; so that you will see that there is a very small opportunity for recovering those articles.

4028. Are a number of those "wee pawns" still in existence in Edinburgh?—A great many.

4030. Mr. Whitwell.] Must the Committee draw this conclusion from your evidence, that the number of articles discovered being only 20 per cent. of those stolen, that is a reason why so many of the small articles pawned are the results of robbery?—No; I think you misunderstand me. I do not mean that that conclusion should be drawn. What I said was, that the per-centage of cases in which informations have been given to the police, and convictions have followed, is not large, being in Edinburgh only 20 per cent.; but besides those, there is good ground for believing that there are many cases of theft none of which come to the knowledge of the police, and some of which are never discovered even by the owners of the stolen property. I shall instance a case which came under my knowledge only yesterday. A criminal officer in plain clothes happened to be in a pawnbroker's shop when a young man came in and pledged two silk handkerchiefs. They seemed to the officer to be quite new, and he remarked a look of hesitation about this young man, and followed him, not by any means coming to the conclusion that they were stolen. When the young man got out of the shop he tore the ticket, which of itself was not a very good feature in the case, and so the officer followed him. In a few minutes he entered a large haberdasher shop and put off his cap, showing that he was one of the assistants in the shop. The officer went in, and spoke to the master, and the young man was taken aside by the master. He denied all complicity in the affair, but he was then brought before the officer, who stated that he had seen the thing; and the young man then broke down and admitted it. Now that, as I say, is a case of a theft, which never, but for that mere accident, would have come to the knowledge of the owner of the property, and there are many of those cases. I believe that, generally speaking, the instances of the more valuable description of property being pawned, especially where the articles can be easily identified, are not numerous, such property being usually disposed of to resetters, in a more secret and effectual way. But there is an immense number of articles which can be as safely and easily disposed of in the pawnshop as in any other way, namely, all common articles which cannot be distinguished from others, such as blankets, pieces of cloth, various articles of body clothing, tools, &c. Many of those, no doubt, are stolen and pawned, and I say that, from the experience which I have had, and which enables me to conclude that there are, in point of fact, many cases of stolen property in which the articles find their way to the pawnshops, and no information is ever given to the police, or no thief is ever taken, and no conviction is ever obtained.

4031. You remark that the conclusions which you are now drawing are very different from what would be drawn in this country; the articles which are pledged are generally pledged by the lower classes, comprising those special articles to which you have alluded, but they are pledged by themselves; does the robbery of those articles, by one workman from another, exist in Edinburgh to the extent which you describe?—I do not say that by any means the larger proportion of such articles as I have described are stolen; very far from it. I think that a far larger proportion are pledged by the lowest classes, the idle and intemperate, solely for the purpose of obtaining drink.

4032. Do you propose that there should be no article pledged under 2*s.* 6*d.*, because the articles pledged under 2*s.* 6*d.* are generally stolen articles, or articles pledged for the purpose of obtaining liquor?—Very much more for the latter. I wish that to be understood. I do not mean to say that there are very many stolen articles pledged, but that there are many, and more than some witnesses here seemed to imagine.

4033. Are you so far acquainted with the wants of the poor as to know that many a poor man is obliged to go to a pawnbroker, and pledge an article for a sum under 2*s.* 6*d.*?—I cannot say that I speak there from personal contact with the poorer classes; but I cannot imagine such a case unless under very peculiar circumstances; and then I come to the conclusion which I have stated, from my knowledge of the fact, that in the great majority of those cases the produce of the pledge is at once taken to the public-house. I have that from criminal officers, who are coming in contact with the poor every day.

4034. That is one of the changes which you would propose; what other change would you suggest in the law?—I think that that of itself is not sufficient, unless you have some check in the form, say, of an inspector. I think it would be a very valuable thing to appoint an inspector under this Act. You have inspectors under the Factory Acts and Workshops Act, and Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, and almost every public Act, and here is admittedly an Act which requires to be fully and strictly guarded for the protection of the public, and therefore it is, I think, an Act which, perhaps, more than most others, requires the appointment of an officer, for the express purpose of seeing that it is properly administered.

4035. What should be the duties of the person appointed as an inspector?—He should, of course, have the power which at present is in the hands of the police in Edinburgh under the Police Act (which, I believe, is not the case in London), of entering pawnshops at any time. He could then witness the transactions, and I think that the mere knowledge of the fact that such an inspecr might appear at any time would go a long ty to prevent any sort of imposition or unfair aling towards the public. I do not mean to y that that exists to a great extent, but, just in all other trades or even professions, I think ere can be no doubt that there are unscrupulous d dishonest pawnbrokers. I do not think that ey are singular in that respect. I believe that, eaking for Edinburgh, there are several pawnokers who conduct their business in a most exceptionable manner, conforming to the very tter to the provisions of the existing Act. ose, however, are few in number. There are hers, I believe, who equally conduct their siness in a thoroughly honest way, but who d difficulties in carrying out the whole prosions of the existing Act; but again there are me of whom I have the best reason to know at they do not act in all respects as they ought wards the public; and it is in preventing that at I think those inspectors would be of great vice.

4036. You would give the inspector power, I esume, to examine books and view pledges?—rtainly.

4037. And to require an account of any transtions which he wishes to investigate?—Certnly; and to give information to such person might be appointed to prosecute.

4038. Because there are some pawnbrokers o do not conduct their business properly, do u think that we should be authorised to remmend that respectable businesses should be spected by an official inspector?—Yes, on the me principle as the Factory Act. If the egislature has thought fit to check the largest anufacturers in the country by such an inspector, cannot see any objection to the appointment of person to protect the poor classes.

4039. Is not the Factory Act inspector apinted to inspect the employment of children ecially?—To see that the manufacturer does t act unfairly towards those children and overork them.

4040. Does not the Pawnbrokers Act prohibit ildren from pledging goods?—It does, in Edinrgh, under 12 years of age.

4041. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do not the factory inectors also take under their surveillance women well as children?—Certainly, of all ages; and der the Workshops Act, too.

4042. Mr. Whitwell.] What other recommendations have you to make?—There is one hich has occurred to myself; I do not know at it will find much favour, but I think it ight be of some service. A great deal has been id as to the giving of fictitious names and adresses. I believe it to be quite true that in a reat number of cases fictitious names are given en by members of all classes of the community; but I would propose to impose a penalty on such members of the public as chose to edge articles under false names and addresses. y reason for making that proposal is this: I elieve in the interest of the better class of the awnbroking trade, that the abolition of this stem of low pledging is the first thing which ill elevate the standing and character of the ade. At present pawnbroking is looked upon ith reproach by everybody, and I believe at the real reason is because the public know at when people have stolen property, they e apt to resort to the pawnbroker to get d of it; and that when they wish drink, and have no means of obtaining it, they will pawn their last article of clothing, if necessary, to get it. If, therefore, the character and standing of the trade were raised in the way which I have suggested, I do not think that people would have the same objection which they now have of pledging in their real names. Nobody can maintain for a moment that to pawn an article is an immoral thing. I see that a previous witness suggests that the reason of pledgers using false names is, that they are afraid to be thought poor. If it be said that it is because they do not like to be thought poor, I do not quite see the force of that, supposing the trade to be respectable; and it can only be thought poor by the pawnbroker, while if a man is really poor, I suppose there are other people who know it before his pawnbroker; his tradesman must know it. I do not see any objection to a man transacting his business with a pawnbroker with perfect privacy if he wishes to do so. If a man goes to his banker or insurance office, to get an advance because he wants money, it is known to the banker or to the insurance office that he frequently does so, because he is in difficulties, and therefore why the poorer class, or any class, should object to go openly and give their real name in transacting a matter of this kind, I cannot see; it is a peculiar trade, and one in which it is admittedly the duty of the Legislature to interfere; and I submit that mere fact itself should make it requisite that parties should give their real names and addresses.

4043. Would you also impose a penalty upon the pawnbroker who did not give the real name of the party as given to him?—Certainly; that is so at present.

4044. Mr. T. Hughes.] You would impose a penalty on the pawner for not giving his right name as well?—I would; one great benefit to be derived from that would be, that it would make it very much easier to trace stolen property, because, whenever the public knew that the penalty was imposed upon pledging in a false name, it would be a check I believe even upon the thief. Parties would not resort to the pawnbroker so frequently when they knew they had to go through that ordeal, and that they might be detained by the inspector if they did not give a satisfactory account of themselves.

4045. How would you carry out the plan which you have recommended in a case where a pawnbroker received a thousand pledges in the course of one evening; where the pawnbroker cannot know whether the man gives a right name or not; and how can the pawnbroker if the pledger never redeems the pledge, and never appears again, know who it was that pledged it, and whether it was a false name; and how could a prosecution be conducted against a man whom he has never seen except on that evening?—If I understand the question aright, the answer would be this: that of course it does not necessarily follow that in every case a party would give his real name, or that if he did not give it he would be prosecuted. That would depend entirely upon whether the circumstances of the case were sufficient to enable a prosecution to be brought; for example, in a town like Edinburgh (it may not be so easy in London), nobody could systematically go and pawn from day to day under a false name, and as a rule, pawnbrokers have their own customers, and know them so well that they never ask questions. They know them under false names, as for instance, John Smith, and they sometimes take down the name without ever asking it; that is a common practice.

Mr. R. B. Johnston.

4046. Mr. Whitwell.] What other suggestions do you wish to make to the Committee?—I think that, in Scotland at any rate, pawnbrokers should be licensed just as under the Public Houses Act; publicans are licensed by magistrates, and get a certificate before they get their license from the excise.

4047. Would you suggest that the license should be for 12 months, renewable at the expiration of 12 months?—I would; with a power to the magistrates not to renew it in the event of repeated convictions for contraventions of the Act.

4048. Would you give power to the magistrates to withdraw the license at any time on a breach of the law?—Not except at the period of the renewal. I should be disposed also to license the premises, because all premises are not equally suitable for pawnbroking. I know of instances where the business of a pawnbroker having been started in what is called a common stair in Scotland, the effect has been so seriously to depreciate the value of the neighbouring property as to be the cause of great loss to the proprietors. I do not think such places should be licensed; I think the building should be suitable.

4049. Would you give power, on application for a license to the persons residing in the neighbourhood of the proposed pawnshop to object?—I would give persons residing in the neighbourhood power to be heard for their interest, just as is the case under the Public Houses Act.

4050. Have you any other suggestions to make?—In Edinburgh there are very few pawnbrokers who observe the regulations of the present Act in regard to auction sales. As a rule, those auction sales are conducted on the pawnbroker's own premises, upon previous advertisements in a Conservative paper not likely to attract the most attention.

4051. Do you mean by "Conservative" the paper with the smallest circulation?—With the smallest circulation among the class likely to attend pawnbroking sales. I have brought a specimen of an advertisement (handing in a newspaper) that you may see the way in which they proceed.

4052. Then the pledges are not sold, as in London, by some well-known auctioneer at his public sale rooms, but they are sold generally at the pawnbrokers own establishments?—They are sold frequently at the pawnbroker's own establishments, and, as I am most credibly informed, no one attends but the pawnbrokers. The sale is a mere mockery. The whole of the goods, in such cases, are put into one lot, and knocked down at the first bid to the pawnbroker.

4053. Do you mean to say that each pledge is not entered in a book, with the value at which it is sold?—No; the pawnbroker, of course, in some form must make up an account; but he himself fixes the price, as it were, obtained for each article.

4054. Have you ever attended one of those sales?—Never.

4055. Then your are not speaking at all from own your information?—Not personally.

4056. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Does this evidence which you are now giving us in reference to not keeping books, and not selling pledges separately, apply to the best pawnbrokers in Edinburgh, because you told us a short time since that some of them tried to carry out the law in every respect?—Certainly, some of them do, and some of them succeed. I did not say that any pawnbroker did not keep books. We were only talking of the practice of auction sales. There is a printed catalogue made out, I understand, specifically, but article by article is not gone over and exposed at the public sales as entered in that catalogue.

4057. Mr. Whitwell.] Are the goods sold in a lump, so many lots together?—Yes.

4058. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is that common?—It is quite common.

4059. Mr. Whitwell.] Are you sufficiently conversant with this establishment which advertises in this form, as the South Bridge Pawnbroking Company, to know whether it is one of the respectable establishments?—I am not personally acquainted with it; I was never in it.

4060. But you are able to say that it is the practice to sell the pledges on the premises of the pawnbroker?—Certainly, in most cases.

4061. Are they generally sold by the same auctioneer?—The same auctioneer.

4062. The other information which you have given us as to the mode of sale is simply from information you have received from other quarters?—Exactly.

4063. What would you suggest as to the mode to be adopted in future?—That all sales by auction should be conducted by one auctioneer, to be appointed for the purpose by the magistrates, or the sheriff, or some responsible party; and that the auctioneer should conduct those sales statedly, say once a month, on his own premises, where all the different pawnbrokers might send their goods, as is done here, at present.

4064. Mr. T. Hughes.] Do all those pawnbrokers in Edinburgh break the law now?—They at least practically evade it.

4065. The present law, as it appears to me, should be strong enough to stop this practice; is it not so?—It is very difficult. Of course, anything which I have to do in this way, as I said before, comes in merely incidentally. If I were to devote my time and attention to searching out cases of contravention and prosecuting pawnbrokers, of course more might be done.

4066. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you not hold the official position to do so?—I have the power, perhaps, but I am under no obligation, and would not think it expedient.

4067. Do you think that you are performing your duty if you are the party who ought to take these cases into court if you do not do it?—Certainly not, if I do not prosecute where I ought to do so; but besides, there are great difficulties in the way of working the present Act. Even such prosecutions as I have brought have been brought with great difficulty, and under great opposition, and very nearly successful opposition, owing to the unworkable means for prosecuting in Scotland under this Act, which is much more an English Act, and has clauses which are not applicable to Scotland, as I will explain if the Committee desire it.

4068. Mr. Whitwell.] What advantage would arise from making the law more stringent if the public official having a more stringent law did not put it in practice?—I do not say that I would not prosecute under such circumstances. If I were satisfied that the Act enabled me to bring a good od case brought under my notice, and which ould result in a conviction, I would consider it y duty to do so; and I have prosecuted in all ses in which I have thought that I could reonably expect a conviction.

4069. Mr. Orr Ewing.] The Act is perfectly ear as to how property should be sold when wned above 10*s.*, is it not?—I am not sure that is, with all deference. I am not quite sure hether the Act is framed so as to meet the parular case to which I have referred. I do not ink that there is anything in any of the clauses hich expressly meets the case which I have it of a pawnbroker's selling in slump, or selling his own premises. As I am informed, he akes an entry of each sale; but as the goods e sold in slump, it is not a true entry in detail. would in any case be very difficult to prove that did not truly enter the sales in a book, and then should have to prove that the value that he ntered was not the true value obtained.

4070. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Did I underand you correctly, when I understood that you eant that the whole of the goods were put up bulk, and knocked down in bulk; and that the awnbroker had a fictitious sale on his own preises, there being no separate account kept of ch pledge; and that, in point of fact, it was an vasion of the law altogether?—It is so, I think; ut I would not call it a fictitious sale; nor do I y that the pawnbroker does not keep an acount.

4071. Then what kind of account does the awnbroker or the auctioneer keep, or how does e auctioneer put the goods up?—There is a atalogue of the goods prepared beforehand, and have no doubt that in point of fact, if the pubc attended in numbers, they could compel the awnbroker or the auctioneer as representing im, to put up the goods piecemeal; but the pubc do not, in point of fact, attend.

4072. Is it an open sale?—It is an open sale the pawnbroker's own room, where the public o not attend.

4073. Have you ever attended those sales?—ever.

4074. You know nothing about them of your wn knowledge?—Except that I am the head of public department, and my subordinates inrm me on these matters.

4075. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Is there a regur auctioneer?—There is a regular licensed uctioneer, who, if I am rightly informed, himelf condemns the system as a mockery.

4076. Mr. T. Hughes.] In fact this list hich is made out with the prices marked oppoite, is merely for the purpose of nominally comlying with the Act, whereas the sale is really a ictitious one?—Precisely; but because he does pparently observe the Act, you will observe the ifficulty I am under in prosecuting.

4077. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you any suggestion to make as to giving the overplus on the ale of an article to the pledger?—I think the verplus ought to be returned; I have known ases where the overplus is considerable. I do not say that the pawnbroker makes large profits, either by overplus or higher rates of interest, or anything else, and I do not say a word against the rates being increased, if it is right that the pawnbrokers should get more money; but I heard a witness say that the return of the overplus was not very workable, owing to the failure of giving the right name. That seems to be another reason why the real name should be insisted upon, so that the pawnbroker who has an appreciable overplus might have the opportunity of sending notice to the owner.

4078. Have you any other suggestion to make besides that?—I would suggest that pawnbrokers should not be allowed to buy goods, even at auctions. I do not see the benefit of it; it would be better if they were not competitors; at present they can buy.

4079. But if the pawnbrokers are really willing to give more than the public, is it not really to the interest of the pledger that they should buy at the auction?—I would not object to that if the system which I suggest were carried out, and there were an open auction, not on the pawnbrokers own premises.

4080. Mr. T. Hughes.] You must allow the man to put a reserved price, must you not?—Yes. I think also that the table of rates should be so constructed as to be intelligible to the very poorest of the people who can read, and that it should be printed on the back of the ticket.

4081. Have you any other suggestion to make?—I think that farthings should be abolished.

4082. Even though it was the interest of the public that the farthings should be retained, you would abolish them?—If I could be satisfied of that, I should certainly never propose to abolish them. I would retain the "H" and "L," especially if the real name and address were given, because they certainly afford an additional means of identifying property, and discovering the real pledgers. Everything helps, and I would retain the accurate description of the property as presently provided for.

4083. You would not alter the Act in that respect?—No. I should like to instance a case as to the accurate description of pledges: A criminal officer told me only yesterday that the police had information of a crimson merino dress having been stolen from a large self-contained house in Edinburgh. On going to the pawnbrokers, he looked over the book, and he saw entered that day a winsey dress. He would have been quite justified in passing that over as certainly not being the crimson merino dress of which he was in search; but as it happened to be the only dress that day, he asked to see it, and it turned out to be the very crimson dress which had been stolen. That is an instance of the necessity for a pawnbroker entering most carefully a description of the article, because "a coat" gives no information at all; "a black frock coat" always helps, and it certainly shortens the labour of the official who has to search the pawnbroker's books.

4084. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Was it a respectable pawnbroker who took in that article?—I do not know which pawnbroker it was; but I have no doubt that other pawnbrokers would have done that.

4085. Would he give that wrong description?—That would depend very much upon the assistant who was there at the time. I could show you specimens of tickets which would surprise you more than that (handing a ticket to the honourable Member).

4086. Mr. Whitwell.] That you propose to obviate by having the article accurately described, as at present enjoined by the Act?—Yes.

4087. Have you any other suggestion to make to the Committee?—I think it is worthy of the consideration of the Committee, although I do not offer any very strong opinion upon the subject, whether the selling of pawn-tickets by the pawner should not be prohibited, because that, again, undoubtedly tends to frustrate the means of discovering the real pledger; and if the holder cannot redeem, if he has not the means to redeem, he can very easily, I should think, get a purchaser to go and redeem for him. It only gives the public a little more trouble.

Mr. R. B. Johnston.

14 July 1870.

4088. Mr. T. Hughes.] It would limit the power of the poor of dealing with their own property very considerably, would it not?—To that extent it would; but not, I think, if you were to abolish the low pledges.

4089. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you any other suggestion to make to the Committee?—I know the respectable part of the trade in Edinburgh consider that the license duty should be increased. One member of the trade mentioned to me a sum, which, I must say, I never could agree with, viz., 50 l.

4090. Of course that would have to be paid eventually by the persons who pledged articles?—Only in the same sense in which it may be said that a lawyer gets it from his clients. There is one other serious objection to the present working of the Act on the part of many pawnbrokers, and that is the splitting up of articles.

4091. What evidence can you give the Committee upon that subject?—Here are just two cases which my officer brought to me yesterday. A woman pledges a pair of tweed trousers, 4 s. 6 d. being advanced; a blue blouse and frock together, 4 s. 6 d. advanced, and a piece of print, 4 d. If the ticket had been of the proper size (which, I think, it ought to be for the price charged upon it, or if it is not, let the price be increased), the whole of those articles might have gone, and I think, under the Act, should have gone on one ticket, but they are all separate. Upon the piece of print, which is put by itself, there is an advance of 4 d., and, of course, a separate ticket. Here is another case of the same pawnproker's; a tweed suit, a coat, vest, and trousers, all pledged, and three tickets given for them, and I am told that that is exceedingly common.

4092. Mr. Alderman Carter.] When were those pledged?—I have the date; it is the 11th of the current month; but I do not know the pawnbroker.

4093. Have you seen the tickets?—No; but I got that from my own officer.

4094. Mr. Whitwell.] You do not know the amount advanced upon the suit?—I do not.

4095. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Did the parties pledging complain to you?—Not at all.

4095*. Do you know whether this separation took place at the instance of the pawnbroker or at the instance of the party pledging?—I cannot say.

4096. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you think it is likely that the party pledging would ask the pawnbroker to divide the pledges into three?—Not if he was at all disposed to regard his own interest.

4097. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But he might wish to redeem one and leave the other, might he not?—He could do that all the same if one ticket had been given, and afterwards get a new ticket.

4098. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you any other suggestions to make to the Committee?—There are various other irregularities to which I might advert, but I am quite satisfied that if inspectors were appointed, those would certainly not take place——

4099. I may point out to you that the object which the Committee have in view is the amendment of the present law, if necessary, and not the detection of existing irregularities, except in so far as the existence of those irregularities may show that amendment is necessary?—But in order to illustrate the importance of the appointment of the official which I have suggested, I would mention (although I cannot say that it is a common practice), that I know a case in which the pawnbroker's book has been filled up before pledgers entered their premises: and a certain street, the High-street of Edinburgh, has been entered on at least a whole page as the residence of the pledgers who have not yet entered the premises. That shows that, of course, the pawnbrokers in those cases never asked where the residence was, and that, I may mention, transpired in the course of the prosecutions conducted at my instance to be a common practice. No questions were asked except the name and sometimes the address. The pawnbroker's explanation was that he knew the party; that he or she was a regular customer, and that he did not need to put the questions; but then the Act provides that it is always to be according to the information given, and given upon the pawnbroker's inquiry in every particular case.

4100. Then was the pawnbroker's explanation that he knew that such and such persons would come, and that he anticipated their arrival by filling up the name of the street?—No; that particular case never came before the court.

4101. But you speak of that special case as one that did come to your knowledge?—It came to my knowledge officially.

4102. That the page was filled up beforehand with the name of a well-known street, the High-street, but without the name of the pawners?—Yes.

4103. Mr. T. Hughes.] That was to save time, I suppose?—I presume so.

4104. Mr. Orr Ewing.] I suppose that in the High-street the lowest portion of the community live?—Yes, and in the closes off the High-street.

4105. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you any other suggestion to make to the Committee?—I think that fractional parts of a month should be abolished. I do not think they are understood by the poorer classes.

4106. You would give no days of grace to the pawner?—I do not say that. For example, I understand that under the present system, if an article has lain a day or two over a fortnight, the pawnbroker is only entitled to charge as for a fortnight, and if for less than seven days after a month, he is only entitled to charge as for a month. The practice, I am well informed, in a great many businesses in Edinburgh, is to charge for a full month if you pass a single day over the fortnight, and for a second month if you pass a single day over the first month. As the present system is unintelligible to the public, and implies an amount of calculation which they are quite incapable of performing, I think that an average rate should be struck, and made intelligible to the very poorest.

4107. You would have a rate for the first month, and another rate for the second month?—Precisely.

4108. If the article were not redeemed at the end

l of the second month, it should be liable for three months?—Precisely.

4109. And you would have no days of grace? I do not see any value in days of grace, because if the pawner knows there are no days of ce, he has the same means of redemption as has with the days of grace.

4110. Have you anything to say from your n experience with regard to the hours of ping places of business open in Edinburgh?—hink the present hours are quite long enough. would not extend the hours. The police ices in Edinburgh are only given in at 9 ock in the morning, and, of course, in those ces that are open earlier there are opportuies of pledging stolen property before the ice notices are given in.

4111. Then you would neither extend nor it the hours?—I have not considered that estion specially.

4112. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Do you think that re is any necessity in Scotland that Saturday uld be made an exception, and that they uld have the power of keeping open until 11 lock on that night?—I think not, for this rea: that if it is an honest industrious party who going to pledge, the Saturday half-holiday now Scotland is so universal that they have the ole day from 2 o'clock to themselves.

4113. It has been stated that in London wages generally paid late on Saturday evening, and at therefore it is necessary that the pawn-shops uld be kept open on that account; but is it t almost invariably the case that wages are d either early on Saturday, or else upon some er day in the week altogether?—Certainly; re may be cases where working men are pt very late on Saturday for some special ce of work, but they must form a very small ception.

4114. It is not men that generally pledge, is ?—I cannot say that. It is women and ildren to a much greater extent, but men pledge).

4115. Mr. Whitwell.] Have you at all conlered the question of free contract for sums ove 2 l.?—Yes, I have considered that; but I nnot say that I have come to a very decided inion upon the subject, except to this effect: at I would not have free contract absolutely, cause then you would open the trade to the ole world and ruin the respectable portion it. I think the present system of free conct above 10 l. works very well.

4116. You would limit it to that?—Yes.

4117. Have you any other suggestion to make the Committee?—In any new Act I would ggest that proper provision be made for conting prosecutions in Scotland, say under the mmary Procedure Act, which was passed in 64, and which contains special provisions for osecutions being brought under every variety circumstances, where a special Act does not elf contain such provision; so that if we were t upon the Summary Procedure Act just now thout those clauses in the existing Pawnbrors Act as to prosecution, the prosecutions would conducted, either before a magistrate or a stice of the peace at the instance of the prorator fiscal. I would also make this suggestion; at in any new Act, the prosecutor, at all events Scotland, and especially if he is a public procutor, should have no interest in the penalty; present he is allowed half the penalty; that of itself is a very strong inducement to me to refrain, if possible, from the prosecution, because it is a very unpleasant thing to feel as public prosecutor that you have a pecuniary interest in obtaining a conviction.

4118. Then you would alter the general law in that respect?—The general law would not give the public prosecutor an interest in the penalty.

4119. Is that only limited to the present Act in Scotland?—No, there are various Acts which give it, but if there were no provision in the present Act, the prosecutor would not get any interest in the penalty; I would propose that he should get his expenses on conviction.

4120. You would propose to take this matter out of the special Act, and leave it under the General Act?—Yes; it would be better if he were paid by way of allowance, irrespective altogether of a conviction, and that could be easily adjusted.

4121. Mr. T. Hughes.] If he were only paid in cases in which he obtained a conviction, must it not have a very bad effect upon the administration of justice?—Perhaps that may be so.

4122. Mr. Whitwell.] Does that conclude your suggestions generally?—I would suggest that the machinery for recovering penalties should be materially altered in the event of any new Act as regards Scotland; they are very defective, and very difficult to understand, because those provisions are framed so much with reference to England.

4123. Do you apply your remark generally to the Act and not to any specific clause?—Yes; I think it is rather an omission in the provisions, and that the defect is that nothing is said as to the means of recovering penalties.

4124. Mr. T. Hughes.] What process would you suggest for the recovery of the penalty?—The Summary Procedure Act makes very good provision for that.

4125. You would propose that all convictions under this Act should come under that Summary Procedure Act?—Yes; that would make imprisonment follow only in the event of poinding and distress failing. I would suggest that 16 years, which I understand is the limit of age for persons pledging in the case of children in England, should be applied to Scotland. There is a remark which I should like to make with reference to what I am told has been said as to the box system in Edinburgh; I understand that, in point of fact, there are only three pawnbrokers in Edinburgh who have boxes entirely closed in.

4126. Mr. Whitwell.] Do the others transact their businesses with open counters? — Not exactly that either. I visited two of them the day before yesterday, for the purpose of informing myself, and I was told by an official that they were fair specimens of all the houses. They have very much the same system as you have in telegraph offices; the partitions not so deep; any person can certainly know what takes place in the next box between the pledger and the pawnbroker. I do not think any objectionable secrecy is carried on in that way; but if people want to transact important matters, I do not see why they should not be allowed to do it in private. There is a slight discrepancy between section 15 in the Act, and the end of section 16; they appear to contradict each other. By the first of those sections the pawnbroker is bound to deliver to any party producing the ticket; by the second he is bound to deliver to anybody producing the duplicate with the declaration. I have rarely heard of any difficulty arising on this head, but obviously difficulty might arise by the owner getting a third party to produce the declaration, and afterwards himself producing the ticket. Again, if the pawnbroker were not to be held absolved by delivering to the declarant he, if he were unscrupulous, might get a declaration made, and afterwards refuse delivery to the owner. In all cases, perhaps, it might be provided that before delivery, on the tender of the duplicate, the pawnbroker should send notice of it to the owner; and there again, if the real name were given, it would be easier. It might be asked, who should bear the expense in this? I think it might fairly be thrown upon the actual uplifter of the goods. I do not care what it is, whether it is 1 d., or 2 d., or whatever may be thought right.

4127. But it must be the owner of the goods who makes the declaration?—It ought to be the owner, and that makes it the more reasonable that he should bear this charge as a tax for losing the ticket.

4128. There is one subject to which you have not alluded, and that is the length of time at which pledges ought to be kept before being sold; have you considered that point?—I should see no objection to limiting the period to six months.

4129. Mr. T. Hughes.] Sir Thomas Henry thought that that would be a considerable hardship upon pledgers; you do not see that that would be so?—It might be, in certain cases. The present practice is said to be objectionable, because parties pledge their summer goods in winter, and their winter goods in summer, and the time would not suit for the redemption; but the six months would obviate that.

4130. Is the "wee pawn" system going on in Edinburgh now to any extent?—To a great extent.

4131. But under what Act is the "wee pawn" system set up?—The Police Act of 1848 contains several sections applicable to that class of business. It applies to those brokers who buy, as I am informed, upon the understanding that if the customers return within, say, a month, the broker shall resell to them; at the same time, under the Police Act, the broker is not bound to keep the goods which he buys more than seven days. He gets a license from the police magistrate, and he keeps a book which is provided for him by the clerk of the court, in a particular form, the first page or two illustrating how he is to keep it. I looked over one of those books yesterday, and I found that the great bulk of the transactions involve an advance of under 2 s., and of those there was an immense number of merely threepences, and fourpences, and sixpences, and even as low as twopences.

4132. But how is it that the whole trade does not avail itself of this Police Act, which gives facilities, as it seems to me, for an evasion of the Pawnbrokers Act?—I may mention that I have never had my attention directed to this matter, except for this inquiry, and therefore I may be wrong; but when I looked at the Act of 19 & 20 Vict., it seems to me clear that, being passed eight years later than the Police Act of Edinburgh, it overrules it. It seems to have been passed for the express purpose of bringing those small pawnbrokers under the provisions of the Act of 1799, and it has not succeeded. I think you will never get rid of the effect of these "wee pawns," as they are called, without inspection. If, as has been suggested, you prevented all advances below 2 s. 6 d. or 3 s., and appointed an inspector, those pawnbrokers being brought under the Pawnbrokers Act, you would get rid of most of them.

4133. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] As you read the Act they contravene the law at present, and are liable to punishment?—I believe so.

4134. Mr. T. Hughes.] They are doing under their own Act things which contravene another Act of Parliament; is that clear?—The 19 & 20 Vict. is eight years later than the Police Act, and must control it; and even the provisions of the Police Act are much more of a prohibitory than of a permissive character.

4135. Then in your judgment it is desirable to sweep away the whole of this small trade, and to have only one system?—Yes, certainly; anybody who knows anything about it in Edinburgh knows that those small pledges are made chiefly for the purpose of getting drink. It is a common practice for two or three people to get to one of those small pawn-shops and pledge an article, and after consulting how much has been got for it, they adjourn to the nearest public-house. There is no disputing that fact. But I believe nothing of that kind is carried on, except where small petty advances are given.

4136. Then, in fact, your advice is to have one system as simple as possible, doing away with small pledges?—Precisely.

4137. And with this amendment, you think that pawnbroking is of advantage to the community?—Certainly; I think it would be very dangerous to put a stop to it all of a sudden, in any view.

4138. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You say that your knowledge of the pawnbrokers is principally incidental from your connection with criminal cases; I suppose you mean by that, that when a thief is apprehended, you find upon his person or in his house, pawn-tickets, which enable you to see that he has been in the habit of pledging goods?—That is very often so; but there are other means of obtaining information. In the course of precognition through other witnesses, it frequently transpires that such and such goods have been stolen, which are not even the subject of the present charge, and have been pledged.

4139. Notwithstanding all the evidence that you have given, you seem to think that pawnbroking is a means of doing a considerable amount of good?—I would not put it so; I think it is the means of giving accommodation to parties who wish to obtain it. In certain special circumstances, for example, I can quite believe that the honest, industrious tradesman, who has not constant employment, may require an advance from a pawnbroker for a time; and I think that it would be a pity to shut the door against his obtaining that advance, provided it were of an amount which would ensure its being of any practical value to him.

4140. Even 3 s. 1 d. you think may be of advantage to him?—If my own opinion were asked in that matter, I would say, certainly, that no advance under 5 s. should be given; but in deference to the opinion of others, I would be content with 3 s., as a trial, in the first instance. The better class of the trade themselves think that at all those low pledges should be abolished; d I am quite satisfied in my own mind that it for their interest.

4141. Is it not the poorest of the community ho go to the pawn-shops?—It is, as a rule.

4142. Is not the system of pawnbroking use-l, because the people have grown up under a cious system?—I am not prepared to say that we had never had the business we might not ave done very well without it; but I am not actly able to put myself in that position.

4143. As society is, you think it necessary?—think it would be a great pity to abolish it.

4144. You would not agree with the Premier the present Government when he said in the ar 1861 that the pawnbroking system was "a ack spot upon our present social system"?—I ost thoroughly agree that, as at present con-ucted, it is so; but if it were conducted as it ight be conducted, I do not think that it should so.

4145. Mr. Alderman Carter.] How long ve you held your present office? — Three ears.

4146. During the time you have had the office, before that time, have you been in the habit of siting pawnbrokers' shops?—I visited one offi-ally about two years ago; but with that excep-on I never was in one in my life until the day fore yesterday.

4147. I think I understood you to say that you rive certain advantages from penalties that are flicted upon pawnbrokers who are brought be-re you?—I am remunerated in that way; but should hardly call it an advantage to receive muneration for labour bestowed on behalf of the ublic.

4148. Have a large number of pawnbrokers een brought before you and fined for infringe-ents of the law during the time you have been office?—I have only prosecuted in 23 cases, d those prosecutions have been chiefly brought consequence of defective information on tickets, hich defective information resulted in a difficulty tracing stolen property; and in consequence of ose prosecutions a great improvement has taken lace in the form of ticket now issued by the hole of the pawnbrokers in Edinburgh. Hence, have not been obliged to conduct prosecutions cently at all.

4149. What, as a rule, have been the amounts the penalties on those cases that have been rought before you?—They never could be under 0 s., and they have been on an average I should y, 3 l. or 4 l.

4150. I understood you to state that you did ot consider pawning to be an immoral act?—No, do not.

4151. Then would it be a more immoral act to awn under 2 s. 6 d., or 2 s., than to pawn above hat sum?—Certainly not; but it may be very nmoral in its effects. The act of pawning itself bstractly is not immoral; but I consider it a ery immoral thing, if after stealing an article, I o and pawn the thing which has been stolen; nd I consider it an immoral thing if I pawn olely for the purpose of getting drink.

4152. I understood you to say that you have ot had personal experience of the difficulties that he working classes may have to contend with?—have made none of those remarks with reference o the working classes. I am speaking of a much ower class still, the idle and intemperate, who ive from hand to mouth, and never from year's end to year's end, have any constant work whatever. Anybody who knows the large towns in Scotland, at least, knows that there are an immense number of such people, and that they for the most part are the parties who pledge for small sums.

4153. I agree with you thoroughly in that; but supposing you were to restrict pawnbrokers to receiving pledges above 2 s. or above 2 s. 6 d., would you not deprive a steady working man of the means of getting a little assistance in a case of that kind, if he was out of work?—I cannot possibly see that, because in every such case a working man, if it is to do him any good whatever, must have at least, I should say, 5*s.*

4154. I have had experience among the working classes, and experience as a working man, and I ask you whether, when a steady working man is in difficulties, it might not be an advantage to him to be able to raise as much as would get his family a stone of flour?—I should not like to say anything that would contradict the honourable Member's experience, because I frankly confess that I have not had that experience. I am speaking very much from general observation. I can conceive such a case as you put, but I should say that such cases must be few and far between, and that the evils which undoubtedly result from the system of low pledges are so great that it would even be better to make the sacrifice in the case to which you refer than to allow those evils to continue.

4155. Your principal opposition or objection to it is, that the money is usually expended in drink?—Certainly.

4156. Then would it not be better to prohibit the drinking shop, because I want to come to the question, whether drinking is the result of pawning, or whether pawning is the result of drinking?—I believe they play into each other's hands. I believe, if measures were passed by Parliament for confining all habitual drunkards, as you do lunatics, you would to a great extent, without any alteration of the present pawnbroking law, diminish intemperance, and diminish pawnbroking also; they are inseparably connected.

4157. Then there would be less need, of course, for pawning for sums under 2 s. if there were no drink shops?—Most undoubtedly.

4158. And nearly all this pawning, as you think, would be done away with?— The great bulk of it would, as regards those small sums in Scotland.

4159. You have spoken of the "wee pawns;" have no attempts been made on the part of the magistrates of Edinburgh to put the "wee pawns" down?—Not to my knowledge, except so far as to put them under control by the provisions of the present Police Act.

4160. Have you a local Act in Edinburgh to legalize those "wee pawns," by which there is an understanding that a broker shall keep for a fortnight articles deposited with them?—As I read the Acts previous to the Act of 1856, that was perfectly legal in Edinburgh under the Police Act. As I read the Acts with the light of the Act of 1856, I think it is quite illegal; but that is the general impression upon my own mind, without consulting anyone, from reading that Act only yesterday.

4161. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Have you ever prosecuted a "wee pawn" for contravention of the Acts?—Never; I never knew that it was possible to do so.

Mr. R. B. Johnston.

14 July 1870.

4162. Mr. T. Hughes.] Is it the common impression in Edinburgh that the "wee pawn" is protected by Act of Parliament?—Undoubtedly, and I may state that when I mentioned this to an official of the superintendent of police and showed him the Act he expressed surprise; he never knew of the Act 19 & 20 Vict.

4163. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I understood you to say that you would shorten the hours on Saturday, and that you would have pawnbrokers close on Saturday much sooner than they do now?—Yes, I would close them at 8 o'clock at night.

4164. I think you stated that it was customary in Scotland to pay wages, either before Saturday or very early on Saturday?—Yes.

4165. Is it usual in the case of labourers, for instance, bricklayers' labourers and men that usually work away from home, to pay them on Friday or early on Saturday?—With very few exceptions, I think, all labourers in Scotland are paid by 2 o'clock on Saturday at the very latest, and I believe a great deal of their earnings that finds its way to the public-house either directly or indirectly, would never be spent in that way if they had less facilities for doing it; but, of course, that is another question.

4166. Mr. Whitwell.] Your experience with regard to the Scotch labourers is, that you would recommend in their interest that the small pledges should be abolished?—Exactly.

4167. The Scotch labourer has no power of asking for relief if he is able-bodied, I believe?—Not at all, if he is able-bodied.

4168. If an English labourer is out of work, and has nothing to feed his family with, he may go and ask for relief; consequently the Scotch labourer is under a disadvantage in that respect; and if he is out of work and wants food on a frosty day, or anything of that kind, he has no right to apply to any public officer for the means to supply his family with food?—I am not sufficiently conversant even with the working of our own poor law to give an authoritative answer to that question.

4169. If that be the law of the case, would it be desirable to prevent his putting in pledge for a few days an article even of the value of 2*s.* 6*d.*?—I can just give the answer to that that I gave before; that I am not at all influenced by that consideration. I believe that if an honest industrious labourer was so poor that he had not 2*s.* 6*d.* in his possession, or anything that would yield him more than 2*s.* 6*d.*, he would certainly get relief elsewhere in some shape or other.

4170. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But if he had something that would yield him 2*s.* 6*d.*, would he not be justified in pawning it rather than selling it?—No, because if you have one law for the industrious labourer, you must have the same law for the idle and depraved.

4171. Mr. Thomas Hughes.] You think hard cases make bad laws?—Exactly.

4172. Mr. Orr Ewing.] If he was a man with anything to pledge, would he not get sufficient to support him from a grocer, or any one with whom he did business?—In one shape or another; I never heard of an honest industrious labourer in Scotland being so far reduced as to be in need of 2*s.* 6*d.*, and no more; the thing is impossible.

4173. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I think you said that there was a recommendation at Edinburgh that the license should be increased to 50*l.*?—I heard that suggestion made in Edinburgh, but I do not approve of that myself. I should not raise it above 20*l.* at any rate.

4174. In speaking of auction sales, would you not allow the pawnbroker to put a reserve price upon the articles that he had to sell by auction?—I would.

4175. And in that sense you would allow him to bid for his own goods, I suppose?—Yes, I do not object to that, provided you have the auction conducted away from his own premises and in a proper manner.

4176. Mr. Whitwell.] Do you desire to add anything to the evidence which you have already given?—I believe it is a moot point whether, under the present law, a pawnbroker is bound to deliver up goods that have been obtained under false pretences and pledged with him, in the same way as he is bound to deliver up stolen property. My own opinion is that he is not bound to do so, but it is not very distinctly laid down, and officially I had a case recently where there was a large quantity of jewellery pledged with certain pawnbrokers in Edinburgh. A conviction ensued, and a question arose at once between the jeweller's firm from whom the property had been obtained on false representations and the pawnbroker, and it was compromised by the jeweller paying the pawnbroker a certain sum, something like half of the advances. It would be more satisfactory if it were distinctly laid down whether goods obtained under these circumstances were to be dealt with in the same category as stolen property.

4177. Would you have that extended to goods obtained by fraud?—I do not say that, but I say that it should be laid down whether it is to be so.

4178. Then you think the law upon that point requires defining?—Precisely.

Mr. William Bowles Raynor, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. B. Raynor.

4179. Chairman.] Are your the Head Superintendent of the Borough Police of Nottingham?—I am.

4180. How long have you been in the Nottingham police?—Forty-one years.

4181. How many pawnbrokers are there in Nottingham?—There are 20 shops.

4182. Have they all articles for sale as well as pledging?—Yes, I believe they have.

4183. You, as inspector of the police, must be cognisant of the amount of stolen property deposited with them?—Yes, I have been, to a certain extent, in my time; but lately we have not had a great deal of stolen property in Nottingham. During the last 12 months there has been very little indeed.

4184. Are the police in the habit of sending out notices to the various pawnbrokers of the articles which have been stolen?—Yes; we do that regularly.

4185. Does it frequently happen that those articles are pledged with the pawnbrokers?—Not always, by a great deal.

4186. Does it frequently happen that they are?—Not so much as you would think. Those are the lists which we sent up (handing in a paper).

4187. Is

4187. Is that served every day upon the pawnbrokers?—When we have anything stolen.

4188. Have you frequently to send this list out?—We have not had to do so lately, I am happy to say.

4189. When articles are stolen, where do the thieves generally dispose of them?—I should say that they generally go to the pawnbrokers' shops, but many go to the brokers' shops, where they buy old clothes.

4190. Articles of a certain value will go to the brokers' shops?—Yes; coats, and gowns, and shawls.

4191. But if there was a theft you would appoint one of your officers to go to the pawnbroker's?—Yes, the first thing.

4192. It being naturally the place where a thief would take an article?—That is the place, and then to the brokers' shops, where they buy old clothing.

4193. Do you know the value of the goods actually stolen at Nottingham in any period?—No.

4194. Do you know the number of articles?—The number of robberies reported from July 1869 to July 1870, was 302.

4195. Mr. Alderman Carter.] How many police have you?—One hundred and four.

4196. And what is the population?—About 86,000.

4197. Mr. T. Hughes.] You seem to be in an admirable state at Nottingham?—We are at the present time, I am happy to say.

4198. Do you think that it is a real improvement, or is it that the thieves have become more clever and escape attention?—Trade has been very good.

4199. As trade gets better do robberies get less?—Yes, I think so. When trade gets worse, there are more robberies.

4200. Mr. Whitwell.] So far as your experience goes, do the pawnbrokers assist in the discovery of theft?—Of course I have had a very great many cases of going to pawnbrokers' shops, more than I can speak of; but whenever I have gone, they have always given me the fullest information.

4201. Have you ever convicted any pawnbroker of receiving goods, knowing them to be stolen?—Not one in my time.

4202. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Have you any means of knowing what kind of property is in the hands of the pawnbrokers?—No; we know when a sale takes place what there is offered for sale, every two months or so, because they have handbills stuck about the town of a sale of unredeemed pledges to take place on a certain day.

4203. But if the pawnbroker knew that he had any stolen goods, he would not like to offer them for sale at Nottingham, I presume?—I do not know. I cannot say anything about that. We have only the power of going and asking the pawnbroker if he had such a thing offered for pledge, and he may tell us or he may not. I cannot say anything about that, but I have generally found it correct.

4204. Have you ever found in your experience that when you apprehended a thief you found in his possession pawn-tickets?—Yes, many times.

4205. And those goods were in the hands of the pawnbrokers?—Yes.

4206. But the pawnbrokers had not told you that those stolen goods were in their hands, had they?—No, we perhaps had never inquired for them.

4207. Therefore there may be a great deal of stolen property in the hands of pawnbrokers about which you have never heard, may there not? Quite so.

4208. Pawnbrokers are therefore a great facility to thieves to get their goods disposed of, are they not?—They generally reckon to go to pawnbrokers' shops to make money of them.

4209. When a theft takes place, the first place you look to is the pawnbrokers' shops?—Yes.

4210. That is because the property is more likely to be there than anywhere else, I suppose?—Yes.

4211. Then, is the next place the brokers' shops?—Yes.

4212. Where do you go in the third place?—We make it out the best way we can.

4213. Therefore your evidence is, that pawnbroking gives facilities for disposing of stolen property?—Yes, it does.

4214. Would you not think that it would be for the advantage of the public if there were power given to the detective part of the police to investigate the books and to search the premises of pawnbrokers?—I am sure I do not know about that; I have looked the books through when there have been silver spoons taken or anything of that sort, and they have allowed me to do so. I do not know what good it would do to search the rooms where the goods are. If a gentleman lost his black coat, and I went to look for it, I could not tell it unless the gentleman was with me to pick it out.

4215. But generally thefts are not of black coats?—No, of course not, but any clothing.

4216. Supposing that you had the power of going in every day to investigate what the pawnbrokers might have, that power would not be often exercised except as regards the lowest portion of them, would it not give facility for the detection of theft? — Yes, I daresay it might assist in that.

4217. Would you like the law to be so changed as to give such a power to the police?—It would be a delicate job to go and turn a pawnbroker's stock over.

4218. We are not speaking of delicacy, but of what would be of advantage to the public; you admit the evil, but still you are not willing to apply the remedy?—No; I should not say anything about searching pawnbrokers' shops.

4219. Have you a feeling for the pawnbrokers?—No; but whenever I have gone to them, they have always served me with what I wanted.

4220. But notwithstanding that you have admitted that a great deal of stolen property has been discovered in pawnbrokers' shops?—Yes, a great deal.

4221. And still you are not willing to give power to the police to search those places?—I do not know, I am sure, about that.

4222. Who has brought you up here as a witness?—I was sent from Nottingham.

4223. By the police force?—No, not by the police force, by the pawnbrokers.

4224. Then you are here as a pawnbroker's witness?—Yes.

4225. And you do not like to say anything to hurt their feelings?—I am only saying that which is right.

4226. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You are here, I

Mr. W. B. Raynor.

14 July 1870.

suppose, to tell us what your experience has been with reference to the pawnbrokers of a large town?—Yes.

4227. Have you found them, as a rule, to give facilities to the police for finding stolen property?—I have.

4228. And, as a police officer, you say you would not like the job of turning a pawnbroker's stock over?—No.

4229. Do you not think that people are as likely to dispose of their property and wearing apparel to what we call second-hand clothes shops as they are at a pawnbrokers?—I believe a quantity of property goes to the people who buy old clothes.

4230. Do you not think that you should have the same facilities for turning over their stocks and examining their premises as you should have according to the honourable Member's suggestion in the pawnbrokers' shops?—When we go to those shops, the clothes hang all round the room; so that if there is anything we want, we can see it in a moment, but the pawnbroker packs up his pledges.

4231. Mr. Whitwell.] Does the statement of the number of robberies which you have handed in include every kind of robbery?—Yes; that is for the last 12 months.

4232. Have you a return showing how many of those robberies were detected and punished?—No, I have not a return of that; this is a list of articles which have been pledged, and which we have found at pawnbrokers' shops:—Four watches, four silver spoons, six plated forks, a lot of plated goods, a pair of boots, an umbrella, and 34 articles of clothing; in all, 44 out of 302.

4233. But can you tell me in how many cases you have discovered the offenders who have committed the robberies, and in how many cases they were convicted?—No, I cannot tell you that.

4234. Did you ever take out a search warrant to search a pawnbroker's shop?—No, we have never had occasion, that I am aware of, to take out a search warrant to search a pawnbroker's shop.

4235. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You are an old police officer?—Yes.

4236. Is drunkenness very prevalent in Nottingham?—Yes, there is a great deal of drinking in Nottingham.

4237. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Do you think that much of the money which is got from pawnbrokers goes in that way?—To a certain extent it does, but not all.

4238. Do you not think that the money got on most of the small pledges goes in that way?—I could not answer that question.

4239. But you admit that a great deal goes in that way?—Yes, a good deal goes in drink.

4240. Are there many tickets lost in Nottingham?—Yes, a great many; several cases of lost tickets come before the magistrates every sitting.

4241. Have you ever tried to think out how those tickets were lost?—Some people get their pockets picked of them, and some lose them when they are tipsy.

4242. They get into a helpless condition after receiving the tickets, and the ticket is taken out of their pockets,?—Many of them get their pockets picked.

4243. You would not allow your pocket to be picked very readily, I suppose?—I should not like it.

4244. Do you think that those people are in a condition to resist it?—I am not going to say that those people who get their pockets picked are all tipsy; for on Saturday night, when they are all crowding together, women will get their pockets picked. They generally have all their tickets in a little pocket-book, and sometimes they are thrown down cellar lights, and found next morning.

4245. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it usual for them to carry their tickets about with them?—Very often; and females in particular.

Monday, 18*th July* 1870.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Alderman Carter.

Mr. Whitwell.

JOHN WHITWELL, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. George McKay, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. McKay. 18 July 1870.

4246. Chairman.] You are the Provost of Pollockshaws, are you not?—I am.

4247. How long have you been provost?—Four years.

4248. As provost you are a magistrate officially, and not otherwise?—I am an ex officio magistrate.

4249. What is your business?—I am a pawnbroker.

4250. Are you thoroughly acquainted with the trade of pawnbroking in Pollockshaws?—Yes.

4251. How long have you been a pawnbroker there?—About 13 or 14 years.

4252. Have you more than one shop?—Only one.

4253. What is the amount of pledges deposited with you?—On an average from 3,500 to 4,000 a month, or from 42,000 to 48,000 per annum.

4254. What amount of money have you advanced upon these pledges?—About 2,000 l.

4255. What other pawnbrokers are there besides you?—One.

4256. Is his business much the same as yours?—Scarcely so large.

4257. What is the population for which you are the persons who transact the business?—I think our business represents, perhaps, a population of somewhere about 25,000.

4258. Do persons come from outside that population to pawn with you?—Yes, those round about the villages and towns do business with us, and that swells our transactions.

4259. Do many of the residents in Pollockshaws go to other places to pledge?—There may be a few, but I do not think there are many.

4260. Do not some go to Glasgow to pledge their goods?—It is quite possible that they do.

4261. You have no knowledge to what extent?—I have no knowledge to what extent.

4262. Can you form an idea as to the extent to which they do so?—I cannot form any idea; but I think it would be trifling.

4263. I believe there are no "wee pawns" in Pollockshaws?—No.

4264. So that, in fact, the whole business is transacted by you and the other establishment?—Yes.

4265. Your capital employed is about 2,000 l., and the capital of the other establishment is not quite so large, I believe?—I think not.

4266. Do you know how much it is?—Not exactly.

4267. What do you suppose is the total number of pledges in the week in the two businesses?—It is from 875 to 1,000 each per week.

4268. May we take a gross average of 75,000 per annum for the two?—Yes, at least.

4269. Is that the maximum?—I would say from 84,000 to 96,000 is the maximum for the shops each year.

4270. What is the average value of the pledges deposited with you?—I have no means of knowing that just now.

4271. Taking your own shop, for instance, what is the lowest advance which you are applied to to make?—Sixpence.

4272. Do you ever advance a less sum than 6*d.*?—Yes, on very rare occasions we have advanced 4*d.*

4273. What would you consider a large sum to advance?—£. 5.

4274. What is the day of the week on which you receive the most pledges?—Monday.

4275. On what day are they mostly redeemed?—Saturday night.

4276. What proportion of those 35,000 pledges, which you say are deposited with you, are redeemed at the expiration of a week?—A large per-centage of those pledges. The annual number of my pledges, as before stated, are from 42,000 to 48,000.

4277. Can you give the Committee an approximate per-centage?—I cannot just now.

4278. What per-centage do you suppose would not be redeemed?—From 5 to 7 per cent.

4279. What proportion of your pledges are articles of clothing or wearing apparel?—I have no means of stating definitely just now.

4280. Do they consist largely of articles of clothing?—Yes.

4281. Are the majority of pledges articles of clothing?—I would almost venture to say so.

4282. Have you brought any books with you?—No.

4283. Those articles of clothing are, of course, articles which are principally redeemed at the end of the week?—Yes, I think so.

4284. Are they principally articles of Sunday clothing?—I am not particularly sure; I could not say definitely.

4285. Is it a common practice in Scotland for persons to bring in their Sunday clothing on

Mr. G. McKay.
18 July 1870.

Monday and to take it out on Saturday night?—I would say not.

4286. Do you ever divide articles of clothing into two or three distinct pledges? — Very seldom.

4287. If a man brings a suit of clothing, a coat, trowsers, and vest, do you take it as one pledge or three?—As one.

4288. Is that your invariable practice?—Yes.

4289. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What would be your inducement to divide it if you did divide it; would it be at the request of the party?—It would depend a great deal on the value of the goods. I would not divide such except at the request of the party.

4290. Chairman.] Do you have many articles which have been stolen deposited with you in pledge?—Very few. I have a statement of them which I could give the Committee if it is considered desirable.

4291. Will you state to the Committee how many instances of stolen articles which have been discovered by the police have occurred within a specific time?—I may say that the police have access to the books of the two pawnbrokers in Pollockshaws. The pawnbroker gives them always every assistance in his power. All the transactions are entered in the books, and in my own pawnbroking office the cases in which stolen goods were given up to the police as evidence against parties convicted within the last 11 years are as follows: in 1860, none; in 1861, one; in 1862, two; in 1863, five; in 1864, two; in 1865, six; in 1866, one; in 1867, one; in 1868, one; in 1869, three; in 1870, none. Thirteen of the above 22 were tried at Pollockshaws; five at Paisley, and four at Glasgow. The total sum lent upon the above goods by the pawnbroker being 3 l. 1 s. 3½ d.

4292. Did it happen that any of those cases were heard when you were sitting on the bench?—No.

4293. But you, as chief magistrate, would hear of most cases of theft, would you not?—Yes; you will observe that for the last 11 years there have been only 13 cases, and I have only been a magistrate for four years.

4294. Four years would extend over 1867, 1868, and 1869; in 1869 there were three cases, were you on the bench when any of those cases were tried?—No.

4295. Were you on the bench when any of the other cases were tried, when the stolen property was found in the hands of another pawnbroker?—I think not.

4296. Can you tell me how many cases of theft were reported in Pollockshaws by the police during any one year?—No.

4297. Are you aware what the number of robberies may have been in any one year in Pollockshaws proper?—Very few indeed; far less thefts are committed than cases of other kinds in Pollockshaws proper.

4298. Can you inform the Committee of the number of cases where stolen property was found in the possession of the other pawnbroker, whose account you have?—In the other pawnbroker's office, the cases in which stolen goods were delivered to the police for the last five years were, in 1866 one; in 1867 four; in 1868 two; in 1869 one; in 1870 one; the sum lent thereupon being 1 l. 6 s. 7½ d.

4299. Mr. Plimsoll.] Are they all trifling articles?—All of them are of trifling value.

4300. Chairman.] Can you inform the Committee what class of persons it is who pawn with you at Pollockshaws?—I consider that the inhabitants of Pollockshaws and the neighbourhood are industrious and frugal.

4301. That is not the question; what class of persons is it that pawn with you at Pollockshaws?—Generally the working classes; labourers, mechanics, and so on.

4302. Is it their poverty which causes them to pawn?—I do now know; but in my opinion the poor people, or people in humbler circumstances, have as much right to pledge their property when need requires as the rich have.

4303. Is it poverty which causes them to pawn?—It is their requirements; my own experience is, that most of the money which is lent goes to buy food, and goes to pay monthly rents, and half-yearly rents, and other necessary requirements.

4304. Are you not aware that the poor rates in Pollockshaws have very much increased?—Yes; but I have no statistics upon the subject. I intended to have brought the statistics in reference to the poor rates; but these being our holidays there were no means of getting them.

4305. Can you tell us how many places there are in Pollockshaws where intoxicating liquors are sold?—No.

4306. Can you tell us how many persons are brought up before you and the other magistrates in any one week for drunkenness?—I am sure I am extravagant when I say that there are not above 12 drunk and incapable cases in the whole year in Pollockshaws.

4307. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I take it that it is not usual to take up people who are drunk unless they are incapable?—Just so.

4308. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] They are not brought up for merely being drunk?—Not if they are fit to take care of themselves.

4309. A man is not brought before the magistrates because he is drunk, unless he be doing some act contrary to the peace, such as rioting or making a noise?—Yes, just so; I refer to drunk and incapable cases that cannot take charge of themselves.

4310. Even supposing that a man was found by his friends lying drunk in the streets the police would not interfere, I suppose?—No.

4311. Chairman.] Have you any cases of people being brought up for being drunk and disorderly, besides being drunk and incapable?—Of course there are breaches of the peace, but that arises from a quarrelsome disposition as often as from drink.

4312. You have come here to give the Committee information, and the question is, are there in a year no more than 12 cases at Pollockshaws of persons being brought up before you and other magistrates, having been intoxicated at the time they were taken up by the police?—We call those cases drunk and incapable cases, and there have been no more. I say again that I am extravagant when I say that there are 12 cases in the whole 12 months of that description of crime, if you call it so.

4313. Are there no other cases in which drunkenness formed a part of the charge?—I will not say that.

4314. How many other cases were there in which drunkenness formed a part of the charge, besides being drunk and incapable?—I could not say.

4315. You

15. You have had no information upon the ct?—No.

16. Have you any other information which vish to give to the Committee?—I consider pawnbroking in Pollockshaws has not been ause of the great increase of poors' rates in parish of Eastwood; I believe that other s have contributed to the increase of the rates there. The causes which have con- ted to the increase of poors' rates there are ame as have contributed to produce that throughout the whole country, such as the ng of poorhouses, the buying of burial ds, the increase of salaries, the fluctuations ade, the increase of population, old age, nage, illegitimacy, disease, &c., and the ment of the poor's rate introduced by the f 1842 instead of the former system, which oluntary.

17. You clearly have come up to defend the broking system at Pollockshaws?—Not ly to do that.

18. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] The people in the wood parish, which, of course, you speak of, e Pollockshaws district, are very well em- d, are they not?—Yes, generally they are well employed.

19. Have not almost all the works been very for four or five years, such as Thornliebank, stance?—Yes, they have been very busy at liebank.

20. And at other works in Pollockshaws?— inly.

21. Can you tell me any work in Pollock- which has not been well employed?—There rtificate from one (handing in a Paper), as ole.

22. How many men are employed in this —Not very many.

23. How many?—I cannot exactly say.

24. Very few, I should think, at those ?—Yes.

25. I see that there is another bleaching which you have given in; that is a small is it not?—It is not.

26. How many are employed there?— pose there would be upwards of 300 or

27. There is no distress amongst the people llockshaws, I suppose?—No.

28. It is only this small work which has not mployed, and all the rest of the works in rish of Eastwood have been well employed; the largest works in the parish of East- such as Thornliebank, how many hands do mploy there?—Perhaps, 2,000.

29. Have they for the last four years, during me you speak of, ever been idle at all; ere been an idle man there?—I am not

30. Have they been all fully employed, and king large wages?—As far as I know.

31. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What will be erage wages of the parties working at those works; will they be 18 s., or 1 l., or more hat?—At those bleach works they are most m females, and their wages will, perhaps, ge from 6 s. to 8 s. per week.

32. What proportion of men are engaged at works?—Fifty men, and 350 females.

33. Mr. Plimsoll.] Do you think that pawn- rs are fairly chargeable for the increase of rism and drunkenness?—They are not.

34. The money advanced by a pawnbroker, I suppose, is advanced with a view to its repayment, is it not?—Yes.

4335. And you also require an addition to the principal, do you not?—Yes.

4336. So that if people who pawn are correctly supposed (and that is a very large assumption) to take the money direct from the pawnbroker's shop to the dramshop, there is this counterpoise, at least, that they have to bring a rather larger sum by and bye to the pawnbroker to get the goods, which would otherwise be available for the dramshop?—I would think, of course, that that would be the conclusion.

4337. So that taking the point of view which has been adopted by some of the witnesses, that all the money which a pawnbroker lends is spent in drink, it at least prevents a larger sum being spent in drink, because you are not content to get your principal back, but you get something with it?—Yes, I would think so.

4338. Mr. Alderman Carter.] A former witness told us that there were 2,008 householders in Pollackshaws, and that 1,101 of those were excused from the payment of their poor's rate for some reason or other; can you tell me the reason why more than one-half of the whole population were excused their poor's rates when you say that work is pretty plentiful?—You will observe that there is a large amount of females holding houses engaged in work in Pollackshaws, and they are generally not charged.

4339. I understood you to say that the population of your district was about 25,000?—That is the population of the whole district representing the pawnbroking business done by the two pawnbrokers of Pollockshaws.

4340. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] That includes almost the whole of what you would call the eastern district of Renfrewshire, does it not?—With the exception of the Glasgow district.

4341. That includes Barrhead, does it not?—No.

4342. What does it include?—It includes Crossmyloof, New and Old Cathcart, Thornliebank, Newton, Mearns, Busby, Eaglesham, &c.

4343. How many works are there in Crossmyloof?—I think that Crossmyloof is in the parish of Cathcart. I have taken the calculation for the parish of Cathcart at 3,782, and I have supposed that in the parish of Mearns there are 3,575. I have supposed Eastwood to be 11,314, Eaglesham 2,000, and Busby 2,000; and there are other little places which I could mention. I have supposed an increase in the whole district of 6,000. Strathbungo is not represented there, nor Neilston. There are two works in Crossmyloof, of an iron forge and a large baking factory.

4344. Chairman.] The Committee have met for the purpose of considering whether there should be any alteration in the law; have you, as a pawnbroker, anything to suggest with regard to any alteration of the law?—I have nothing to suggest.

4345. Do you think that the profits obtained are large enough?—The only thing I have to suggest is, that if the Government does not consider that the trade is carried on in a proper way they, I think, ought to take it into their own hands and carry it on.

4346. And buy up all the pawnbroking businesses?—That is the way I understand in France, and some parts of the Continent.

4347. You have some 2,000 l. capital in your business; business; have you any other business?—I have no other business, but I have other properties.

Mr. G. McKay.

18 July 1870.

4348. And you have been a pawnbroker for 14 years?—Yes, about that.

4349. You must have found the business a profitable one?—Any means which I have, have not been made entirely by pawnbroking. Before I was a pawnbroker at all, I was very successful in buying shares and selling them.

4350. But you must have found the business a profitable one, otherwise you would not have continued it?—I have derived any means which I have more from other sources than from pawnbroking.

4351. Still you attend to your own business, do you not?—Partially.

4352. How many hands do you require to assist you?—Three besides myself.

4353. How much do you pay to those hands?—I cannot exactly say.

4354. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Are they male or female?—They are male.

4355. Have you three men?—I have one man and two boys.

4356. Chairman.] Do you not know what you pay to the three men?—If I had been aware that I was going to be questioned generally upon pawnbroking, I would have had my books and everything here; but I am not prepared to go into the question.

4357. Are you prepared to tell the Committee what is the cost of managing your business by the wages you pay to your assistants?—I think I pay 23 s. a week to the man and 8 s. to one of the boys, and then there is another boy to whom I give 3 s.

4358. Then you have two boys and a man?—Yes.

4359. Does it require your own attention as well?—Yes, occasionally.

4360. What rent do you pay for your premises?—Some 18 l., I think; it is 23 l., and I have part of it sub-let.

4361. The amount of capital in the business being 2,000 l., 10 per cent. upon that would be 200 l., would it not?—Yes.

4362. Out of which you have to pay something like 100 l.; are you prepared to tell the Committee what other pawnbrokers in London have freely told them, viz., what is the balance of profit on your business?—I am not aware, because I have not my books, and I cannot speak positively of it.

4363. And you cannot tell how much money you have made the last three or four years?—Not exactly just now.

4364. However, it is quite remunerative, and you are quite satisfied with it?—Not altogether.

4365. I do not want to press you for anything that you do not wish to give, but as other pawnbrokers have offered it, I thought you might possibly be inclined to do the same; have you a saleshop in which you sell the articles which are pawned with you?—Yes, those under 10 s.

4366. How do you conduct the sale of articles above 10 s. in value at the end of twelve months?—In our business we have public sales occasionally.

4367. Mr. Alderman Carter.] By auction?—By auction.

4368. Chairman.] Where are the public sales?—In Glasgow.

4369. Do your unredeemed pledges, above 10 s. in value, go to Glasgow to be sold?—There may be some of them which do not.

4370. Where are they sold?—The parties to whom they belong might get them again, perhaps, with a day or two allowed.

4371. But you are bound to sell all those which are not redeemed at the end of 12 months, are you not, by Act of Parliament?—I believe so.

4372. But it is not your practice to do so, is it?—Yes, we do so.

4373. To a certain extent, I think you said?—Yes, I think so.

4374. But not altogether?—No, some may be sold in that way.

4375. How are those pledges sold which are not sold to the person who pawns the article?—They are sold in Glasgow.

4376. Who sells them?—Mr. Davidson has sold some sometimes for me, and Mr. Stewart; I am not prepared to give the whole particulars just now.

4377. Are you in the habit of advertising your sales?—Sometimes; public sales.

4378. But not always?—Public sales of unredeemed pledges are always advertised.

4379. At what shops in Glasgow are they sold?—I have had sales with Mr. Stewart; I have had sales with Mr. Davidson; I have had sales with another auctioneer.

4380. How often in a year have you sales?—It may be once in the year.

4381. In what papers are they advertised?—Generally in the "Herald" and in the "Mail."

4382. Are they advertised as your unredeemed pledges?—Yes.

4383. Where does the other pawnbroker sell?—I do not know.

4384. Are they sometimes sold, as they are in Edinburgh, on the premises of the pawnbroker themselves, by an auctioneer?—I do not think so.

4385. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Did you ever have a sale by auction on your premises?—No, never.

4386. Chairman.] Then you have no other recommendation with regard to the alteration of the law, except that the Government should take up the whole of the pawnbroking establishment?—I consider that the Act might be simplified a good deal more than it is.

4387. In what way?—I am not prepared to say, but I am under the impression that it might be simplified.

Mr. William Scoular, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Scoular.

4388. Chairman.] Are you a pawnbroker in Glasgow?—Yes.

4389. What part of Glasgow?—I have had two places, one at the Cross, just at the head of the Salt Market, for the last 23 years and I have a place in Bridgeton, which is in the outskirts of Glasgow; which I have had probably for years.

4390. Have you both establishments now under you?—No, I have given up the one at the Cross ear, at Whit Sunday. One reason for doing s that the town has bought the property I had there, for improvements, and, there- gave it up, because I did not know how hey would take possession of it.

91. Then all your business is now carried on idgeton, Glasgow?—Yes.

2. Having been a number of years in the ess, can you explain the peculiar circum- es in the year 1806 when it was said that was but one pawnbroker in Scotland?—So my own knowledge goes I cannot do that is the year in which I was born; herefore it cannot be expected that I can anything beyond that time; but the fact e matter is this: that previously to 1806 s not known that the Pawnbroking Act d to Scotland at all, and, so late as there was one who carried on the pawn ess in Glasgow, which was entirely on the pawn" system, for it was not known that et 39 and 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, applied to Scot- at all; and when this person died appli- was made to the sheriff of Lanarkshire warrant. He granted a warrant upon the tion that the drum was to be sent through, was done, giving notice that if the goods not redeemed in one month they were to be

93. You mean a public notice by the sound um?—Yes; it the goods were not lifted n one month they were to be sold. I have rom the party who wound up that business, have a confirmation here with regard to the hat the Act was not known previously to time. That is from a Mr. McGlaishan, who e a Digest of the Laws of Pawnbroking. is merely to show that the Pawnbroking was not believed to extend to Scotland at all. awnbroker's license was taken out before 1811 asgow. With regard to that one pawnbroker 806, I believe it is a concoction altogether, h was concocted in Pollockshaws, and there truth in it whatsoever.

94. Then since 1811 there have been pawn- ing businesses?—I do not know how soon that it was discovered that the Act applied cotland.

95. How many pawnbroking establishments there when you began business in Glasgow? hen I began business in Glasgow in 1843, I ot pay particular attention for a year or two; after I was a year or two in the business, were somewhere about 40.

96. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What year would be?—I should say about 1850.

97. Chairman.] When did you become tary to the Pawnbrokers' Association in gow?—I think it would be about the year

98. How many pawnbrokers were there in ssociation?—About 30 in Glasgow, after the was passed in 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 27) for pawns," there were 50 pawnbrokers, and there said to be some hundreds of "wee pawns." procurator fiscal commenced prosecutions that Act of 1856 was passed, which facilities for prosecuting the "wee pawns." quired two witnesses before, but one will do I think. It was represented that there were "wee pawns" at that time, but there were ably from 200 to 300 "wee pawns." Mr. glas commenced a prosecution against them that Act was passed, and in 1856 or 1857 108.

the number of licensed pawnbrokers rose from 50 to 116.

4399. Did the men who kept the "wee pawns" take out licenses?—Yes; it was that that caused the increase of the number. They took out licenses, and that caused the increase of the number from 50 to 116.

4400. What number of pawnbrokers are there now in Glasgow?—About 115 or 116, just the same number in 1857.

4401. Are there many "wee pawns" now in existence in Glasgow?—Yes; within these few years again the licensed pawnbrokers have not been increasing, but decreasing.

4402. Can you give the Committee any information as to the number of "wee pawns"?—I have only been told of it, but I am told that there are probably 100 carrying on the "wee pawn" system at the present time.

4403. In what way do the "wee pawns" carry on business?—They pretend to buy the goods, and sell them back to the same people again.

4404. Do you know of your own knowledge what rate they charge on the transactions?—They do it differently; some charge one penny a week.

4405. Are their charges generally higher than the charges made by the regular pawnbrokers?—Yes.

4406. If they were entirely stopped, would the working classes suffer any disadvantage?—Certainly not; they were all stopped in 1856 and 1857, and they could be stopped now.

4407. Why do the working classes pawn at the "wee pawns" in preference to the regular pawnbrokers?—I cannot explain it, but they do so.

4408. Are the articles of less value?—I will take in goods of the same value as go there, and yet they go and pay a far higher rate.

4409. Then the regular pawnbrokers in Glasgow do not object to receive articles of very small value?—No; besides a great many of the "wee pawns" take in on Sunday, and they take in after hours when the pawnbrokers are shut.

4410. Do you know, of your own knowledge, that the "wee pawns" are open on Sunday?—No, for I am not in Glasgow; further than that, the information which I have is perfectly reliable.

4411. You feel satisfied that that is the fact?—I feel satisfied that it is the fact some of them do business then.

4412. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] How many pawnbrokers are there in your district of Bridgeton?—There are four or five.

4413. Chairman.] Have you any information as to the number of articles which are pawned in Glasgow?—The calculation which I would make is that the number of pledges in the year would probably be about 5,000,000 in the city of Glasgow, as near as I can calculate.

4414. Can you form an opinion of the average value of each pledge?—The average value which I took in at the Cross of Glasgow is about 3*s.* 6*d.* of the pledges below 10*s.* The average of those above 10*s.* in what we call the "high book" would be probably from 20*s.* to 25*s.*, because some of them would be gold watches.

4415. Are the articles pledged in Glasgow principally articles of clothing?—In my business at the Cross a great number were watches and jewellery, because they came from all quarters round about the country, that being the centre of the town; but in Bridgton clothing is the principal part, and I found in my stock, when I took it, that out of about 3,000*l.* there is only about 400*l.* worth of watches and jewellery.

Mr. W. Scoular.

4416. Are there many articles of domestic furniture?—I do not take them in at all. I would not take them in because they would not pay.

4417. Have you tools?—Very little; scarcely any.

4418. Is the principal part clothing?—Yes.

4419. Have you ever been in the habit of taking as pledges manufactured articles, such as cloth?—Very little.

4420. Are there any pawnbrokers in Glasgow who do so?—There are some who do that with shopkeepers; but I have done very little of that for I did not find it profitable.

4421. Then your business, perhaps, was not one of the largest businesses at the Cross?—At the Cross when I first commenced business the capital employed was about 6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.*; but before I had given it up it was somewhere about 3,000*l.*, or rather less. It diminished, because when I commenced business we had the pledges from Pollockshaws and Kirkintilloch, and all about the country, when there were no pawnbrokers there; but after they started I lost the pledging round about the country in a great measure..

4422. In what way do you sell the articles above 10*s.*?—I sell them all by public sale.

4423. At what public sales?—I sell with different auctioneers; but principally with Mr. Davidson.

4424. Do you send the articles to his auction rooms to be sold there?—I send the whole of my goods there.

4425. Not on your own premises, but off your premises?—Yes; off my premises.

4426. How often has he sales of unredeemed pledges?—Five days a week, from half-past 12 to four, and from half-past seven to 10 P.M. There are four or five others selling continually every day.

4427. Are you in the habit of putting a reserved price upon the pledges?—Never; I just sell them as they go.

4428. Do you generally make a profit, or a loss?—I will show you the profit if you like. You will find it a very small affair.

4429. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you attend your own sales?—Yes; I attend them all.

4430. Do you reserve to yourself the right of bidding?—No; I do not bid for a single article.

4431. When you have once determined to put them up by auction, you let them go?—I let them all go; I have no other way of selling them.

4432. I am speaking not of selling, but of buying; do not you hold yourself at liberty to buy an article which you put up?—I know I have the liberty, but I never do it, because when I did attempt it, and bought an article at one sale to sell at another, I found that I did not get so much at the next sale.

4433. Chairman.] Have you a shop where you sell articles?—I used to have one; but I could not sell the articles, and I have no sale shop now.

4434. Is it a fact that articles upon which you advanced, from the 1st of June 1867 to the 1st of June 1868, 1,469*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, sold for 1,198*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*?—Yes.

4435. And you lost upon that transaction?—You will find that there was only one sixpence profit in the whole year, and that sixpence was on the sale of books.

4436. In the next year upon articles upon which you advanced 1,821 l. 0*s.* 6*d.*, did you obtain on sale 1,486 l. 0 s. 6 d., losing exactly 335 l.?—Yes; there is my book if you want to see it to prove it (producing a book).

4437. Why was it that you valued those articles so much above their real value?—We cannot get them cheaper; competition makes us lend so much above the value; and another reason is, that an article, which will be worth 10 s. this year, may probably not fetch 4 s. next year, and we are obliged to sell them in that way; the goods fall, in value and fashions change. The half of those goods that come to the public sale are pledged by "duffers," who buy them at the sale, and then re-pledge them, and get a profit upon it, which we cannot avoid. Competition is so great in Glasgow that if you did not do it another man would lend more. A coat which may be worth 1 l. to the wearer, will probably not draw 5 s. at a sale.

4438. I think you said that your capital was reduced to 3,000 l.?—Yes.

4439. Is not 335 l. above 10 per cent. upon the 3,000 l.?—You will observe that that includes the two places of business; the sales are from both places; I never could sell the one without the other to the same advantage.

4440. So that this represents the loss upon a capital of how much?—I think the calculation is given in the paper which I have handed in that is money advanced in 12 years (handing in a paper); you will see there the amount of each year.

4441. This statement shows that upon 1,821 l. 0 s. 6 d., money lent without interest, you only realised 1,486 l. 0 s. 6 d. after paying the auctioneer, being a loss of 335 l., or nearly 19 per cent. upon your unredeemed pledges; on what is the 19 per cent. calculated?—It is calculated upon the amount which I have sent to the sale.

4442. With regard to the articles which have been deposited with you, and discovered afterwards to be stolen, in 12 years you have transacted business to the value of 145,095 l.; and during those years you have had to give up to the police 62 l. 10 s. worth of stolen articles, have you not?—Yes, that was in the 12 years at the Cross, the worst place in the City for stolen property to be got.

4443. You stated that at another shop where your business, during five years, amounted to 59,766 l., the amount recovered by the police was 5 l. 15 s. 1 d. for stolen goods?—Yes, that is in Bridgeton.

4444. You also wished the Committee to be informed that in Glasgow the number of articles actually reported as stolen to the police in one year is 8,966?—Yes, I make the calculation from the notices which we get regulary every day.

4445. Can you tell the Committee how many of those articles were recovered?—No.

4446. You have not that information?—No; those notices would give it, but it would require calculation.

4447. In your statement, with regard to the largest of your transactions, you give the amount of goods surrendered to the police; can you give the Committee the number of articles which form that amount?—I cannot give it, because I have only taken it from my books, and my books only show

v the amount of money lent during the year; e were a good many watches amongst them; re was only one or two gold watches in 27 s, and one of them was a 4 l. advance; and it taken to Edinburgh, and I never got a proper unt of whether it was really stolen or not.

48. Is much stolen property pledged in pro- ion to the number of pawnbrokers?—No, amount is very small.

49. Would it be possible for the police ers or the public to examine forfeited pledges e they were sold, with a view to identifying n property?—They have an opportunity with fore sale, if they choose, and they do so. The m which they adopt in Glasgow is, that they power to examine our books; they have r to order us to show every article in our ession; and they bring the party who has lost articles, and make us show the different les, so that they may see whether it is their e or not.

50. Do the police do that continually?—The e do that continually. I have had five dif- t officers in a day at my shop at the Cross. Police Act gives them that power.

51. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] They have no power r the general Act to do that, but it is under Glasgow Police Act, is it not?—It is under Glasgow Police Act.

52. Chairman.] Do you think that power es them to detect stolen property when it is ited with a pawnbroker?—It gives them advantage which it is possible that they can

53. Would you wish to deprive them of that ntage?—I feel it an annoyance sometimes they come four or five times a day, but at ame time I think it necessary.

54. You think that it is the duty of an st man to afford all means for the discovery me?—Yes, I think it is important, although sometimes somewhat derogatory to the pawn- ers.

55. If you had reason to suspect that one or forfeited pledges were the produce of theft, d it not be possible for you to keep back such cted pledges and sell them in a more private er?—There is nothing impossible, but I did it, and I do not see the advantage of my part, because selling unredeemed pledges een a losing concern, and it is certainly the broker's interest to see that he takes in no goods.

56. Did you ever hear of a pawnbroker g been detected in such practices?—None asgow.

57. Have you had many instances where ns, after having pledged their articles, and edeemed them, have come at the expiration elve months, and asked you to show to them ur book the amount which you received for rticle by public auction?—I have had it years ago, but I do not think that I have any person making that application these n years; and it would be of little conse- ce, because I do not believe that I have sold dge for 12 years which would really pay the est of the pawnbroker and the expenses of ale.

58. There would be nothing for the poor who pawned the article?—Nothing but a which they are entitled to pay honourably ey choose.

59. Are you in the habit of dividing a pledge into more than one pledge when it is deposited with you?—Never; I think it is a mistaken notion for any pawnbroker to do so, if ever they do so. I never saw the benefit of it.

4460. If a person were to bring several articles at a time would you give him always one ticket, and only one ticket?—Never otherwise, unless wished.

4461. Is it not customary in Glasgow to split the pledge?—They must be very foolish pawnbrokers who do it. I do not think that it is common, or that it is done at all; at any rate I am not aware of it.

4462. On what day of the week do you receive most deposits?—We receive the largest number of deposits on Mondays principally.

4463. At what time are they principally taken out again?—The heaviest day is Saturday, when the money is coming in.

4464. Then the process is, as some of the witnesses have stated, that persons bring on a Monday their clothes which they do not require during the week, and take them out on the Saturday for the Sunday's wear, is that the case?—The case is this: that those parties are always a week behind, and are obliged to come on Saturday night with the wages which they have received to lift their Sunday clothes, and they are necessitated to come back on Mondays to pay their shop bills and other demands.

4465. Do you consider that a large proportion of the Sunday clothes amongst the poorer classes of Glasgow are in pledge during the whole of the week?—On Mondays they are the heaviest pledges for this reason; but during the week it is merely temporary advances which they require, and they are generally smaller in amount.

4466. But the Sunday clothes remain from Monday morning to Saturday night?—Yes; and sometimes from one year's end to the other.

4467. Do you recognise the same clothes come in over and over again week after week?—They may come in for two or three weeks at a time, but not every week for a whole year. There is never such a thing.

4468. But for some few weeks in succession?—Yes, for some few weeks. The people have been behind, and it is some time before they can, as it were, get up so that they are able to pay; besides, they have an advantage in pawning, because if they deal with a shop they have to pay probably 2 s. a pound for credit, while we can lend them 1 l. for a week or a month for 4 d., and therefore it is an advantage to them, and they know it.

4469. Is not Monday an idle day in Scotland?—No; not with the public works. It may be with some men, such as masons and labourers.

4470. But if the men are inclined to get drunk, is not Monday the day on which they would indulge in it?—Saturdays and Sundays are the days.

4471. You do not think that the money which is advanced by the pawnbrokers on the Monday is advanced for the purpose of supplying the men with drink?—No; so far as that is the case, it is on the Saturday night that the pawnbrokers are getting in the money, and Saturdays and Sundays are the times when there is so much drunkenness in Glasgow; therefore it proves that it is not the pawnbrokers' money which goes for drink at all. A few weeks ago there were in the central police office in Glasgow 195 parties on the Monday, most of them being there for drunkenness, or in connection with drunkenness, and, therefore, it was quite plain that it was not the pawnbrokers' money which enabled them to get drunk.

Mr. W. Scoular.

4472. Until what hour do you keep open at Glasgow?—I have always kept open from 8 o'clock to 7 o'clock.

4473. And on Saturdays?—Till 11 o'clock.

4474. Do you see any objection to the closing of pawnbroking businesses at an earlier hour on Saturdays?—It is almost impossible to do so, because I can see no advantage to the pawnbroker, but a disadvantage to the public; they would not get their clothes; and, besides, the present Act does not prohibit us giving out clothing up to 12 o'clock; on Saturday night it is only with regard to pledging, and we do not take in pledges after 11 o'clock.

4475. Do you think that because the Act does not prohibit a pawnbroker from taking pledges in up to 11 o'clock on Saturday night, he keeps his shop open after 11 o'clock?—He can keep the shop open for the accommodation of the public up to 11 o'clock.

4476. And no later?—I would not shut the door in their faces. In the summer time of the year, the people are generally later in coming, and it may be a few minutes, but we generally shut the door, and keep the people in who are to be served.

4477. Can you inform the Committee whether you are in the habit of requiring the name and address of every person who pawns with you?—I always do so.

4478. Do you require the exact name and address?—Yes; I never put another name down.

4479. And you have no reason to suppose that persons do not give their right names and addresses?—No; I think it is a very small number who do so. So far as my experience goes, the truth is that in Bridgeton we can name most of the parties.

4480. If they gave you a wrong name and address, you would know it?—Yes.

4481. Then there is not the same objection in Glasgow that there seems to be in other places to giving the right name and address?—I always get the right name and address.

4482. Is it not an advantage to the police to have the right name and address recorded in your books?—I believe it would be, but they do not put themselves to much trouble, because we often send goods to the police, giving a description of the party offering, and they never give themselves the trouble of making an inquiry about those parties. I had a case the other week with regard to a watch. A person came in to pledge a watch, and I saw the number mentioned in the report, but instead of the police reporting it correctly, they reported it as recovered. However, I was under the impression that it was a mistake; I got the person away to go to the office, in the hope that I should meet a policeman on the way, and I went from Bridgeton to the police office without discovering a policeman, and before we got to the office, the person ran off and got away from me. The police would not take the watch from me after I went, and they came afterwards and got it, but they never came to inquire the description of the party, which I could give them.

4483. That was an instance in which a pawnbroker, suspecting robbery, did his best to assist the police in detecting a thief?—Yes; if I could have got a policeman, the party would have been secured, but I could not get one for nearly hal a mile, and it was only near the police office th the party got away from me.

4484. With regard to the amount to be charg by a pawnbroker, have you any suggestions t make to the Committee?—My notion is that th rates are rather small, and they are too compli cated.

4485. How would you propose to have ther altered?—I propose that there shall be no fra tional parts, and no half months, which only giv facility for taking advantage.

4486. Have you a form of your pawn-ticket?— Yes.

4487. Will you hand it in to the Committee —Yes (handing in the same).

4488. Do you think that this is in exact con formity with the law?—I can see nothing wron in it.

4490. In addition to the place where you carr on your business, you have printed on the tick the name of the place where you reside?- Yes.

4491. Do you also fill up all those blanks?- Yes.

4492. You put on your ticket the name of th person who has deposited the pledges, whether h is a housekeeper or whether he is a lodger?- We score out the one, whichever it is. If he is housekeeper we score out the "L," and if he is lodger we score out the "H."

4493. Is every ticket properly filled up?- Those are my orders; there might be a case which when we are very busy, they were not strictly carried out.

4494. Do your servants fill in the blank the counterfoil all the details which you fill up the ticket itself?—All we put there is the pri of the article, and that is put upon the bundle.

4495. Then the number is the index to th ticket?—Yes; the number is the only thing th leads us to the identification of the article.

4496. Is this pawn-ticket the ticket which y give to the person who has deposited the pled with you?—Yes; and the small part is past on the parcel.

4497. So that the number on the parcel co responds with the number on the pawn-ticket? Yes.

4498. Do you see any objection to having t rates which you charge and the amount of inter properly entered upon the pawn-tickets whi you give to the parties?—I see no objection the Act was made perfectly plain, but if the were fractional parts it would be almost impo sible to do so.

4499. Have you any suggestions to offer w regard to an alteration in the law?—I have ne seen the great benefit of selling the pledges abo 10 s. for the benefit of the overplus to the pa who pledges; my opinion is that they ought be forfeited to the pawnbroker as well as the l pledges.

4500. Then you would make the pawnbrol and the person who pledges with him agree up the value of the article, and leave no surplus? Yes; there is no surplus at any rate, and the fore I do not see the benefit of it.

4501. Have you any suggestion to make w reg rd to the rate of interest?—I think there be very little addition to what exists if the tional parts were taken away.

02. Would you have a halfpenny for the t?—Yes; I can see no objection to that, but ver take a halfpenny for the sixpenny pledge.

03. For what amount do you charge a half- y?—For all above 6 d.

04. If a man gets 9 d. on a pledge do you ge him a halfpenny?—I have done it some- s, but I do not always do it; that is the law. entitled to charge a halfpenny on anything, I never do it for 6 d., and sometimes not for

05. Then you only charge the interest?—

06. What would you propose should be the adopted?—Probably a halfpenny a month for night bring a fair profit to the pawnbroker, use everything is raised in price, and a half- y now is of less value than a farthing was the Pawnbrokers' Act passed, and therefore not see why there should not be an addition

07. A halfpenny a month added?—Yes, or part of a month.

08. You are in the habit of allowing certain of grace, of course, according to the Act?— but there are no days in the first month; is a week it is the same as a month.

09. Have you any other suggestion to make? do not recollect any.

10. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You have handed in tement from June 20th, 1867 to April 27th, , showing the amount which you had ad- ed upon certain kinds of goods, the sums at h they were sold, and the loss sustained upon ; can you give us the total amount which have advanced during that period?—It is e.

11. Is this the whole business which you done?—Yes, that is the whole business. rything which I have sold by public sale is e. This includes high and low; I sell every- g by public auction. I have taken it in this : the amount of stock in 1858 was 4,052 l.; ve multiplied that three times, the capital of stock being turned over three times a year, therefore it brings it out at 12,156 l. as the unt which was advanced that year, and so all otation, showing the amount of the stock, ng the calculation at three times from that.

12. Then the loss upon unredeemed pledges ng that period was 271 l.?—Yes, in both es.

13. Was there no profit at all?—No, except 6 d. I never had a sale with a profit during whole two years, and the auction charges are n off. Those are just the sums that I received the auctioneer.

14. Then you will have a loss of about 350 l. n the 12,000 l.?—No, that is upon the two s, and the two offices are included there, be- e I could not separate them. At the other e, I calculate that it would be that year 27 l.

15. That makes 28,000 l. then?—Yes.

16. Mr. Hambro.] You have just made a strong remark respecting the police at Glas- ; will you tell me who manages the police at gow?—Mr. Smart did, but he died about a th since, and Mr. McCall has got into his ation about a month ago.

17. When the police were so inattentive to you, was Mr. Smart alive?—Yes. I find them inattentive in trying to find out the parties; but we find them very attentive if they can find the article in our books, to suit them to take it away. That is the simplest way to find stolen property, and therefore they make a show of it.

Mr. W. Scoular.

4518. You say that you never had an auction sale which produced a profit in those two years; are you calculating, when you speak of profit, the amount at which you bought in the article?—I never buy in any of the articles. I suppose the auctioneer can show the book here to you just now. Everything goes.

4519. You told us just now that you had sustained a considerable loss; I suppose that is made up in some other part of your business?—On the goods that are lifted by persons where the interest is paid there is a profit.

4520. You get a profit which counterbalances that loss?—To a certain extent, but here are a year's profits, and you can judge of it. In that year I realized nothing, not even 5 per cent. for my money.

4521. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You mean upon the unredeemed pledges?—Altogether.

4522. Mr. Morley.] Why should you propose to charge a month for a fortnight?—There is one consideration, that it is not interest to the pawnbroker; it is to pay his expenses. His expenses are as great in taking in and giving out a pledge, supposing that it is put in just now and lifted within an hour. It costs me 1¾ d. for every pledge.

4523. Would it not be better to charge more interest than to charge the same for a month as you would for a fortnight?—If this were entirely interest it would be, but it is not interest, it is labour that that is to pay for. If it were for interest alone it might be a different thing.

4524. Mr. Alderman Carter.] That remark only applies to pledges of a small amount, I suppose?—The cost of the pledges altogether to me in expenses amounts to 1¾ d., without anything for my own trouble.

4525. Mr. Morley.] I think I understood you to say that you did not believe in the principle of returning the surplus to the depositor?—I do not see the benefit of it to any person.

4526. But, surely, if there is a balance in his favour he ought to have it, ought he not? No doubt; but the restriction as it were does an injury. Upon all the forfeited pledges for the two years, high and low, I only made sixpence.

4527. What proportion of pledges are unredeemed?—I had about 10 in 100 fallen out at the Cross, and in Bridgeton from four to five.

4528. It is upon the unredeemed pledges that you get a profit, is it not?—That is a sample of the profit, a loss of 300 l. a year.

4529. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You get your profits out of those pledges which are redeemed, I presume?—Yes, anything which we do get.

4530. But you have a loss with those which are not redeemed?—Yes.

4531. Mr. Morley.] You told the honourable Chairman that you were quite willing that the charge should remain for a ticket; what reason is there that the charge should remain for the ticket?—Because it is to help to pay for the labour.

4532. Is it not the extra money which you charge for?—If an article is put in to-day and lies an hour we have just the same labour as if it were put in and laid there for a month.

4533. But

Mr. W. Scoular.
18 July 1870.

4533. But the profit which you receive on the transaction is in the price which you charge, is it not?—Yes; but the small pledges do not nearly pay.

4534. Had you not better charge a higher price for them?—But we cannot; we are not allowed to do so.

4535. Would you not like that change to be made?—I think it would be a hardship upon the poor people.

4536. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do I understand you that you do not get any profit whatever upon small pledges redeemed within a month?—Yes, that is so; the profit is only after they lie two or three months.

4537. Mr. Hambro.] You have seen that in the new Pawnbrokers' Bill it is proposed to reduce the time within which pledges should be redeemable from 12 months to six months; what is your view as to that?—I should be opposed to that, I must say.

4538. Chairman.] Will you give your reasons for opposing it?—I think that the 12 months is most suitable. If it were six months the people who wished to redeem their goods would neglect them, and the 12 months, as it were, puts them more in mind of the time. Another reason that I have is, that the brokers, or what are called "duffers," buy at our sales and re-pledge the goods. Just now they can only do it once a year, but they would be able to do it twice a year, if the time were six months.

4539. You think also that it is rather hard upon the poor?—Yes; I think that they would neglect goods which they intended to redeem.

4540. And you do not see that the 12 months would be in any way injurious to your trade?—I have seen nothing to alter my opinion as to that; but I think that the three months additional is objectionable.

4541. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You said, I think, when speaking of those losses on the sales, that the losses were occasioned principally by the deterioration of the goods, in consequence of the changes in the fashion; do you not think that your losses would be less if you sold at six months rather than at 12 months, as the fashion would not have changed so much?—I do not think so; because there are goods which have been pledged with pawnbokers, and have been going in and out probably for 12 years. Now those goods must be getting old fashioned.

4542. They must be cast iron, I should think, else they would have been worn out before that time?—I have had an eight-day clock in for 20 years.

4543. You spoke of pledges for 6 d.; are there many of those pledges?—We avoid them if possible, only we have to accommodate people whom we know.

4544. Are there many of them at 1 s.?—Yes; but I think that the greatest number will go from 2 s. to 2 s. 6 d. There are a very small number below that.

4545. Your average rises from a few articles being at a high price, I suppose?—Yes; at one of my shops at that place I took in a good many watches, and these watches increased the average.

4546. Chairman.] If an article of winter clothing be pledged in April or March, would there not be an advantage in selling it at the end of six months, when it would be wanted again for winter?—It might be an advantage in some cases, but it might not in others.

4547. In the case of blankets, when persons do not require them in spring, will they not be wanted in autumn?—Yes; I may state in regard to blankets that two-thirds of the blankets in the pawn offices in Glasgow are club blankets. There are very few blankets which have been worn by the parties. The club people press the blankets upon the people, and when they want money they are obliged to pledge them.

4548. Still, would not the blanket be worth more and be more competed for if it was sold in October than if it was sold April?—They are not competed for; they are the worst stock we have. I am overstocked with blankets, and other shops, are in the same position.

4549. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] How many club blankets may you have?—I have never counted them; but I suppose that I might in each stock probably have 200 pairs, making a rough guess at it, and there are not only the blankets, but there are the mats. They generally get people to take a pair of blankets and a carpet mat for 20 s.

4550. Have not the number of club-houses in Glasgow diminished?—No, they have increased. They used to be with regard to blankets and so on, but they are now with regard to family Bibles and clothing from tailors.

4551. Chairman.] You spoke of "duffers," do you mean that the "duffing" trade in Glasgow is different to what it is in London?—So far as I can hear the accounts of the "duffing" trade in London, they speak of watches and jewellery, but ours is more on account of the competition in lending on clothing. They can buy clothing at our sales and re-pledge at a profit.

4552. You really advance more money upon them than the persons have given who bought at the sales?—Yes.

4553. That is totally different from the "duffing" trade in London?—They speak about jewellery, and that is a very different matter.

4554. Are many of the pawnbrokers in Glasgow in the habit of keeping sale shops?—I think there are six or seven out of the 116 in Glasgow who keep sale shops.

4555. Are all of them in the habit of selling every pledge which they have by auction?—Yes.

4556. You have been secretary to the Pawnbrokers' Association; have many of them failed or become bankrupt?—I think as many, in proportion to the number of pawnbrokers, as any other trade; but I must say that they have never appeared at Glasgow in the bankrupt lists; they have mostly signed trust deeds; and I know a good many such cases within the last few years.

4557. In the paper which you have handed in you give the amount of your profits during the year 1867, and during the year 1868, and you make the profit from June 1867 to May 1868 which is 12 months, 504 l. 5 s. 9 d; you make the expenses of carrying on the business 281 l. 13 s. 3 d., and you put the value of the premises at 90 l. rent?—The reason why I do that is, that those were premises which were my own, and that was the valued rental of them.

4558. Is that for both establishments, or only one?—For the one in the Salt Market.

4559. You put the loss on forfeited goods at 129 l. 9 s. 7½ d.?—Yes, I have taken the hal he loss, although the loss would be greater on forfeited goods from Salt Market.

560. You make the total expenses 501 l. 2 s. , against 504 l. 5 s. 9 d.; then you put the unt of stock, and you charge 5 per cent. in- st upon it, which makes 156 l. 5 s., so that, in you make a loss of 153 l. 2 s. 2 d.?—Yes.

561. But you say that the 104 l. is charged in expenses as being 2 l. per week for yourself, consequently, you made an actual loss of 2 s. 2 d ?—Yes, that year.

562. Is that a thing which has occurred often e conduct of your business?—That is the case he last two or three years, and that was one on why I was induced to give up that busi- , because I did not find it to pay.

563. That was owing to the peculiar circum- ces of that business?—Not the peculiar cir- stances, but the great loss on the forfeited s.

564. Having given the Committee the balance t of the one business, are you prepared to the balance sheet of the other?—I did not it with me; I may state that the other ness is a better paying business, for this on; that the goods are better lifted, and the ey is lent three and a-half times a year there, reas it was only turned three times at the s.

565. Then it would be very unfair for the mittee to presume that this represents the broking business in Glasgow?—I think it esents it in the central parts of Glasgow to a great extent.

566. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] As you have given e statement, perhaps you would not object to us the other?—I should have no objection so; I may state that that is a business which little better. In the Bridgeton district the ls are of a better class, and are better lifted, probably the loss on the sales was a little less, gh I have divided it there; but I have sold Bridgeton business, and I give it up entirely on 1st of August.

567. Chairman.] You are retiring from busi- altogether?—Yes, altogether.

568. Have you ever been in any other busi- ?—No, but I have a great deal of property les that.

569. Still the pawnbroking business has been business in which you have occupied your ?—Yes.

570. Will you state to the Committee what nium you got for the business which you e sold?—I have sold it in this way: that I 10 per cent. upon the money advanced; but this 10 per cent. is already belonging to it, because there is that 10 per cent. due upon the goods.

Mr. W. Scoular.

4571. You have adopted the same plan that they adopt in London; you have sold your business for the money advanced with 10 per cent. additional?—Yes.

4572. The person who has bought the business has taken upon himself the responsibility of all the pledges, and gives you 10 per cent. upon the money advanced?—Yes.

4573. And he pays you a rent for your premises?—Yes; he has a lease for 10 years at the valued rent of 50 l. The Cross-place I sold to the town; this is my property also in Bridgeton, and that is the rental.

4574. The Committee are to understand that the business which you have sold is a much better one than the business at the Cross?—It pays better for the amount of money.

4575. And you are able to turn your capital over three times in the year?—Three times at the Cross and three and a-half times at Bridgetown.

4576. Mr. Hambro.] And sometimes four times?—No, it could not be; I have a calculation in some of those papers showing that it is only three and a-half times.

4577. Chairman.] Is there anything which you have omitted to state to the Committee which you would like to communicate to them?—I do not remember anything.

4578. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I understood you to say that you had 200 pairs of club blankets; did you say that there were club bibles as well as club blankets?—The bibles for which the parties pay 30 s. do not realise at the public sales the money advanced, and not much more than the price of the binding; the auctioneers will probably have 200 or 300 bibles to sell at every quarterly sale.

4579. All from pawnbrokers?—All from pawnbrokers; 20 parties agree to buy some bibles and they pay each a 1 s. a week, and they draw lots who shall have the first bible and so on.

4580. Do they do so with wearing apparel and blankets in the same way?—I cannot speak as to that; they get club blankets by paying so much a week.

4581. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] The Arrestment of Wages Bill being passed now will prevent that a good deal, will it not?—It will have that effect.

4582. Against the club shops?—There will be less of those goods got unless the club agents risk more.

Mr. Arthur Davidson, called in; and Examined.

583. Chairman.] Are you a partner in the of Davidson and Company, Auctioneers, in sgow?—Yes.

584. Are you the person who officiates as tioneer?—Yes.

585. Are you in the habit of selling unre- med pledges?—Yes.

586. Are you employed by many of the pawn- kers of Glasgow to do so?—I think that during time I have been employed by the whole of n; but I cannot be employed by the whole of n in one year, because there are four or five us in the same trade.

587. How often have you sales?—During the last 12 months, I think, that with the exception of a fortnight in January, and a fortnight in July, that is the holiday time, I only lost three days except Saturdays and Sabbaths. I am in the habit of selling five days in the week, day and night, commencing at half-past twelve in the morning, and at half-past seven in the evening.

Mr. A. Davidson.

4588. Were those sales altogether of unredeemed pledges?—I sell for other people as well; I often have furniture sales and jewellery sales going on. During the last year I have been employed four days a week in the sale of unredeemed pledges.

Mr A. Davidson.

18 July 1870.

4589. What is the value of a day's sale of unredeemed pledges?—They vary greatly from perhaps 150 l. to 30 l.

4590. The last witness told us that every article which was pawned with him was sold under the hammer; are you in the habit of selling for Mr. Scoular?—Yes.

4591. Do you advertise articles which are sold of a lower value than 10 s.?—I advertise them in the bills which we post through the public streets of Glasgow.

4592. Are they included under the term "miscellaneous articles"?—No, that means odd articles.

4593. Can you produce an advertisement showing us that you were going to sell pledges under 10 s.?—This bill (producing a paper) would contain it; a set of studs, for instance, or a pencil case, or a pair of ear-rings.

4594. But these bills, showing persons that they will have the opportunity of buying jewellery and ornaments, do not show persons that they will have the opportunity of buying clothing?—The bill before you is exclusively of a jewellery sale.

4596. What are the persons who generally attend those sales?—Principally brokers, or people who keep second-hand goods shops.

4597. Do very few of the public come?—Some days we have a great number of the public, but the principal purchasers are brokers.

4598. No pawnbrokers?—No pawnbrokers; the pawnbrokers have no opportunity of selling them.

4599. But the pawnbrokers who keep sale shops have an opportunity of selling them?—I do not know whether they can sell them on their own premises. They do generally, if they can manage it, under 10 s., but I do not know many of them in Glasgow who do.

4600. Are there no pawnbrokers in Glasgow who have shops in which they sell the pledges, and other articles as well?—I ran that through in my mind coming up in the train, and I think there are six pawn offices in Glasgow which have sale shops attached.

4601. Do not those six pawnbrokers purchase articles at your sales, just as any other broker would do?—No.

4602. Do you never see those pawnbrokers who have sale shops at your auctions attending the sales?—No.

4603. Where do they get their goods?—They get them from their own stock as they fall out or become forfeits.

4604. But if they are forfeited, and above the value of 10 s., they are bound to sell them by auction, are they not?—Then they are sold by auction.

4605. Then cannot they come and buy them at the auction?—Yes, they can, the same as the other part of the public, the sale being a public one.

4606. Do they not do so?—The cases are very very exceptional.

4607. Do those pawnbrokers who have sale shops never put a reserve price on those articles which are put under your hammer when they are above 10 s. or below 10 l.?—I have had a case or two where a pawnbroker would say to me before I began the sale, "I have advanced 5 l. upon that watch; I want the lent money," and of course in such a case I would buy the watch back and give it to the pawnbroker; but the probability is that it would come back to me again, he being compelled by Act to sell by auction, and this not being done, cannot sell any other way; it is a very rare thing.

4608. Does not the pawnbroker appear there as a bidder; is he not watching the sale as it goes on?—Of course; he hands up the goods to me.

4609. If he does not buy the goods himself, he might have someone who might be agreed upon to buy for him, might he not?—I should know that at once; I know all my buyers. That is what we term in other sales, such as furniture sales, where cabinet makers are in the habit of putting goods in auctions, "white-hatting," or people attending sales for the purpose of standing behind a lady or gentleman bidding for goods and running them on them.

4610. It is not the case of pawnbrokers' sales in Glasgow as it is in London, that the person who sends the goods to be sold regularly bids for the goods himself?—No, it is very exceptional.

4611. Do you think that the articles sold at those sales have as good a chance of fetching their real value as if sold by any other process?—We give every facility for making those sales known, and the auctioneer, not the pawnbroker, is compelled by Act of Parliament to advertise all those sales in two papers two days previous to the sales. That Bill that you have before you just now we would advertise as often as eight, nine or ten times in all the different papers both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, for the purpose of having as many at the sale as possible.

4612. What is the meaning of "high pledges?"—All goods advanced upon by pawnbroker above 10 s. and under 10 l.

4614. Have you your books here which show the amount realized?—Yes (producing the Books). Those are the sales from October to December 1868.

4615. Does this show the person on whose behalf the sale is made?—It does. (explaining the Books).

4616. The first column is the price at which the article is sold, I presume; what is the second column?—Cash received at the time of the sale. I have no reserve price.

4617. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Does the pawnbroker give you a list of the articles for sale, for the purpose of getting money at the sale?—No; this bill guides me at the sale. I take one of those with the heading off. The pawnbroker provides a M.S. catalogue so that I may have the bills printed.

4618. Then the article is handed up to you without your having in your hand a list of the articles themselves?—Without any list from the pawnbroker. I know nothing at all except as I have stated in very very rare instances, as to what is advanced on the goods. I am there for the purpose of selling as well as I can.

4619. That is perfectly understood; but supposing a pawnbroker were to bid for his own goods, would you accept that as a proper bid?—Certainly, because I look upon the pawnbroker as having only a lien over the goods, and as having ng a right to produce his money which he has anced. Of course I rebel if they attempt to nything of that sort, and will not allow them. commission being paid for goods bought back, auctioneer can have no interest in selling ls to the pawnbroker at his own sale.

620. Chairman.] Here is a sale of the Glas- Equitable Loan Company's jewellery on the h of December 1868. There is an entry here gold lever watch, No. 20,481, and here is a ginal price of 108*s.*, and no value is carried ; what does that mean?—That has gone back he pawnbroker's.

621. Is that a reserved price below which it not to be sold?—Yes.

622. Then I find again a rifle gun 47*s.*, that ot entered out?—That is exactly the same.

623. I find another gold lever 118*s.*, has that e back to the pawnbroker?—Yes.

624. Mr. Alderman Carter.] In the case when said that it went back to the pawnbroker's, I to understand that it was knocked down at ice under the reserved bid, or was it knocked n to the pawnbroker at the reserve bid?—I scarcely understand what is meant by a re- e bid.

625. In the case of this gold watch, the pawn- ker has to sell it, and according to law he t sell it by auction; it is handed over to you he auctioneer, and you put it up, do you not ck it down to somebody?—Yes.

626. Then you will knock it down to the nbroker?—Yes. As far as I can read the vnbrokers Act I understand that the pawn- ker having advanced, we will say 2*l.* or 3*l.*, so, upon the article, is interested to that unt. It may be a very bad sale, because ons will occur when sales are bad and sales good. If his goods are not going well, as h for his own protection as for the protection he pledger, the article is knocked down to the nbroker. In the instance which has been tioned in that sale I know perfectly well that lgers are regularly in the habit of coming k for overplus, so that in all probability I have l those watches since, or I may have to sell m again, they having no sale-room of their , and also explanation given to 4607.

627. Chairman.] A set of studs with reserved e of 9*s.* was not sold?—You see the obvious son there; more than 10*s.* had been lent upon n; that is a high pledge.

628. Here is a diamond ring with a reserve 303*s.*?—That is a private loan.

629. Here is another article with a reserve 195*s.*?—That would be a private loan, I nk.

630. Here is a diamond ring with a reserve 45*s.*; that cannot be a private loan?—That is t of a lot.

631. You say that where a private loan has n advanced upon several articles, if one article f less value than 10*l.* you sell it, and feel that have power to control the sale?—The pawn- ker may consider that he is losing upon the nsaction; besides, private loans are not pawn- king transactions at all, they do not require sell them by auction unless they choose.

632. And, therefore, the pawnbroker con- trols the sale?—No, the auctioneer controls the sale; were the pawnbrokers to attempt to control the sale they would have none, as the dealers would not attend.

4633. Mr. Hambro.] Do the pawnbrokers sell the things for less than they are worth in the market?—No; the pawnbroker may have the power of putting a bid into a sale with an article which the auctioneer considers under value.

4634. If the things go for less than they are really worth, does the pawnbroker buy them back again?—No.

4635. Who buys them again?—The dealers. The cases are very rare where things are bought back.

4636. Do they generally fetch their value?—No, they do not often draw the advanced money.

4637. And yet the pawnbroker allows them to go for nothing?—No, he does not allow them to go for nothing.

4638. You said just now that he let them go for anything?—Yes, for whatever is bid for them, in a great number of instances. Nothing and anything are different words.

4639. You do not mean to tell the Committee that a pawnbroker who has a heap of things to be sold by auction, lets them go for a few pence or a few shillings, when they are worth a great many pounds?—No, I do not think he does. Such a case never has occurred in my experience, there are always some persons at the sales who know about the value of the goods and would not allow such a thing to occur.

4640. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you find in practice, as an auctioneer, that the majority of articles that are put up do go at the price bid for them, without any interference on the part of the pawnbroker?—Yes; I have sold week after week for pawnbrokers, and never an article has been bought in.

4641. Mr. Plimsoll.] I believe it is the case in Glasgow and the neighbourhood, that many of the pawnbrokers have no sale shops at all, and are obliged to sell their unredeemed pledges by auction?—Yes; they are obliged to send them to auction sales.

4642. And unredeemed pledges being but a small proportion of the whole property pledged with them, they are content to let them fetch what they will, even though the sale involves a loss?—Yes. Perhaps my idea may be rather a peculiar one upon that subject, but I look upon it that the money realised for the forfeited goods of a pawnbroker ought to represent in value his gross profit.

4643. Mr. Alderman Carter.] We have it in evidence here, that there are in Edinburgh many sham sales got up for the sale of pawnbrokers' pledges, is that correct?—That remark was applied to Glasgow as well, and I am very glad that you have given me the opportunity of mentioning it. Since I commenced as an auctioneer, in 1861, I have never known, either in Edinburgh or Glasgow, of a single pawnbroker having his goods sold on his premises.

4644. If that was anything like a general practice in Edinburgh you would know it?—Certainly. I receive catalogues frequently from auctioneers in Edinburgh advertising their sales.

JOHN WHITWELL, Esq., in the Chair.

Sir William Bodkin, Knight, called in; and Examined.

Sir W. Bodkin.

21 July 1870.

4645. Chairman.] You are Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Court of Session, are you not?—I am.

4646. The Committee have requested your attendance on this occasion, as they wish to have the advantage of your experience as to the operation of the existing laws for the regulation of pawnbrokers; have you any suggestions to offer with regard to the proposals for altering the law?—I do not feel competent to give any opinion at all upon the subject with which this Bill is prepared; that is, to alter the rates upon which pledges are received and redeemed, as I have no experience upon that subject.

4647. If Parliament legislates, it would wish to legislate in the direction of improving the law upon all other matters as well as upon the question of altering the rates; are there any points other than that upon which you can inform the Committee?—The only opportunity which I have had of judging of the way in which pawnbroking is conducted is in courts of criminal judicature; of course, the Committee are aware that a very large proportion of stolen property finds its way into the hands of persons who carry on this trade.

4648. From your experience, do you find that most of the property stolen finds its way into the hands of pawnbrokers?—A very considerable portion, certainly.

4649. Have you found the pawnbrokers generally willing to give all the information which may be necessary to accomplish the ends of justice?—I should be sorry to say that there are not some pawnbrokers who conducted their business in a most respectable manner, and are very respectable persons; but I cannot extend that opinion to all, because we have frequently cases before us in which the utmost recklessness is shown in the reception of property, which turns out afterwards to be stolen.

4650. Do you think that the law, if it were altered, should give any additional power to the police?—I do not know that the police require more power than they possess now; the Legislature itself has thought that the fact of a pawnbroker forfeiting the money which he advances on property which is stolen, is a sufficient check upon any carelessness in the reception of such property; but I do not think that it is sufficient.

4651. In what way would you recommend that it should be enlarged?—I think, speaking with very great submission upon such a subject, that if gross carelessness were exhibited, and it were proved in any case to the satisfaction of the court, and of the jury who were trying the case, that there had been gross carelessness on the part of the pawnbroker or of his assistants (for those things are generally done by assistants and not by the principals), there should be some method of recording that by special endorsement of the license, or some measure of that sort, which after repeated instances being proved, ought to work prejudicially to the pawnbroker, either by the forfeiture of his license, or in some other way that the wisdom of Parliament might suggest.

4652. It has been suggested that as the business of pawnbroking is one which involves a great amount of contact with persons of bad character, only proper parties should be allowed to take out license; what is your opinion upon that point?—I do not know that any discretion is exercised any man can take out a license as a pawnbroker; but if that is so according to the present law, it might be useful to call upon such persons to enter into securities or recognizances for conducting their trade properly.

4653. You do not think it desirable that persons taking out licenses should obtain them from some bench of magistrates, or from some persons who are cognizant of their character?—Any method which in the wisdom of Parliament it might be considered would have the effect of confining the trade of pawnbrokers to persons of respectability would no doubt be useful; but whether it should be by transferring the right of granting license to magistrates or not, I am not prepared to say.

4654. In your opinion, would there not be danger of inflicting injury on the persons who pawned goods, if the number of pawnbrokers were limited?—I think the trade of pawnbrokers if properly exercised, is of very great convenience to the poorer class of the people.

4655. Have many instances of hardship of persons who have pawned goods come before you?—Those are not the kind of cases that would come before me. They would come before the police magistrates in the police courts. I believe that there are such cases.

4656. Have all the cases which have come before you been cases of detection of crime on account of goods being pledged with pawnbrokers?—Entirely.

4657. Do you think that there is any necessity to grant power to the police to search the houses of pawnbrokers, or to investigate their books, or any other facilities?—One would shrink from giving a power to search a man's house, unless there were very strong grounds for it.

4658. And 4658. And that can always be done by grant- a warrant?—Certainly.

4660. It has been stated here that very few es of stolen property, especially of plate and ellery, are brought before the court without being necessary to call in as a witness a vnbroker or his assistant; does your expe- nce confirm that?—It is very constantly the e; there are some exceptions, perhaps, in the her class of thieves, who deal very largely h stolen property, and who have other means disposing of it; but, in the general run of es, a robbery finds its way to the pawn- ker.

4661. The necessity of a pawnbroker exer- ng great care presents itself to your mind, ause it would be impossible to restrict a pawn- ker from taking in any description of pledges? do not know how you can restrict them, ex- t by inducing every man to conduct his busi- s honestly.

4662. It has been stated that plate bearing sts and initials has been pawned successively r and over again, would you think that it was all possible to prevent a pawnbroker from ing in such a pledge?—It is difficult to judge, ess you have all the circumstances of the case ore you; I know that it is very frequently case that butlers and persons in that posi- n in gentlemen's families, are in the habit of rying some of their masters' plate to the pawn- kers, and although it has the crest, and all the gnia of ownership upon it, money is advanced n it. This is very frequently done for the ommodation of the butler, and he takes that te out again, and restores it to his employer. t there have been cases before me in which, ere there have been ineffectual attempts to se the crest or the marks, the plate had still n received by the pawnbroker.

4663. Those are cases in which you think that pawnbroker ought to have been declared ating in caution?—Just so, and if he were y to be declared wanting in caution, not only the judge, but by the jury who tries the case; ink anyone would be safe, that there would no unnecessary severity shown.

4664. Then how would you put it to enable matter to be referred to a jury for decision, ld you leave it in the hands of the judge?— can now ask the jury whether they are of nion that there has been serious carelessness wn by the pawnbroker's assistant in the .108.

reception of stolen property, and if they say, yes, we do not allow the expenses to the witness; but that is the only discretion we have in the matter.

Sir W. Bodkin.

21 July 1870.

4665. But still you allow him to go back to his shop and do the same thing over and over again?—Certainly; we have no means of preventing him.

4666. Mr. Orr Ewing.] You think that if a pawnbroker is proved to the satisfaction of a judge and jury to have recklessly taken in pledges, which were afterwards discovered to be stolen property, he should be deprived of his license?—After a certain number of instances of that sort.

4667. Are you aware that at present the license is granted by the Inland Revenue?—Yes.

4668. It is granted merely upon the payment of a sum of money, without any inquiries as to the character of the individual?—That is so.

4669. Would you suggest that the Inland Revenue should be informed by the magistrates of a party who had been guilty of transgressing the law in that way, and that they should have the power of refusing the license?—I think that the Inland Revenue, if they found upon a man's license a certain number of indorsements of the kind which I indicate, would refuse to renew it.

4670. Do you not think it better that the pawnbroker should be put under the magistrates generally and that the Inland Revenue should only grant licenses to such parties as the magistrates approved of?—That is giving to the magistrates the same power over pawnbrokers as they now possess over public-houses and beer-houses; I doubt the policy of that myself.

4671. No respectable pawnbroker would suffer from that, I presume?—No, I should suppose that, generally speaking, a man who carries on a pawnbroker's trade bears a fair character, and is such a man as the magistrates could not refuse to grant a license to.

4672. You shrink from advising that the law should be changed, giving the police or the detective branch of the police the power to examine the books, and giving the magistrates power to stop the pawnbroker's license?—I should shrink from that, certainly; because at present there is power, upon any reasonable supposition that there is stolen property, to obtain a warrant from a magistrate to search a person's house whether he is a pawnbroker or not.

4673. You admit that a great deal of stolen property finds its way to the pawnbroker's?—No doubt it does.

4674. If a warrant is granted for searching for stolen property in a pawnbroker's, it is only granted as to an individual shop, I presume?—Yes.

4675. He would not give a general warrant to search all pawnbrokers?—Clearly not.

4676. If information was given to the police that certain property was stolen, and if there was no clue given as to which pawnbroking establishment, would it, in your opinion, tend to any benefit to give such warrant against one pawnbroking establishment?—You would not give a search warrant to that one unless there were strong grounds for the belief that the property was there.

4677. Therefore it would be of no benefit unless you had strong evidence that the property was there?—No.

Sir W. Bodkin.

21 July 1870.

4678. But is it not a very difficult thing to find out where property stolen during the night may be pledged?—No doubt it is. That is one of the inconveniences to which society must be subject I am afraid.

4679. Is it not frequently the case that when a thief is apprehended they find on his person or in his house a large number of pawn tickets?—Certainly.

4680. When, perhaps not by the pawnbrokers' own fault, but by reason of the facility which it gives to a thief, much stolen property finds its way to the pawnbrokers, do you not think that it would be for the benefit of the public that a general authority should be given to the detective portion of the police force to go into all establishments to examine their books and their property?—I should doubt very much if Parliament, in these days particularly, would ever sanction such a power as that.

4681. But do you not think that it would be for the benefit of the public that the police should have power to search all establishments, in the event of their knowing of a theft?—If I understand the honourable Member to suggest that, supposing a robbery is known to have been committed in a neighbourhood, or in some particular locality, the police ought to have a general authority and power to search all pawnbrokers; it appears to me that it would be much better that that should be done under the warrant of a magistrate.

4682. Are you aware that in Glasgow the police have the power of going in daily to see the books of pawnbrokers?—I am not aware of that; but I can quite understand that such a power would work usefully.

4683. Do you think that it would not tend to prevent stolen goods being pledged if the police had such power?—I have no doubt that it would have the effect of preventing instances of the pawning of stolen goods.

4684. Do you not think that everything should be done to prevent the facility of selling stolen property?—Consistently with the freedom which every branch of trade is supposed in this country to be allowed to be carried on.

4685. Pawnbroking you seem to think is useful to the poorer classes?—No doubt it is of very great use to the poorer classes.

4686. Do you extend that remark to the lowest amount pledged; for instance, 6*d.* or 1*s.*?—I think it is in those small instances that pawnbroking is most useful to the poorer classes.

4687. Do you think that it is a system that can do much good to the poorer classes to enable them to pledge for amounts so small as 1*s.* or 2*s.*?—I think so.

4688. Are you aware that in France they do not allow smaller pledges than 2*s.* 6*d.* to be made?—I am not aware of that.

4689. Do you not think that the present state of society may have grown up from the vicious system of getting those small amounts, and that it may be more necessary on that account than from any other principle?—I have certainly seen many instances, not in court, but out of court, of poor people who would be dreadfully distressed if they could not raise even 1*s.* on some article of dress, probably to provide them with food for the day.

4690. We have had a great deal of evidence that those small sums generally go in the purchase of drink, have you any knowledge of that?—I have no knowledge of that, except that which every member of society has, that drinking is unfortunately far too prevalent, and I dare say that in a great many instances small sums raised in that way may be carried to the gin palace.

4691. Have you many applicants before you for certificates for the loss of tickets?—No, those are at the magistrates' courts.

4692. Mr. R. Arkwright.] Do you think that the fact of the pawnbrokers being obliged to keep pledges for a year is beneficial to the pawners, and that they attach much value to it?—I have already said that upon the general subject of the Bill, I do not feel myself qualified to give any decided opinion.

4693. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not, in your opinien, a misfortune to a pawnbroker to receive a stolen article in pledge?—If it is discovered.

4694. As far as your experience goes, do you find the pawnbrokers giving facilities to the police to find stolen property?—I have already said that in some instances there are, no doubt, persons of great respectability carrying on this trade in a proper manner, but if I were to say that, upon the whole, there are facilities given in those cases by the pawnbrokers to the police, my experience would not justify me in saying so.

4695. I take it that as the law stands now, it is against the interest of the pawnbroker in every respect to give facilities, inasmuch as he very often loses the amount?—He always does lose the amount.

4696. And he very often sacrifices the time of himself and his assistants in giving evidence, does he not?—No doubt.

4697. So that as the law stands now, in your opinion, it is against the interest of the pawnbroker to give facilities?—Yes.

4698. Nevertheless you find, in your experience, that they do give facilities to the public?—Yes, in many instances, but not as a general rule.

4699. Does not the fact of pawning stolen property very often lead to the detection of robbery, through the ticket?—Very often.

4700. The ticket is found upon the thief, and from the ticket the police are led to the pawnbrokers, and to the goods themselves?—Yes, no doubt.

4701. Is it not your opinion, that if greater restrictions were put upon pawnbrokers, and they were deterred from receiving stolen property, that property would be disposed of at the second-hand sale shops, or places where there would be no ticket whatever, and no means to lead to information and detection in other ways, and that the police would have less facility for finding out that it was stolen property?—I am not aware of any mode in which people, generally speaking, in possession of stolen property, would get rid of it as they do through pawnbrokers.

4702. Do they not get rid of it through what are called receivers?—No doubt.

4703. Is there any ticket or any acknowledgement whatever from those receivers which can ever get into the hands of the police, so as to lead to detection?—None.

4704. I believe there are about 430 pawnbrokers in London; to how many of those would you apply the remark that facilities are not given for the recovery of stolen property?—I could only judge of those who came before me.

4705. As far as your observation goes, you ould say that the pawnbrokers generally are a spectable class of men?—I believe many of em to be so.

4706. Chairman.] The honourable Member r Dumbarton suggested that it might be desirble to restrict the amount of money advanced pledges, and not to go above a certain sum; a poor person wanted to raise a sum, what her mode would he have of raising that sum less he went and sold his goods at a disadvange?—There is a new description of trade which s sprung up in modern times, called "dolly ops," or "receiving shops," or "leaving shops," pt by persons without any license, and without e responsibility of pawnbrokers, and they allow or people to leave bundles and articles of that rt, and they advance money upon them. That actice comes frequently before us.

4707. Do you think that such cases would crease if no legitimate trade of pawnbroking re allowed?—I have no doubt that that would so.

4708. Is it not better to have a legalised system of pawnbroking than to increase that kind of establishment?—No doubt.

4709. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it within your knowledge that in many cases the parties keeping those leaving shops sell the goods contrary to the agreement, and that complaints are made afterwards that goods have not been kept a reasonable time to allow the parties to redeem?—I have had many instances of the most fraudulent conduct on the part of the people keeping those leaving shops.

4710. So that in your opinion those shops ought to be properly licensed, and conduct their business under restrictions?—I think they ought to be prevented from carrying on any trade of the kind.

4711. Chairman.] Is there any other observation which has occurred to you to communicate to the Committee, in addition to what you have said?—It does not occur to me that I can say anything else that is likely to be of use to the Committee.

Sir W. Bodkin.

21 July 1870.

Mr. George Russell called in; and Examined.

4712. Chairman.] You are the Manager of e Equitable Loan Company of Scotland, are u not?—I am.

4713. Where do you carry on business?—At . 4, Mill-square, Edinburgh.

4714. Have you any other establishment than t?—None other.

4715. What amount of capital do you employ your business?—£. 27,000.

4716. How is that capital raised?—In 3,000 res of 9 l. each.

4717. Is the whole amount paid up?—The ole amount of stock is 75,000 l., in 3,000 res of 25 l.; but only 25,000 l. paid, being 9 l. share.

4718. Is the whole amount invested and emyed in this trade?—The whole amount is inted and employed in this trade.

4719. Will you state the number of pledges ceived at your establishment in one year?—000 per annum.

4720. How many of those pledges were dged for a sum less than 2 s.?—Somewhere ut 700 per month, or 8,400 in a year.

4721. What is the lowest amount which you vance on those pledges?—We do not care ut taking in many under 2 s.

4722. But do you advance a lesser sum than ?—We do.

4723. What is the lowest sum which you vance on those pledges?—Never below 1 s.

4724. If a person pledges with you a suit of hes, do you give a ticket for each article of ss?—Never.

4725. You do not divide pledges?—Never; rather put them together to save labour.

4726. Then, even if a person pledged several cles of a different kind, would you put them one ticket?—We should probably ask the ty, and of course we abide by his wish.

4727. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Supposing it e a shawl and a watch, how would you treat n?—Those would be separate pledges.

4728. Chairman.] But a shawl and a gown would put as one article in one pledge, and one ticket?—In one pledge and on one ket.

4729. Can you give us the average amount lent on each pledge received by your company in the year?—It is 11 s. 3 d., I believe.

4730. What number of pledges do you receive above the value of 10 l.?—Our average of what we call deposits are about 20 a month, sometimes more and sometimes less.

4731. In taking your average of 11 s., do you include pledges above 10 l.?—We do. The average without those above 10 l. is 9 s. 8 d.

4732. On what day of the week is the greatest number of pledges lodged with you?—On Monday.

4733. And on what day are they redeemed?—We have what we call a very small weekly return trade. We find that those small pledges do not pay us unless they stop with us from four to five months; therefore, we do not care about touching them.

4734. Your pledges are principally deposited with you for a longer time than one week?—Generally.

4735. Can you tell us the number of articles out of the 72,000 which are redeemed within one week?—About 800 or 900 per week.

4736. Can you tell us the number of pledges which lie with you for one month?—I can hardly say, but I should think about one-third.

4737. Of course you cannot say accurately how many lie with you for two months, and how many for three months, and how many for four months?—If they are not taken out in the first month, they have every chance to lie two or three months.

4738. How many pledges out of the 72,000 rest with you for the twelve months, and become yours by being forfeited?—They average somewhere about 10 per cent. unredeemed.

4739. In what way do you dispose of those pledges?—By public auction. We have a periodical sale every two months. We advertise in every paper in Edinburgh, and very frequently in the "Glasgow Herald," and in the "Glasgow Daily Mail" (handing in a copy of a catalogue). Every article there is exposed to view one day before the sale.

4740. Have you a sale shop in which you sell pledges?—

Mr. G. Russell.

Mr. G. Russell.
21 July 1870.

pledges?—We have a small shop up the High-street, but we have very little in it. We have a lease of the premises, and we are just keeping it open. There are two girls there, but we do very little there. It is only for the sale of the low pledges, but very few of those; we generally sell them by auction.

4741. How do you dispose of the high pledges?—All by auction.

4742. Where is the sale conducted?—At 79, George-street, in the new town of Edinburgh, by Messrs. J. and G. Smith, auctioneers.

4743. Are the pledges sold on their premises?—The pledges are sold on their premises.

4744. One of the witnesses produced an advertisement of the sale of goods by the Equitable Company, where the sale was conducted on the premises of the company; that is not yours?—Not ours.

4745. Yours are openly conducted?—Always.

4746. And they are advertised for the public to attend them?—Six weeks before the sale.

4747. Are they largely attended by the public?—They are attended largely by the public.

4748. Is it your habit to put a reserved price upon the articles sold?—I only put the price which is lent upon the goods; no other reserve. We let them go at whatever money they bring. Sometimes we lose by our sales, and sometimes not.

4749. Is the fact of the money advanced on those pledges, being placed in a book, an indication to the auctioneer that he is not to sell below that price?—It is no indication, it is only a guide to him. He lets everything go at whatever it brings.

4750. In any case, do you reserve any article?—I have done so, but I found that the second time of trying was always worst, and the first loss was the best.

4751. Have you your sale books to show the mode in which he conducts those sales?—I have not it here, but we have a sale book for the purpose.

4752. If a watch on which you had advanced 10 l. being unappreciated by the audience, was going for 8 l., what would you do in that case?—Let it go. I would let it go for 5 l. if we had 10 l. advanced upon it.

4753. It is your invariable practice to sell everything without reserve?—Everything without reserve.

4754. How long has your business been conducted?—Since the year 1824.

4755. Can you tell the Committee what is the average dividend paid upon your share capital?—Five per cent. up to the year 1861, 5½ per cent. in 1863, and 7 per cent. since.

4756. Do you lay by any reserve fund?—We have a very small one; it is not much above 1,000 l.

4757. Do you insure?—Yes, we are fully insured.

4758. Is that for the value which you have advanced?—That is for the value which we have advanced.

4759. What rent do you pay for your premises?—The property is our own, but we paid for the property about 3,400 l.

4760. Then the value of the property is included in the capital?—It is included in the capital.

4761. So that really there is only 23,000 l. invested in the pledges?—We have a sinking fund, as we call it, invested, and also we deal with the Union Bank; and I am sorry to say that we are never out of debt.

4762. What is the amount of your sinking fund?—Fifteen hundred pounds, I think, just now.

4763. In addition to your dividends of 5, 5½, and 7 per cent., you have invested 1,500 l.?—We have invested 1,500 l.

4764. How much did you invest last year?—Between 300 l. and 400 l.

4765. How much did you lay aside the year before?—I do not think we had anything to invest the year before. It was a very bad season. We lost so much by our sales by auction. We lost 40 l. by one sale, and somewhere about 30 l. by another, and it took away the whole surplus.

4766. Then, after all, a good deal of the produce of your business depends upon the produce of your sales?—Very much so.

4767. And the proceeds of your sales depend upon the way in which you make your advances?—Yes.

4768. If you advanced too much upon an article you cannot realise?—If we advance too much upon an article we cannot realise it.

4769. Those who pledge their articles on a certain schedule of prices may really pay abundantly sufficient to give you a profit, the loss being incurred on the re-sale of the articles upon which you have advanced too much; is that so?—Yes.

4770. There is no reason why the Committee receiving a balance sheet, and finding a loss should alter the scheduled scale of charge?—We look to the gross profit for the whole year, or the half year.

4771. But if the scale of charges itself yielded a profit, you would not recommend that scale to be altered, would you, because the pawnbroker made a loss by over-advancing on pledges?—The interest is very difficult to calculate just now, by reason of those intermediate and fractional sums.

4772. But my question is, whether if the scale of interest and the charge for the ticket yielded a profit, and the loss was occasioned by the pawnbroker over-advancing on pledges, so that he could not realise those, that is any reason why the scale should be altered because the pawnbroker's business does not pay?—We realise most of our profit from the articles redeemed. I scarcely follow the question.

4773. If the rate of interest, including the charge for the ticket be sufficient to give a profit to the pawnbroker, and he makes a loss on his business by over advances on his pledges, is it any reason why the scale of charges should be raised?—I think it is a very small dividend that I am able to pay, and I should like to have the charges raised to pay a larger one.

4774. Mr. Alderman Carter.] But should the rate be altered because you lend too much upon your pledges?—No, it should not; that is our fault.

4775. Chairman.] Why do you advance more upon the goods than they will realise?—There is so much competition in the trade.

4776. You said that it was very difficult to calculate interest, what do you mean by that statement?—I mean the fractional parts.

4777. But how is it difficult?—For instance in the matter of 3*s.* or 3*s.* 6 d., there are few of the assistants, unless they have long practical experience, can count them.

4778. But have you not a tabulated calculation?—But sometimes they do not look at that.

4779. Do you invariably calculate your interest according to the prescribed scale?—As far as we can possibly adhere to it.

4780. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You pay farthings, so that you give and take?—We give and take the farthings; we have to pay for those farthings somewhere about 1 s. 8 d. per £. before we can get them to trade upon.

4781. Chairman.] Do you know whether clause 4 is usually observed in the trade?—There are very few in Edinburgh who adhere to that clause.

4782. Is that a clause in the Act now existing with which very few pawnbrokers in Edinburgh comply?—That is a clause with which very few pawnbrokers in Edinburgh comply.

4783. Mr. Alderman Carter.] In those cases, do you take a halfpenny?—We always give a farthing in change if we can possibly divide it.

4784. Chairman.] What is the practice adopted in Edinburgh regarding Clauses 2 and 3 of the Act; do you observe the scale as nearly as you can?—We observe the scale as nearly as we possibly can. The charges made by the trade in Edinburgh are a halfpenny for every half-crown, and all sums under half-a-crown. For 3 s. most of the trade in Edinburgh charge a penny, and for 6 s. it is three-halfpence.

4785. What is done with regard to the ticket?—The ticket money is always paid first.

4786. And the 1 d. additional on the 3 s., and 1 d. up to 6 s.?—Yes, 1 d. a month for 3 s. is charged by most of the trade.

4787. Can you estimate what is the gross profit per pledge?—I am not prepared to do that.

4788. Can you give the expenses usually incurred in your business for the past year?—Our expenses are generally 5 per cent. upon the gross profit.

4789. Can you give the amount of your expenses?—1,488 l. 8 s. 6*d.* I think last year.

4790. Is that including salaries?—Including salaries.

4791. Without rent?—Without rent.

4792. But including rates and taxes?—Including rates and taxes. The losses extra were 63 l. 3 s. 5 d. The gross profits for that year were somewhere about 3,566 l. 12 s. 8 d.

4793. What are the deductions from that amount?—We deduct working, 1,488 l. 8 s. 6 d.; losses, 163 l. 3 s. 5 d.; interest upon capital, at 5 per cent., 1,308 l. 7 s. 5 d., leaving a net profit of 606 l.

4794. What dividend would that 606 l. pay?—With the 1,300 l., that is exactly 7 per cent., which we pay.

4795. Mr. Crum Ewing.] That is including the interest which you charge?—That is including the interest which we charge.

4796. Chairman.] But you have first taken off the 5 per cent. upon the capital, have you not?—Yes.

4797. Then, do you pay a dividend of 7 per cent. in addition to the 5 per cent.?—Not in addition. This shows the interest that we should get if the capital were invested otherwise.

4798. So that your net dividend is only 2 per cent.?—Only 2 per cent.

4799. Is this a statement made up for the purpose?—This is a statement made up by the secretary here, from the statement which I handed to him.

4800. Then it is made up by the secretary in London?—Yes; from the statement which I gave him.

4801. Mr. Alderman Carter.] How many 9 l. shares have you?—Three thousand. It is all paid up; but 3,000 l. worth of property is paid for out of that.

4802. And is your reserve fund separate?—Yes.

4803. Chairman.] In your original balance sheet, which you brought up with you, you make the amount of pledged stock 27,738 l. 12 s. 4 d., and you charge a premium upon that of 1,260 l.; that is something above 5 cent., is it not?—About 5½ per cent.

4804. And you consider in Scotland that the premium should be 5½ per cent. and not 10 per cent.?—That is what we are carrying forward just now.

4805. And when you take stock for the benefit of your shareholders you only charge a premium of 5 per cent.?—A premium of 5 per cent.

4806. The cash in the bank is 759 l. 7 s. 8 d.?—I do not think that the deposits of sums above 10 l. are included in that statement.

4807. The total of these three sums is 24,757 l. 19 s.; then there is an item of 3,571 l., what is that?—That is the property; the premises.

4808. Then there is the sale stock, 395 l. 12 s. 6*d.*; that makes a total amount of capital which you have to calculate upon of 28,724 l. 11 s. 6 d. for one year; the interest is 3,209 l. 4 s. 9 d. received from your depositors; the ticket fees amount to 210 l. 8 s. 2 d., and you have a profit on your sale-shop already of 146 l. 19 s. 9 d., so that the total of those three items is 3,566 l. 12 s. 8 d. in the gross; then in the expenses for one year you charge repairs 43 l. 1 s. 4 d.; stationery and books, 73 l. 16 s. 11 d.; is not that rather a large amount for one year?—Our stationery, books, and printing account, is generally 100 l. a year.

4809. Losses, 163 l. 3 s. 5 d., shop expenses; that is the sale-shop I suppose?—That is the sale-shop.

4810. One hundred and five pounds eight shillings and threepence; salaries of officials 746 l. 8 s. 6 d.; may I ask if the directors receive any payment for their attention to the business?—£. 65 a year amongst them.

4811. Is that included in the 746 l. 8 s. 6 d.?—It is not included there.

4812. Then it is not deducted from the gross receipts at all in this statement?—I think it will come under the head of general expenditure.

4813. Gas, 26 l. 14 s. 7 d.; licenses, 13 l. 5 s.; insurance and sundries, 231 l. 2 s. 10 d.; does that include the director's fees?—Yes.

4814. Rent and taxes, 160 l.; but why do you charge rent when it is part of your capital?—We are charged by the assessor so much for the property. I think he values it at somewhere about 120 l.

4815. Still if you pay interest to the parties who have advanced money in the way of dividend, you pay interest in that form, do you not?—That money is sunk.

4816. Still it is represented by the shareholders, the total of free profit is 2,003 l. 11 s. 9 d.; then when you have dealt with the 2,003 l. 11 s. 9 d., how do you divide it?—£. 1,900, being 7 per cent., amongst the shareholders.

Mr. G. Russell.

21 July 1870.

4817. Then you have nothing for the reserved fund?—Nothing last year.

4818. Can you give us the salaries and the amount of expenses; the amount put down there is 756 l.? — The shop and all the other expenses are taken off the profit. That is the free profit.

4819. The item of salaries of officials is 746 l. 8 s. 6 d; of what does that consist? — That is the working of the establishment altogether.

4820. How many persons are employed in the establishment?—We have 12 with myself.

4821. What would the salaries be?—I have one man to whom I pay 120 l. a year, and I have another to whom I pay 65 l. a year; there is another at 65 l., and there are three rising from 10 s. to 18 s. a week. My own salary is included there.

4822. What does the head manager get? — £. 280, with share in the dividend.

4823. Then what forms the item of 105 l. for shop expenses?—The salaries of two girls in the shop; the shop rent, taxes, and gas, come to 100 l. odd a year.

4824. Then the insurance and sundries to 231 l. 2 s. 10 d.; what forms those two heads; one item is the "Directors' Fees"; that leaves about 175 l. to account for?—The "General Expenditure Account," and the "Profit and Loss Account."

4825. But the losses were 163 l. 3 s. 5 d.?—That would be the "General Expenditure Account"; it comes to about 100 l. a year for general expenditure.

4826. Under no head? — Under the head of "Expenditure Account."

4827. But what items form that general expenditure?—Keeping up the premises, painting, wrights and slaters.

4828. But we have repairs separate from that 43 l. 1 s. 4 d.?—That is taken from the "Insurance Account"; the sundries are taken from what we term the "Expenditure Account," which is the expenditure week by week.

4829. The balance-sheet shows, altogether, 7 per cent. upon the share capital?—Yes; directors, 65 l.; insurances, 32 l. or 36 l.; and the other item is from the "Expenditure Account."

4830. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is not 3,000 l. invested in your premises?—It is invested in premises.

4831. And in consequence of having 3,000 l. invested there, you charge 5 per cent. for rent? —We have less to work upon in the business.

4832. But that is the reason why you charge the rent in your account?—That is the reason.

4833. Chairman.] What is the class of persons who pledge goods with you?—Tradesmen.

4834. Do you mean by tradesmen labouring men in the receipt of weekly wages?—Tradesmen, clerks, shopkeepers; but, coming to a higher class of pledges, I have a countess just now a customer of mine, two or three officers in the army and navy, and all grades of society downwards.

4835. What is the sum which you would consider a large one to advance over 10 l.?—We have lent to the extent of 1,800 l. to one party on goods, silver plate, and diamonds, and other jewels.

4836. Do you receive into pledge many articles of manufacture in the way of cloth?—Yes.

4837. So that you advance money to shopkeepers on goods?—Shopkeepers both in the New Town and in the Old Town; we have just now upwards of 220 l. worth of plate belonging to one lady.

4838. In making your special contracts, at what rate do you advance money?—On and after the rate of 15 l. per cent. per annum; 3 d. per 1 l. per month.

4839. Do you take into stock a large number of bulky articles?—Very large.

4840. Do you make any charge for those articles?—None.

4841. Do you think that you are entitled to make a charge for those articles?— The question never occurred to me, but we have never done it.

4842. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What do you mean by bulky articles?—We have just now somewhere about 20 or 22 pianos; those are bulky articles; and we have a chest of silver plate which takes about eight men to lift it, it is so weighty.

4843. Chairman.] For a grand piano, what would be the sum you would advance at the lowest?—The lowest that we lend on a piano is 5 l.

4844. What will you receive for a grand piano if it is deposited with you for three months, on your advancing 5 l.?—I never had a piano left with me to sell that ever I had a profit upon yet.

4845. Supposing that a piano was redeemed at the end of three months, what would you have received for it at the end of three months, if you had advanced 5 l. upon it?—One shilling and threepence per month, and no other charge.

4846. So that, in fact, you would receive that piano in pledge for three months for 3 s. 9 d.?—Yes; we charge less for the loan of the money than two porters would carry it up and down stairs for.

4847. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you charge the ordinary rate of interest, and the carriage of the piano?—We do not pay the carriage, our own men carry it up; we charge nothing for it.

4848. Chairman.] Can you give the Committee any information as the advantage or otherwise of selling pledges at the expiration of six months?—Yes; soft goods become deteriorated very much when they lie longer than six months; fashions change, cloths get dry, silks get cut from lying too long, velvets lose their colour; and it would be a great advantage even to the pledger if goods were to have a six months forfeiture.

4849. But if the pledger wished to redeem them, and not to sell them, should he not have the option of redeeming them at the end of 12 months?—Most undoubtedly, upon revaluing of the article.

4850. If the pledger wished them to be sold at the end of six months, you would see no objection?—None.

4851. If he wished them to be detained 12 months, the property being his, he ought to control it, ought he not?—I should have no objection to that.

4852. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] That deterioration would only apply to perishable articles where the colour would fade; but it would not apply to watches, which, I observe, are a great part of your trade?—My idea was that watches and jewellery, and so on, should probably lie till the end of the 12 months, but I think that people would not understand it; they would forget the differences fference between the six and the 12 months' rfeiture; so that it would be better, not only for e pledger but for the pawnbroker, if the ods were all on a six months' forfeiture; but should have no objection to its going another months upon the payment of the interest.

4853. Chairman.] Do you see any objection having the rate and charge for interest clearly d distinctly printed upon every pawn-ticket?—think it should be clearly defined on the back the ticket.

4854. Are you in the habit of entering the mes of the persons who pawn?—Certainly.

4855. And their addresses, and whether they e housekeepers or lodgers?—Certainly.

4856. Do you enter the correct names of the ople?—The correct name, and the number of e street or close.

4857. Do the pledgers in Edinburgh generally ve correct names?—Certainly; they give their rrect names, unless they are of the lower class pledgers; I mean the pledgers under 5 s, o do not care about giving their names. There a good deal of Scotch pride about them.

4858. But still you enter the names that they give?—We enter their names and their addresses.

4859. And you do not complain at all of the ty of having to do that?—No; I think it is cessary.

4860. Have you a large amount of stolen operty deposited with you?—We are very fornate in that way.

4861. Can you state to the Committee how uch property was deposited with you last year hich afterwards proved to be stolen?—I find om the superintendent's report for the City of dinburgh, on Crime, for the year 1869, that the oss total reported was 3,355 stolen articles, rough the whole of Edinburgh, and the number om the police-books found in the possession of wnbrokers, 380, 126 of those having been illelly pledged by watchmakers, tailors, dressakers, bootmakers, and others, leaving 254 lots petty thefts found in the hands of pawnokers.

4862. Chairman.] How many of those pledges ere found with you?—About six.

4863. Do you know the value of the pledges und with you which you had to surrender?—he losses for the half year were 1 l. 19 s. 6 d. I ve not the half year before that. It was very fficult to get at the amount which was lent pon the stolen property from the pawnbrokers; t I have this table from the police-books, owing the following results: Total number of ledges for the year 1869, taken in by the pawnrokers of Edinburgh, 1,426,800; number stolen d recovered 254; showing one in 5,617, or $\frac{1}{3}$ at each of the 34 pawnbroking offices in dinburgh. The number illegally pledged was 26, showing one in 11,323, or 3 $\frac{17}{21}$ at each of e 34 pawnbroking offices. The total property covered which was stolen and illegally pledged as one in 3,754, or $\frac{3}{11}$ at each of the pawnroking offices in Edinburgh.

4864. Are there a great many "wee pawns" Edinburgh?—A great many.

4865. Does the stolen property go largely mong those?—No doubt of it. There is one lace in Edinburgh alone for the purchase of earing apparel for the Irish market, where all what are called the old clothes men go, and ey buy no less than about 300 l. worth a week.

4866. Do they take goods in pawn?—They do not take goods in pawn, but they buy them right off.

4867. Are the "wee pawns" inspected by the detectives?—By the police.

4868. Are your shops visited by the detectives?—They are.

4869. And you never found any disadvantage accruing from that?—The system adopted in Edinburgh by the superintendent is that he sends round a printed list every morning by the policeman upon the beat to all the pawnbroking establishments. There are two men told off whose duty it is to go the pawnbroking offices. They divide the town into two districts; one gets 17 pawn offices to look after, and the other 17. Those are very respectable men, and they do their duty well and efficiently, I think.

4870. And they do not trouble you?—They trouble us every day.

4871. But they do not give you any extra trouble?—No; we are very glad to give them every assistance we can.

4872. Then they do not investigate your stock, but are content with your answer?—If a jeweller or other respectable shopkeeper was robbed, we are very glad for them to examine the stock themselves. They examine the book, and pencil off on a card what they wish to see, and we bring the goods forward and show them, and if they can identify the property, or the parties can identify it, they get it and take it away.

4873. When a watch has been stolen, do they every morning look over your watches, or do they depend upon you to state whether you have such a watch in your possession?—If the watch is stolen and we have it, and they see the maker's name in our books; we hand it over to them on a receipt which they sign for the superintendent of police.

4874. Supposing that the pawnbroker were not to enter the right number of the watch in his book, the police would have no knowledge that he had that watch, I suppose?—Certainly not.

4875. It really depends upon the pawnbroker entering the watch correctly in his book, to enable the detective to find whether he has the watch there or not?—Those are always entered right.

4876. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Would not the inspector be very much guided by the character of the pawnbroker?—Yes, very much.

4877. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do the police ever examine the stock of the pawnbroker?—I do not think they do.

4878. Chairman.] Have you many persons who unlawfully pledge goods?—Very few.

4879. I mean cases where lodgers in certain houses pledge the goods of their lodging-house keeper?—There are a few of those cases.

4880. Are they often detected?—Yes.

4881. Have you any instances of persons counterfeiting notes or pawn-tickets?—We have had instances of that, but very few; in fact, we do not prosecute those instances, but it is very frequently done.

4882. Have you many instances where a person has made a declaration that he has lost his pawn-ticket, and where the pawnbroker has given him the pledge, the real owner of the pawn-ticket coming afterwards and applying for his pledge?—Yes.

4883. Does that frequently occur?—It frequently occurs.

Mr. G. Russell.

21 July 1870.

4884. What do you do in that case?—We are protected by the Act, as long as the affidavit is properly signed by the magistrate.

4885. Do the courts in Edinburgh hold that you are protected by the Act?—The case has never been tried, that I recollect.

4886. If the pawnbroker has surrendered the pledge on such a declaration, does he at once refuse to make any return to the person who holds the real ticket?—Certainly.

4887. How many cases in a week have you in your trade of persons making those declarations?—We average about 40 a month.

4888. In general are the declarations correct?—They are generally correct.

4889. Do you satisfy yourself, before you give the form, that they are the proper parties who apply?—We do.

4890. So that the few cases that occur do not require any alteration in the law?—We make them describe the goods very minutely before we give them the affidavit.

4891. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you take in many body clothes as pledges?—We do.

4892. Large quantities?—Large quantities.

4893. Are those generally brought to you on Mondays and taken out again on Saturdays?—We do not do a very large weekly trade; but we are a little busier on the Mondays than usual.

4894. Do many people come to you with blankets?—No, not above 15 pairs a week. We may have that number, but not more.

4895. One of the witnesses on the last day stated that a great many new blankets came, that the people had got from the club-shop; is that the case?—A good deal of that is done. That is what they call the "tally" trade in Edinburgh.

4896. Are many family bibles pledged?—Yes, a good many.

4897. Have you many instances of wives coming to pawn their husband's things to get drink?—None; I have never seen a case of that kind, or very seldom. It may occur; but we are very particular, and if any person is the worse for drink, or anything like it, we never take anything from them. Rather a superior class of people come to us.

4898. Sir William Bodkin mentioned that he would recommend that in cases of pawnbrokers not giving facilities to the police to discover stolen goods, it being proved to the jury that that was the case, it should be endorsed upon their licenses, so that if there was a certain number of endorsements in that case, they should not get licensed, do you approve of that?—I should have no objection to the sheriff of the county doing it, but I should decidedly object to put such power into the hands of the magistrates.

4899. Or before a jury?—I should have no objection to that on my own part.

4900. Would you consider it to be advantageous to the respectability of the trade that that should be done?—Yes, I think it would.

4901. You have mentioned that you think that some additional interest should be allowed?—It is unworkable by the pledger himself.

4902. But upon the whole amount you recommend that it should be more than 15 per cent.; that, I understand, is because you have not sufficient profits, and you mentioned as the reason that your profits were so small, the great losses that you sustain by the sale of your unredeemed pledges?—I may mention that we are very peculiarly situated in Scotland; in Edinburgh, after the passing of the Halfpenny Act, about 10 years ago, there were only about 16 or 17 pawnbrokers, but the number has doubled in 10 years.

4903. You say that the pawnbrokers now advance more than the goods are worth; supposing that the rate of interest were raised, the competition would be greater, and they would still be required to do so, so that their profits would not be any larger, is not that so?—No, but it would bring a better class of people into the trade if nothing were taken in under 2*s.*

4904. Would you recommend that it should be restricted to 2*s.*?—I would, and I have no objection to the sheriff granting a license, or even to the license being 50*l.*

4905. Do you say that for the benefit of the pawnbrokers or for the benefit of the public?—For the benefit of the public themselves.

4906. Then in that way you think that those who pawn for less than 2*s.*, do not make a good use of the money which they get?—I do not think that it could be of much benefit to their families.

4907. Do you think, from your own observation, that many of the sums that are raised upon pledges under 2*s.* go in drink?—I do; a remark was made by a witness from Scotland, that pawnbrokers and pawnbrokers' shops were the means of raising the poor's rates. I have here in my possession a speech which was delivered by Sir James Gardner Baird on the 29th of last month, and although the number of pawnbrokers in Edinburgh has actually doubled within the last 10 years, the poor's rates in the largest parish out of Glasgow, the West Church, have decreased 6*d.* per pound.

4908. Do you infer from that that the number of pawnbrokers is an advantage?—I do not say that they are an advantage, but I do not think that it is the increase of pawnbroking which causes an increase of the poors' rates. It is a mere pittance for a poor man or woman to get a loan of 5*s.* for a 1*d.* or 1½*d.*, as the case may be, for five weeks. That is the very thing to keep them out of the poorhouse. I think it is a great incentive to crime to get 4*d.* or 6*d.*, and those small sums, so readily.

4910. But what incentive to crime could it be for a person borrowing 6*d.*; do you take it to be a crime to get 6*d.* worth of drink?—No; it is not a crime to get 6*d.* worth of drink.

4911. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] You mentioned that tradesmen came to you to get advances for goods; I see here a number of articles of one kind, which show that it could not be private individuals who pawn those articles; for example, lot 80, four silver brooches, two finger rings, two Geneva watches, three silver Alberts, six gold finger rings, four silver Geneva watches, six gold finger rings, four gold scarf pins, four gem rings, six pairs of gold ear drops, three pair cased silver watches; what are those?—Those are old-fashioned watches, that lift out. The first 100 lots of jewellery there are all the pledges under 10*s.*, which we group together at a sale by auction; we do not sell our low-pledged jewellery by private sale. The four Geneva watches had probably 7*s.* 6*d.* or 10*s.* advanced on each.

4912. Mr. Orr Ewing.] Is that all you advance upon a silver watch?—We lose by them.

4913. Mr.

913. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Would those six gold er rings be pawned by six individuals?—No
bt. We always commence our sales by aucwith low-pledged jewellery, after the soft ds.

914. Supposing that you had a surplus on of those articles, how would you do with the ple who came for an account of the surplus?
hose are the low pledges under 10 s.

915. Mr. Alderman Carter.] I understood to say that you would not object to the nse being 50 l.?—I am talking for Scotland.
ade the remark that we had a lower class of lges than the pawnbrokers in England, and refore a lower class of people came into the le. In Edinburgh, some women, for instance, menced business as pawnbrokers, with a capi-something under 200 l.. It is to keep those ple out of the trade that I would like to see ething else done.

916. Why should not a person be allowed to r into a business with 200 l., as well as you
n 27,000 l.?—Because they have no educa-
; they never saw the Acts of Parliament,
they put all Acts at defiance.

917. Then you decidedly object to free trade awnbroking, so far as your business is con-ned?—I would not mind free trade commenc-at two guineas or so, but under that I would dedly object to free trade.

918. That is to say, that anybody should be wed to lend two guineas and not less on ial contract?—I mean by special contract.

919. But I mean free trade, so far as the iness is concerned; you say that you would object to the license being 50 l., because a nse of 50 l., as I understand you, would keep a number of people from the business who get into it?—That would just fill the trade Scotland with a class of people the same as
"wee pawns."

920. But would that tend to give facilities for ning?—It would be the very means of put-the respectable pawnbrokers out of the trade.

921. Would it not tend to a monopoly of the e in the hands of men of capital?—I would like to remain in it long with a lot of people that round about me.

922. I understood you to say that you would pledges to sums of 2 s. and upwards; why uld not a poor man be at liberty to borrow 6 d. as well as to borrow 2 s. 6 d.?—It might l to make a man more saving, both for his sake and for his family, if he knew that he d not borrow under 2 s.

923. In Scotland you do not grant relief to able-bodied men, and supposing that any -bodied man could not get relief, why should ot be allowed to borrow 1 s. to help him on ugh the week if he had anything which would g him 2 s.?—I think it would bring him still er in the scale if he is so much pauperised as ant to borrow 1 s.

924. If they are so near the workhouse why uld you not rather give them facilities for owing than prevent their borrowing at all, so bring them to absolute starvation?—I do think it would benefit their families for them orrow 1 s.

925. We have had one or two of the Attenughs here who tell us that their business is e exceptional, and that they do not trouble nselves with those low pledges of 3 s. or 4 s.;
they would rather be called silverbrokers than pawnbrokers; is your business of that kind?—It is not.

4926. You are not actuated in the answers you have given by the desire to be in a higher class of pawnbrokers?—I do not think it would be very high if it were limited to sums above 2 s. I am quite willing to take in as many 2 s. pledges or above, but I decline to take them under.

4927. In reference to this balance sheet of yours, you take small pledges, you say, of 1 s.; can you give me any idea what those small pledges cost you?—A pledge of 2 s. 6 d. and under does not cost less than about 5 d.

4928. Then on every pledge of less than 2 s. 6 d. you lose about 2½ d. or 3 d., do you not?—We do unless it lies four or five months.

4929. According to your balance sheet your pledges cost you upon an average 3½ d., so that all those low pledges must be a loss to you?—Unless they lie with us they are a loss.

4930. Colonel Beresford.] Have you read the Bill which is now before the House?—I have.

4931. You said something just now about crime, and the honourable Member for Leeds pushed you rather hard, but he did not come to a satisfactory conclusion; you said that the low pledges of 6 d. led to crime, did you not?—I probably meant to say pauperism.

4932. If a man can go and get 6 d. it probably results in its being spent for drink rather than for anything else?—It is certain to be spent in drink.

4933. You have given evidence that in your opinion you sustain losses by the large amount of competition; would not that competition be very much increased if this Bill was passed by the House?—I do not think that it would. My reason is that if we in Edinburgh had, as I mentioned before, a lower class out of the trade, a higher class would remain in it, and a larger trade would not require that competition which is now so ruinous.

4934. But you already complain of competition; if this Bill were passed by the House, would not they go for freedom of contract, as it is called, having no limit at all, not even having two guineas; and do you not think that if this trade were thrown entirely open it would make a greater competition?—It would tend to it.

4935. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You are for free contract, I believe?—Above two guineas I am in favour of free contract.

4936. If parties who could not pledge anything worth 2 s. were compelled to have relief, would they not be driven to the "wee pawns"?—They would have no other resort.

4937. Aud if you in Scotland were to have a law that no one should lend on a pawn less than 2 s., would not that increase the number of "wee pawnbrokers"?—The police would be quite able to deal with the "wee pawnshops"; in Edinburgh they are a sort of legalised pawnbrokers, who give a man 1 s. or 2 s. 6 d. for his coat or vest; they must keep it in their possession for seven days, and the man comes back for it at the seven days' end, and he gets it back for whatever they choose to charge.

4938. But would not your principle very much increase that kind of pledging?—I have no doubt that it would, but I think the police would be quite able to cope with the "wee pawns."

4939. But it would increase that kind of

Mr. G. Russell.
21 July 1870.

pledge; why should you limit the pawnbroker; do you think that the "wee pawns" are a more desirable thing than the ordinary pawnbroking? —Some of our licensed pawnbrokers in Edinburgh are not a step up the ladder above the "wee pawns."

4940. Chairman.] You stated that each small pledge cost you 5½ d.; how do you make that out?—I have brought it out by the whole expenditure of the establishment, salaries, and everything, that a small pledge does not pay unless it remains in our custody between four and five months. A pledge which goes in on the Monday morning, and out on the Saturday night, for a halfpenny, or perhaps a penny, does not pay the pawnbroker. There is a party in Edinburgh in our trade who has somewhere about 2,000 l. of capital sunk, and on Saturday evenings (I have seen his books myself) he has somewhere about 100 l. redeemed, and his interest on that 100 l., with hard work, is not more than 3 l. per cent., with 500 or 600 low pledges.

4941. That may be so, but that does not make the pledges cost 5½ d. each?—Unless that man had a return throughout the week on the other five days he could not live, because it takes that to pay his salaries and to keep himself.

4942. How do you make it out that each pledge costs 5½ d.?—Every pledge which is left with us, which we sell by auction, costs us about 1½ d.

4943. But you say that every small pledge deposited with you costs you 5½ d.?—It costs us 1½ d. for selling, and 3½ d. for salaries and working expenses of the business.

4944. Colonel Beresford.] I am requested to ask you this question: how much less would the profit per annum be if you took the correct rate instead of the long rate under the present Act?—I could scarcely answer that question.

MR. GEORGE SCOTSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Scotson.

4945. Chairman.] Do you reside in Leeds?—Yes.

4945*. Are you a Pawnbroker in Leeds?—Yes.

4946. Are you also a member of the town council of Leeds?—Yes.

4947. How long have you been in business?—About 16 years.

4948. Are you well acquainted with the mode of conducting the business in Leeds?—Yes, I have a pretty general acquaintance with it.

4949. Have your turned your attention to the law affecting the trade of pawnbroking?—I have.

4950. Have you any observations to make upon the present law as it now stands?—I think that the present law is not sufficiently remunerative if properly carried out. I believe the greater part of the pawnbrokers in Leeds endeavour honestly to carry it out, but they are not able to carry it out with much profit, and the rate of interest is lower than it should be, especially upon low pledges.

4951. Is the statutory rate of interest acted upon at Leeds?—Nearly so, I think. There may be a few cases where they take what is termed the long interest, but they are not many. The farthings are, perhaps, not much used, but if pledges come to two months, the farthings are adhered to.

4952. But in other cases the halfpenny is taken instead of the farthing?—Very generally; I believe that if they wish to have it, it is generally given them. The pawnbrokers keep farthings, and if their customers will take them they give them.

4953. But pawnbrokers generally work the present scale to their own advantage in respect of the farthings, do they not?—The practice is to give and take. In our own case if we lend 5 s. 6 d. we never charge more than a penny, but if we lend 6 s. we take the farthing.

4954. In the case of the lower classes of pawnbrokers is the long rate generally acted upon instead of the statutory rate?—With the lower class of pawnbrokers I believe it is.

4955. And the working classes are damaged to that extent?—Yes.

4956. What class of persons carry on the business in Leeds?—Generally speaking they are a very respectable class of men. There are amongst them individuals who have occupied various posts in the town of Leeds; town councillors, aldermen, poor law guardians and people who have filled almost every position.

4957. In addition to those very respectable persons is there a class which cannot be considered to stand in the same position?—In all trades I suppose that there are better and worse.

4958. What is the character of the houses where no licenses are taken?—We have no such houses in Leeds. We have what are termed the "Dolly Shops," or the marine store dealers, but the corporation of Leeds require them to take out a license under a local Act of Parliament, for which they pay 5 s. per year, and they are required to enter all their purchases in a book.

4959. Do you know the number of such houses which are registered under this local Act?—I do not.

4960. Is it found that stolen property often goes to those houses than to the regular licensed houses?—With the lower class of stolen property it is found to be so.

4961. I suppose that in Leeds you find the number of robberies is not so large as in other towns?—No, we do not find it so.

4962. Is much plate deposited with pawnbrokers?—Yes, a considerable quantity of plate is deposited with pawnbrokers in Leeds.

4963. Is much stolen plate deposited with them?—No, we do not find it so. I have a list here furnished by the chief constable of Leeds of the number of stolen articles which have been deposited with the pawnbrokers of Leeds for one year ending the 19th of this month.

4964. How are the unredeemed pledges sold in Leeds?—Those above 10 s. are almost universally sold by auction. There may be very rare cases where they are not so sold, but I know of none.

4965. How are those under 10 s. sold?—Those under 10 s. are sold through the saleshops.

4966. Do most of the pawnbrokers in Leeds keep saleshops?—Most of them do.

4967. Are the pledges above 10 s. that which are sold by auction sold at a public saleroom?—

st of them are sold at a public saleroom, and ers are sold at the shops; there is a cata- ue (handing in a paper) of the last quarterly e held by Messrs. Hepper, a firm of auctioneers a number of pawnbrokers in Leeds.

4968. Are the names which I see here of the wnbrokers selling in this sale, the names of the st respectable persons?—We deem ourselves ong such.

4969. Do any of those who are called the pectable pawnbrokers conduct their sales on ir own premises?—Yes, some of them do, ere they have large premises.

4970. Have you ever attended any of those es?—I have occasionally.

4971. Do the pawnbrokers attend there to bid? They generally bid if an article is going at ower price than it is really worth.

4972. To what extent are the private sales ducted on the premises of pawnbrokers?— rhaps nearly half of them.

4973. I suppose that the public rarely go to private sales?—I was passing one the other y, and I saw the shop quite full of people; there ght be from 30 to 40 people present.

4974. But the 30 or 40 might represent a low ss of dealers, might they not?—They would mostly dealers.

4975. Very few others than dealers would end a private sale?—Very few.

4976. How are the public sales attended?— ey are attended by dealers and by the public.

4977. The dealers preponderating?—Not in se cases.

4978. In this sale by Messrs. Hepper & Son, uld they expect a reserve price to be put upon articles?—The pawnbrokers always attend d bid for any article which they think is going low its price.

4980. So that, in fact, the law is complied th, and there is an actual sale on that occasion? Yes, the pawnbroker purchases the article, and is known by persons attending the sale to whom s sold.

4981. I do not see in this catalogue any oppor- nity for viewing the articles on sale, except on Tuesday before the sale begins?—There is other opportunity except they come to the wnbroker's, and the articles would be shown re. They are removed on the Saturday to rooms, and it requires the Monday for to t them all hung up round the room, so as to ve the most public view of them.

4982. Although they are sold on the Wednes- y, Thursday, and Friday, a person could not in on the Wednesday morning prior to the le to see the article sold?—Yes, he has full portunity to do that.

4983. Do the pawnbrokers lend on bulky ticles in Leeds?—Some do and some do not, cording to the accommodation which they have r them.

4984. Do pawnbrokers frequently refuse bulky ticles?—Yes.

4985. How many pawnbrokers have you in eeds?—About 55 or 56.

4986. How many pledges per annum have you posited with you?—We should have probably ove 72,000 a year in my two establishment.

4987. Where are those establishments?—One is at the East End and one is at the West End; one is in West-street and the other is in St. Mary's-lane.

4988. How many pledges are supposed to be deposited among the various pawnbrokers in Leeds per annum?—Of that I have not made a calculation.

4989. What amount of money is invested in the trade of Leeds?—I calculate from 150,000 l. to 170,000 l.

4990. Do you suppose that the existing law is complied with generally?—Generally.

4991. Is it complied with in regard to entering the names of persons who pledge?—In my house we always do it. I deem it a necessary safeguard for myself.

4992. Do you also enter the residence?—We put down the residence.

4993. Do you believe that parties pledging, on the whole, may be considered to give correct representations?—Yes; I believe that in a low class of business the parties pledging do not care or mind who knows what they are about.

4994. With regard to articles above 5 l., have you much trade in them?—Not so much. We do not go much into 10 l. either. Ours is more of a low class of business, that is to say, smaller pledges.

4995. Jewellery and articles of clothing?—Jewellery and articles of clothing, ranging from 1 s. up to 4 l. or 5 l.

4996. On what day of the week are pledges principally deposited with you?—The larger number are on Mondays.

4997. When are they taken out?—The larger deliveries are on Saturdays.

4998. What proportion of the pledges deposited with you in a year remain for a week only?—Of that I have made no calculation, but I should suppose from a half to one-third.

4999. What is the average value of the pledges deposited with you?—They will average a little over 5 s.

5000. What is the lowest amount which you are in the habit of advancing on pledges?—We have occasionally pledges offered on which we should lend 6 d., 8 d., 9 d., or 1 s.

5001. Are those articles which are pledged for one week principally articles of clothing?—They are principally small articles of clothing.

5002. Are they put in when they are not wanted, and taken out when they are wanted?—Yes.

5003. That is to say, in fact, they are the clothes which are used on Sundays?—Many of them are the clothes which are used on Sundays. I have a table here which I took out promiscuously, of three consecutive Saturdays' delivery at three periods of the year, at the busiest time of the year, and the time when the lowest amount of business is done. It varies considerably in the pawnbroking trade. We delivered 291 l. 19 s. 10 d. on one Saturday, and we received for those pledges delivered 8 l. 1 s. 6½ d. for interest, and we delivered 860 pledges for that amount. That refers to a particular day, but I have not the reference to the day or the month.

5004. Mr. Alderman Carter.] What time of the year would it be?—It was in the autumn, or rather the end of the summer.

5005. Chairman.] Do the other figures show something of the same kind?—Yes; on another day day 365 l. 5 s. 9 d. was delivered, the interest being 10 l. 15 s. 3 d.

Mr. G. Scotson.

21 July 1870.

5006. Mr. Morley.] Do you mean that that was the ultimate settlement as regards those articles?—That was the gross profit received. On a particular day we delivered pledges upon which we had lent 365 l.

5007. Then you received that money back on that day?—We received the money back on that day.

5008. And on making a calculation you found that altogether upon this sum of 365 l. you made a profit of 8 l. odd; is that so?—No. There were 1,200 pledges delivered for the 365 l. 5 s. 9 d., and the interest upon that money was 10 l. 15 s. 3 d.

5009. Chairman.] Is that exclusive of the charge for the ticket?—That is exclusive of the charge for the ticket.

5010. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Then it was interest simply?—It was interest simply. On the third day 303 l. 3 s. 10 d. was received for goods delivered, the interest being 7 l. 15 s. 11½ d., and the number of pledges 920.

5011. Chairman.] Then to the interest you have to add as many halfpennies as there were pledges?—Yes. It must be borne in mind that we have to pay working expenses out of that. On the next three consecutive days we received 214 l. 4 s., the interest being 5 l. 9 s. 6 d., and 820 pledges being delivered; 219 l. 8 s. 2 d., the interest being 5 l. 7 s. 6 d., and the number of pledges redeemed 815; and 210 l. 4 s. 4 d., the interest being 5 l. 11 s. 7 d., and the number of pledges redeemed 790. At the worst period of the year, which is soon after Christmas generally, when trade is flat, on one day we received 204 l. 17 s. 8 d., the interest being 7 l. 12 s. 2 d., and the number of pledges redeemed 810. The next was 165 l. 5 s. 7 d., interest 4 l. 16 s. 1 d., number of pledges redeemed 565. The last is 173 l. 11 s. 4 d., interest 4 l. 14 s., number of pledges redeemed 620.

5012. Does that return relate to one year?—It relates all to one year.

5013. Do you approve of the present charge, or do you wish for an alteration in that respect?—I should prefer an alteration.

5014. In what way?—I should prefer doing away with the fractional parts, and adopting the Irish system of charging a halfpenny for every 2 s. advanced.

5015. You consider the Irish rate simpler?—Yes, much simpler; a halfpenny for the first month, or any portion of a month.

5016. With reference to the time for which a pledge should be kept, do you consider that six months is better than 12 months?—Yes, decidedly; for the lower class of pledges especially.

5017. Can you give any reasons for that?—In consequence of the change of fashion in the articles, and of the change in the manufacture of them. The manufacture of cloths and things of that sort is now different from what it was a few years ago. We find them much more perishable, and we have greater difficulty in keeping down moths; and as they get older they lose their colour, many of them not being dyed with fast colours, and they have to be sold at a very small profit, or at a loss.

5018. You propose that change in the interest of the person who pawns as well as the pawnbroker?—Of both sides.

5019. What is opinion with respect to free contract?—I should like to see free contract upon all bulky articles at any price; but it should, I think, be limited to bulky articles, and all above 2 l.

5020. Why would you have it limited to bulky articles and all above 2 l.?—Because I think they would be obliged to make an extra charge for the bulky articles being taken in, as they require more warehousing, and there is greater difficulty in warehousing them.

5021. Are you in the habit of receiving bulky articles?—We have generally declined them, our warehouse room being limited.

5022. Then it is in the power of the pawnbroker to decline bulky articles?—It is, or any article.

5023. What would you do with regard to articles above 2 l.—I should leave it then. People with articles worth more than 2 l. have generally sufficient intelligence to take care of themselves: but in that case, I should suggest that no one under 21 years of age should be allowed to make a special contract.

5024. You do not make any special contracts, you say?—We do not, under 10 l.

5025. What rate of interest do you charge above 10 l.?—Fifteen per cent.

5026. The law requires you to keep books; do you comply with the law in every respect?—I believe we do.

5027. What per-centage of your pledges are unredeemed at the end of twelve months?—About 7 per cent., 93 per cent. being redeemed. As regards the great bulk of those pledges which are unredeemed, we generally know to whom they belong.

5028. When you sell your pledges do you generally realise a profit upon them?—No, not generally; our profits upon the sales of pledges are very small. I find that in one place of business, pledges on what we call the lower class of goods, below 10 s., have been forfeited in one year to the extent of 394 l. 10 s., and after allowing 5 per cent. as the proper interest upon capital invested in them, we realised 7 l. 5 s.

5029. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You had 394 l. worth of goods unredeemed?—Yes.

5030. On that you charged interest at 5 per cent.?—Yes.

5031. What do you charge besides that?—Nothing.

5032. Did you charge no auctioneer's expenses?—No auctioneer's expenses.

5033. And then you say you lost 7 l. odd?—No, we realised 7 l. odd beyond the amount lent.

5034. Out of that would you have to pay auctioneer's expenses?—No, those were sold by private sale.

5035. What is the result of sales of the higher class of pledges?—Upon the average we should not clear more than from 7½ to 10 per cent. upon them, if we cleared that.

5036. You think that there is good competition if you realise the pledge?—There is a fair competition.

5037. And you take care not to advance more than they will bring?—We exercise the best judgment we can upon the matter.

5038. If a pawnbroker has advanced more than he ought to do, he ought to stand that loss himself, ought he not?—Decidedly.

5039. And he ought not to charge it upon his other customers by increasing the rates?—Decidedly not.

5040. Have

040. Have you many applications for overs? — Not many; on the last two applions there was deficiency and something to

041. Do you ever pay an overplus?—Always, whenever there is one.

042. How many cases of application have you ?—We have not had more than four in the last r.

043. Do you see any objection to the pawn-ker being called upon to advise the pledger en a sale is going to take place, that he may ch the sale of his property?—I see no objection it whatever, provided the amount is not to e below 10 s.

044. That is to say, that in the case of all dges above 10 s., the persons pledging may call n the pawnbroker at the time of deposit to ise him when the sale is going to take place, if has not redeemed it previously?—I see no ob-ion to that, and it would tend to induce people give their proper names and residences.

045. Is there any disadvantage in persons lging calling upon the pawnbroker at any e after the expiration of three months, so that pawnbroker has had time to get interest upon money to sell the pledge by public auction in er to get the benefit of the overplus?—That is uestion I have not thoroughly gone into. If pawnbroker was covered to the amount of his rest and his capital invested, I should see no ection to it whatever.

046. At present you are aware that the law tricts a pawnbroker from selling until the ex-ation of twelve months?—It does.

047. And if a person wished to go abroad and to redeem the pledge but to realise it, would re be any objection to his having power to l upon the pawnbroker to sell it?—I see no ection to it.

048. At what amount do you estimate the t of small pledges which are redeemed within hort time?—I calculate that we are not able take in any pledges at a cost of less than a le over 1 d. each in the working, or perhaps rly a 1½ d. each. In London it may be higher cause of rents and taxes and things of that t; but that is about my experience.

049. Chairman.] Are you able to make a fit upon the low pledges?—Not a very great fit upon the low pledges when they are re-emed very early.

050. What is the smallest amount which you vance upon pledges in Leeds?—As I said fore, I should not object to lend 6 d. if I thought individual was in need of 6 d. and had a per article for pledge.

051. Are there many instances occurring in ur trade when persons seem to require an vance of 6 d.?—Not many.

052. Would you give it as your opinion that edges deposited with you for less than 1 s. are nerally deposited with you for the purpose of pporting a family or to use for unwise pur-ses?—My experience, and I have a pretty fair owledge of the town of Leeds, is that it is for mily purposes and not for drink.

053. Do you ever divide the pledges?—Not hen they are offered for pledge.

054. If a woman brings her husband's coat d waistcoat, would you issue two tickets for em?—We should issue one ticket.

055. Is that the universal custom throughout eeds?—As far as I know, it is so.

5056. And splitting pledges, as is done elsewhere, would be considered by you as somewhat dishonourable?—We should consider it very dishonourable as a trade.

5057. Do you know anything of the duffing trade?—We used to be troubled with it a few years ago, but there is not much of it in Leeds at the present time.

5058. Was it a kind of trade where persons manufactured articles for pledging with you?—Yes; articles of spurious jewellery.

5059. Do you know anything of articles being bought at the unredeemed pledge sales and repledged again?—Such operations may take place, but I know of none except bonâ fide purchases, and then selling them or pledging them for money.

5060. But that is not done in Leeds as a trade?—Not as a trade.

5061. Have you had any case of collusion between the duffer and the pawnbroker with a view of defrauding the public?—I do not know of any cases in Leeds.

5062. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to any change of the law if Parliament chooses to enter upon legislation upon the subject?—No. I think that the penal clauses are, many of them, very proper, for the purpose of protecting both the pledger and the pawnbroker. I should certainly object to give a common policeman the power of going into a pawnbroker's shop and examining his books.

5063. Would you have any objection to enact that a pawnbroker should take out a license from the magistrates in order to certify his being a person of proper character?—I should not myself make a choice of applying to the magistrates, and I should not wish to impose upon others a duty which I should object to myself.

5064. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You would not like to go up like a publican every 12 months for a license?—I should not.

5065. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do you not think that it would tend to keep away men who were not of respectable character from the trade?—I do not know that it would elevate the trade very much; magistrates grant licenses for public-houses, and we find that there are individuals conducting public-houses who are not of very respectable character.

5066. Chairman.] If it was found in a police court that a pawnbroker had on more than one occasion been very careless, so as really to encourage the depositing with him of articles which had been stolen, would you recommend that the magistrates should endorse his license, with a view of its being suspended on the second or third occasion?—The law is sufficiently explicit on that point; if he knowingly takes stolen property, he is now liable to be brought before the magistrates and punished, not merely by the forfeiture of the amount, but by imprisonment.

5067. But if it is found that he did not know it to be stolen, because he made no inquiry, and acted with great negligence, so much so, that on several occasions he was found to have been the depository of stolen property, would it not be wise to endorse upon his license the fact, with a view of its being refused on the third or fourth occasion?—I should see no very great objection to it, where a person was so negligent as that.

5068. Would it not be a proper punishment for such gross neglect?—Undoubtedly it would.

5069. Mr. Alderman Carter.] You have been on the watch committee at Leeds for a long time, and

Mr. G. Scotson.

21 July 1870.

and you have had something to do with the police, would not the police keep a sharp look out upon a pawnbroker who was in that way?—No doubt.

5070. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Would it not save a great deal of trouble if the police had the power of examining the pawnbroker's books and stock?—I do not know that it would, because people do not make the arrangements where they can dispose of stolen property before they commit the robbery.

5071. Chairman.] But do not the watch committee in any borough find that a convenient mode of disposal of stolen property existing is an encouragement to theft?—A convenient mode of disposing of stolen property is so.

5072. Is the trade of pawnbroking, on the whole, in Leeds, profitable?—I should think it is; we can just make a living out of it.

5073. In some cases persons have made a very good living, have they not?—Not many, but it has been done in very rare cases; there are two or three who have made 10,000 l. or 12,000 l. probably, but they have probably been 25 or 30 years over it; but there are a great many more who have not succeeded.

5074. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Have those gentlemen who have done well in Leeds in pawnbroking been silversmiths as well as pawnbrokers?—Yes, generally.

5075. Chairman.] And they have been able to sell their unredeemed pledges?—Yes.

5076. Mr. Orr-Ewing.] Are the people of Leeds well employed?—At present they are.

5078. What wages do the men make when they are employed?—The wages vary considerably; there is the cloth trade, where they get 17 s. or 18 s.; in the iron trade they get up to 25 s. or 30 s.; and in the engineer's trade they get even to 30 s.

5079 Do people in the cloth trade only make 17 s. or 18 s. a-week?—Many of them.

5080. Are those weavers?—Persons employed in it; but there is very little woven in Leeds; it is principally done outside the town of Leeds.

5081. What do the women earn?—From 6 s. to 10 s., or 12 s. a week, and some of them perhaps more.

5083. I suppose that it is people with families of children who very often derive a benefit from those children getting wages?—When they get to a certain age.

5084. Do you find that it is people with young families who generally come to you to pledge?—All classes come to us.

5085. Do you find that the people who come to you for small pledges are the most depraved people in the town?—I do not; they are the working classes earning weekly wages.

5086. Do you think that a prudent thrifty workman gets himself into such distress that 1 s. is a great advantage to him?—I think that 1 s. is a great advantage to him, but I should doubt whether they are always very thrifty people.

5087. And 1 s. is of consequence to a man when he wants it for any proper purpose?—It is of consequence to a family when they have no dinner.

5088. Do you not think it a vicious state of society that people who are constantly employed at good wages should be so poor that 1 s. is of great advantage to him in maintaining a family?—I do not think that people getting good wages are generally those who borrow 1 s. It is generally those who get poorer wages.

5089. Then it is the poorer portion of the community who do business with the pawnbrokers?—Chiefly; but it does not follow that because a man is poor he is vicious.

5090. Are you against limiting the amount which you would advance, as is done in France, to sums above 2 s. 6 d.?—Yes, I am against that.

5091. How is it that the French nation can do without this system of low pawning?—They have a system of pawning just as much as here, only they have adopted a different system, the Government having it in their own hands, and they term it a charitable institution.

5092. But they do not advance any sums lower than 2 s. 6 d.?—I believe not.

5093. Is it not the case that the working classes of this country earn upon an average much higher wages than they do in France?—That I could not say.

5094. Does it not appear to you strange that in Paris the working classes can do without this pawn system for small amounts, and that we among our better paid artisans require it?—Probably they may have some other means of getting money on articles which I do not know of.

5095. Would you approve of Government appointing a commission to inquire into what other way they get it; would it not be very useful to this country if we could find some other system rather than pawnbroking?—I do not think that; I think the English system is much better than the French; it leaves a man free and open. I believe that if it is properly conducted you may do as much good in pawnbroking as in any other trade.

5096. Are you aware that the interest they charge in France is 9 per cent.?—There are other ways of calculating the profit besides the interest.

5097. Do you think that it is better for the poor people in this country who require to get money to aid them in their difficulties, to pay 20 per cent. to a pawnbroker, than to get it from the Government at 9 per cent.?—If they could get it at 9 per cent. it might be advantageous to the poor, but I do not know whether it might not cost the country as much to make up the deficiency by taking it out of the taxes.

5098. Are you not aware that they make a profit of 40,000 l. a-year, which they give to charitable institutions?—If it was so profitable, I should not object to its being tried by this Government, and their seeing what they could make out of it.

5099. For small sums?—For small sums.

5100. Or for the trade altogether?—Or for the trade altogether. It has been tried, I believe, twice or three times in this country, and failed, where individuals have set up a charitable institution.

5101. Never by Government?—Never by Government.

5102. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Do you know

fact, that in places where there are no pawnps, the poor-rates are higher than in other es where pawn shops exist?—I have heard it ed, but I do not know as a fact.

5103. We have had it in evidence here, that Glasgow they pawn a very large number of it are called club Bibles, and that at the rterly sale they will have as many as 300 les to sell; is there anything of that sort in gland, so far as you know?—I know of nothing hat extent; I suppose that they will probably family Bibles. There may be at each of our rterly sales from three to four Bibles, from pawnbrokers.

5104. Why would you limit special contracts ums above 2 l.; why should not a person be wed to borrow 1 l. by special contract on a ky article, as well as 2 l.?—I think I stated t I should prefer open contracts for bulky cles to any amount, only providing that the tract was not made by a person under 21 years ge.

5105. Do you find that, in your trade, cloth eriorates very much faster now than it did ny years since, and that it creates moths; I e the reason to be this, that one-half of the th which is made now is made of shoddy, not wool: you know something of the cloth trade; not that some reason why you should have power to sell at the end of six months rather n to keep the goods over 12 months?—That very strong reason why we should have it; find a great difficulty in preserving clothing e from moths if it lies 12 months.

5106. Do you find that cloths and silks are ed in a different way from what they were rs since, and so deteriorate in that way as ll as in others?—We find that the colours nge very materially by the materials being t on one side for 12 months; in fact, it is most tantamount to spoiling the goods.

5107. Can you tell me how many pawnbrokers u have at Leeds?—Fifty-five or fifty-six.

5108. It has been attempted before this Committee to prove that pawnbroking very materially ists drunkenness; how many of the pawnkers of Leeds are teetotallers?—There will a dozen, at least; perhaps nearly one-third.

5109. How many of the pawnbrokers of Leeds members and officers of religious societies?—least one-half of them. I understand the nourable Member's question to be whether ey are actively connected with them, or taking active part in them.

5110. Mr. Crum-Ewing.] Do that number beg to the Establishment or to the Dissenters?—All sorts.

5111. Mr. Morley.] You spoke of having the wer of realising the pledges after six months; you propose to confine that to clothing?—I ould prefer, as being more simple, and perhaps fer for the pledger, that it should be adopted niversally.

5112. You spoke about no one under 21 aking a special contract; I suppose you would low him to do it by producing some letter or rtificate; you would not absolutely exclude, nder any circumstances, anyone who was ot 21?—No; I should leave it to a pawnbroker a great measure to judge whether he was 21.

5113. Supposing that a young man of 20, aving undisputed ownership in a particular rticle, came into your shop, being able to prove at the article was his, and exhibiting that proof to you, would you, by Act of Parliament, exclude him from the power of raising any money, if he wanted it by special contract?—No.

5114. Do you find that people, as a rule, exhibit any shame at coming to a pawnbroker's shop?—Not as a rule.

5115. A great many shops have little side doors, and all sorts of appliances, to keep people from being seen or detected; I think it is absolutely false shame; but has your observation been that they come slipping in round a corner, if they can?—Not as a general rule; there may be exceptions to that, but they are rare.

5116. It is far better for a man to go to the pawnshop, is it not, than to go to the workhouse?—I should consider so.

5117. Are you in the habit of requiring the persons who pawn above a certain amount to enter their names in a book with an address?—No.

5118. Do you not think that that would be a a good plan?—It would take up a considerable amount of time.

5119. There can be no doubt, I presume, without at all impugning the character of pawnbrokers, that it is a business which is very open to dangerous consequences in the hands of bad men?—No doubt.

5120. Even a respectable man may be imposed upon; would it not be well to have the writing of every depositor above a certain amount, so that you might have his penmanship, at all events?—In the agreement pledges that is generally the practice above 10 l.; but below, it is not the practice at present.

5121. Chairman.] How many of the persons who pawn with you, if they were called upon to sign their names, would write their names?—All of them that we have are able to write their own names; they are generally people of some education, who are in temporary need of a few pounds.

5122. But the class of persons who come to you are generally persons who would not make a cross?—Yes.

5123. Are there many pawnbrokers in Leeds who transact a higher class of business than yours?—Five or six.

5124. Do they advance large sums of money?—Yes.

5125. Sums amounting to upwards of 100 l.? Yes.

5126. You do not advance to that extent, do you?—We do not cultivate that higher class of business.

5127. Have you any observations which you wish to make to the Committee which you have not made?—No.

5128. Mr. Orr Ewing.] What did you say was the average amount pawned with you?—A little over 5 s.

5129. You said that the majority of the parties that pawned with you could write their names?—No; I said the people who did business with us under special contracts above 10 l. could do so.

5130. How many of those borrowing amounts under 10 s. could sign their names?—That I cannot answer. More reliable evidence can be obtained in other ways than through pawnbrokers as to education.

5131. Could you not give us the average, by your knowledge that when tickets are lost the borrowers are obliged to sign certificates, and could you not say how often they put their marks?—Probably half of them, or more than half, put their marks.

Mr. GEORGE ATTENBOROUGH, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Attenborough. 21 July 1870.

5132. Chairman.] WHERE is your shop?—At the corner of Chancery-lane, Fleet-street, is one house, and I have another one in the Strand, opposite the Adelphi Theatre.

5133. Have you given your attention to the law and subject of pawnbroking?—I have been in the business for 33 years.

5134. Are there certain remedies which you have to propose?—Yes; I fancy I can see remedies which the promoters of the present Bill have not suggested to the Committee. They attempt to show that the cost price of a small pledge is 2 d. or 2¼ d. I disagree altogether with the theory which they set up by which to work out that result, inasmuch as I think you will find that they divide the total cost of the conduct of their business amongst the total number of transactions which are negotiated in the course of the year. Thus, I think that if A. receives in pledge 40,000 parcels in the course of the year (and that is a very fair number; I take in that number myself, so that I am not conjecturing), his delivering those out after the rate of 500, or 1,000, of them within the first week, does not entitle A. to charge against each one the one-forty thousandth part of his year's expenses, as those gentlemen do, whether it be rates, rent, salaries, or even loss by bad business, because in doing that he decidedly brings into his calculation the salary paid to his foreman. I say, with all respect, that I pay to my foreman a large sum, and he is not concerned at all in taking in many of the pledges; then why should I average out his salary to show that the poor man's pledge costs me 3 d., and that by taking it in I lose 2¼ d.? I say that it is a fallacy. Beyond that, I wish to state to the Committee that the result must be that every 10 l. pledge which a pawnbroker has in his house, and which at the end of the year produces him 30 s., must produce him 29 s. 9 d. profit upon the same scale. I say that is a complete fallacy into which those gentlemen have willingly drifted, not with any mischievous intention at all.

5135. Are the Committee to understand that the theory by which the pawnbrokers make out the cost to be sometimes 2¼ d., sometimes a little more, and sometimes a little less, is fallacious?—Decidedly; for the reasons which I have thus briefly stated.

5136. Have you any objections, beyond those already indicated, to the increase in the form of ticket money or interest upon the lower class of pledges?—I have a very strong objection to the interest being calculated in any other way than pro ratâ; that is, that it shall be upon a fixed per-centage, whether that be 20 per cent., as it is now by Act of Parliament, or more, as this Committee might feel it in their province to recommend; I do not myself ask for more, nor do half the pawnbrokers of London ask for more, because they are well contented with the present rate; but I should like to show to the Committee, if it would not be tedious, how it would become injurious to the borrower if you have other than a pro ratâ calculation. It will take out of the poor borrower's hands all his power. I think it is suggested that one halfpenny shall be the interest of 2 s. for one month, and as soon as the amount lent passes 2 s. it shall be 1 d. per month. The effect of this will be as follows: it will take out of the poor borrower's hands all his power. The moment that 1½ d. is the legal interest for 4 s. 3 d., as under the proposed scheme, it would be the pawnbroker may be excused if he declines to lend 6 s., because he gets no more interest on a 6 s. advance than he would upon the smaller amount of 4 s. 3 d. By lending 4 s. 3 d. he would get the same interest as he would by lending 6 s., and thus the borrower would be constantly liable to submit to an unfair advance. In one transaction it might not amount to much, but the amount of capital which it would save to the pawnbroker would be something that I have not ventured to calculate. A much smaller capital invested on transactions of 4 s. 3 d. would come to the same result as a larger capital invested upon transactions of 6 s. Thus upon what I would venture to call Mr. Hardaker's scheme, termed by me the "step process," the interest of one year upon 2 s. 3 d., which, under the present Act, is 6 d., or one halfpenny per month, will hereafter be 1 s., or 44½ per cent. per annum. The interest upon 4 s. 3 d. for one year is now 10 d., then it would be 1 s. 6 d., or after the rate of 35½ per cent. per annum. The interest upon 10 s. 3 d. for one year will be 3 s., or about 29½ per cent. per annum. Not to be tedious, I pass on to the smallest rate per cent. which you can find in the proposed scheme, which is that upon 40 s. 3 d. The interest, which is now 8 s., will then be 10 s. 6 d. for a year, or 26¼ per cent. Again, in connection with the question of profits, I have travelled on into that of half-months respecting which this Committee has had much evidence. In dealing with clause 5, which defines and regulates half-months, the same spirit pervades the new proposals, that is to say, they are giving little and taking much. They wish to make a concession of three days, that is, we get half-a-month's interest now for seven days; but they wish to throw away the privilege which is conceded to us of taking half-a-month for seven days, and to take upon the tenth day a whole month's interest, which is giving to the public three days, abstracting from the public four days. Thus we now give them seven days before we charge the half-month, but hereafter we shall give them 10 days, and on the eleventh we shall be entitled to charge one month's interest. That, again, will be a considerable aggravation of the pawnbroker's profit.

5137. Colonel Beresford.] You quoted a halfpenny for 2 s.; you will, I think, see that it is a halfpenny for under 2 s.?—That intensifies my case. I say that the moment a pawnbroker lends 2 s. 3 d., hereafter he will have the privilege of charging 1 d. a month for it; then why should he lend 4 s.

5138. Mr. Alderman Carter.] Is it not the Irish rate for which the pawnbrokers are contending?—I never was a pawnbroker in Ireland, and I do not know.

5139. Then you do not know whether in the place where this has been tried there have been those faults found with it and those evils which you say will be the result of adopting that rate?—There is nothing here which is borrowed from others. It is my own working out, and I am not indebted to any experience in Ireland for any of the facts which I bring before you.

5140. Would not any rate going by steps be liable to precisely the same objection as you ou have made?—I venture to answer the queson thus: that the established rate by Act of arliament is emphatically one of per-centage, d the pawnbrokers of London, and I hope the country, are sufficiently well educated it to calculate it correctly, if they wish to do

. The moment that you give a new rate you troduce new irregularities, and they will have learn the business over again. This question s been well argued and firmly settled some 15
16 years ago.

5141. But I still press the question, would not y process by steps of this kind be liable to the me objection as you have taken to the 2 s.?—
ndoubtedly it would; consequently I have a rong preference for the pro ratâ system, which ery young man can calculate.

5142. Then you would have all the fractional jections in the system in the future, that you ve had in the system in the past?—I would.

5143. Would you compel the pawnbroker to d the farthings?—I may say that I do as fine business as any pawnbroker, and I keep as any farthings as the poorest, and no customer s the opportunity of going away without ceiving the farthing.

5144. Do you do a low business?—I am well quainted with all kinds of business.

5145. I ask you, do you do a low business, or your business an exceptional business, where ur pledges are for large amounts?—I admit at my pledges many of them are large ones;
t my principal shop is under the shadow of emple Bar, which you might call a link uniting e west with the east of London; and in just ch a sense my business is somewhere between e two extremes, that of a high business, and extremely low one.

5146. What is the number of your pledges der 3 s. during the year?—I have not taken at out of my books.

5147. Can you give in the number to within 0 or 1,000?—Yes; I should think we take in per day under 2 s., and I should like to use e opportunity of stating, that I never yet have ken ½ d. for a pledge under 5 s. I should mis-d the Committee if I spoke as to two shops.
am only speaking of one in anything I say.

5148. Then do you take in 6,000 low pledges year at each of your pledge shops, or only at e of them?—At each of them.

5149. That is, 12,000 per annum?—Twelve ousand per annum. A pawnbroker under-ands by low pledges everything below 10 s.
ut I am not misunderstanding you; I say that I take in 20 per day of 2 s. 6 d. and under, at each shop; but it will be more convenient to speak as from one shop.

5150. You have been arguing that in making the calculation on the low pledges you ought to take no account of the other business, because the manager may have nothing to do with the low business; do the 12,000 pledges of small amounts pay, throwing out of the account, if you like, the manager?—I shall answer that question best, I think, in these words: that my expenses would be precisely the same if I had not those 12,000 low pledges.

5151. Then it would be right, in calculating the expenses of the low pledges, to divide the whole pledges over the amount of the expenses of your business?—If you please; but I must ask the Committee to remember that that leaves the 5 l. and 10 l. pledge costing no more than the 1 s. ones.

5152. Chairman.] Is it not the fact that the pro ratâ system which you advocate is somewhat difficult to calculate?—Emphatically no.

5153. Could you conduct the business profitably on pledges at the present rate under 10 s.?—There is no business in London to which such a question would apply. There is no business in London composed of pledges limited to 10 s.

5154. I am aware of that; but do you calculate that business transactions on the present scale, where pledges were under 10 s., would be profitable or unprofitable?—The same reply occurs to my mind, and I cannot get rid of it.

5155. Mr. Alderman Carter.] If the pledges only average 6 s., would that be a paying business, or would it be likely to be a paying business?—Undoubtedly.

5156. Chairman.] At the present rate?—I am sure that it does pay; and you will allow me to remind the Committee of something which has emanated from them. It has been asked repeatedly whether or not it is the habit of pawnbrokers to divide pledges; some ingenious question was even asked if a shawl was separated from a gown, and so on. Is not that suggestive to the minds of the Committee that some pawnbrokers are thinking that the greater the number of pledges the greater the amount of profit. If their theory is worth anything, the greater the amount of transactions the greater would be their loss.

5157. Has not your calculation been based upon extreme points, that is to say, the worst aspect of the step process?—Yes, I admit that.

CONDITIONS DU PRÊT.

1° La durée de l'engagement est d'un an.

2° L'administration prélève six pour cent pour l'intérêt des prêts et trois pour cent pour les frais de régie, de manutention et d'assurance; ces droits sont proportionnels au nombre de quinzaines écoulées, à l'exception du premier mois qui se paye entier (l'Administration peut être autorisée exceptionnellement à percevoir un droit temporaire de compensation).

3° Il est dû en outre un droit fixe d'appreciation d'un demi pour cent sur le montant du prêt.

4° Tout nantissement non renouvelé ou dégagé dans le délai d'un an est vendu dans le cours du treizième mois ; toutefois il est loisible à l'emprunteur de requérir la vente de son nantissement trois mois après l'engagement (les marchandises neuves exceptées).

5° Si le montant de la vente est supérieur à la somme prêtée plus les droits, l'excédant (Boni) reste à la disposition de l'emprunteur ; mais tout boni qui n'est pas réclamé dans le délai de trois ans à partir du jour de l'engagement, appartient aux hospices.

6° En cas de perte du nantissement, la valeur en sera payée au propriétaire au prix d'estimation fixé lors du dépôt par les Commissaires priseurs de l'établissement et avec l'augmentation d'un quart en sus à titre d'indemnité.

Pawnbrokers Act, New York.

Section 1. The mayor of the said city may, from time to time, grant licenses, under his hand and seal, to such persons as shall produce to him satisfactory evidence of their good character, to exercise or carry on the business of a pawnbroker.

2. Every person receiving such license, shall pay therefor the sum of 50 dollars, for the use of the city.

3. Every person so licensed shall, at the time of receiving such license, enter, with two sufficient sureties, into a joint and several recognisance, to the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York, in the penalty of 500 dollars, conditioned for the due observance of all such ordinances of the common council as may be passed or in force respecting pawnbrokers, at any time during the continuance of such license.

4. Every pawnbroker shall keep a book, in which shall be fairly written, at the time of each loan, an accurate account and description of the goods, article, or thing pawned, the amount of money loaned thereon, the time of pledging the same, the rate of interest to be paid on such loan, and the name and residence of the person pawning or pledging the said goods, article, or thing.

5. Every pawnbroker shall, at the time of each loan, deliver to the person pawning or pledging any goods, article, or thing, a memorandum or note, signed by him or her, containing the substance of the entry required to be made in his or her book by the last preceding section; and no charge shall be made or received by any pawnbroker for any such entry, memorandum, or note.

6. The said book shall, at all reasonable times, be open to the inspection of the mayor, recorder, aldermen, assistants, and special justices for preserving the peace of the city of New York, or any or either of them, or of any person who shall be duly authorised, in writing, for that purpose, by any or either of them, and who shall exhibit such written authority to such pawnbroker.

7. Every pawnbroker who shall violate, or neglect, or refuse to comply with any or either of the provisions of the fourth, fifth, or sixth sections of this title shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 25 dollars.

8. No pawnbroker shall ask, demand, or receive any greater rate of interest than 25 per cent. per annum upon any loan not exceeding the sum of 25 dollars or than seven per cent. per annum upon any loan exceeding the sum of 25 dollars, under the penalty of 100 dollars for every such offence.

9. No pawnbroker shall sell any pawn or pledge until the same shall have remained one year in his or her possession, and all such sales shall be at public auction, and not otherwise, and shall be made and conducted by such auctioneer as shall be approved of for that purpose by the mayor of the city of New York.

10. Notice of every sale shall be published for at least 12 days previous thereto, in one or more of the daily papers printed in the city of New York; and such notice shall specify the time and place at which such sale is to take place, the name of the auctioneer by whom the same is to be conducted, and a description of the goods or articles to be sold.

11. The surplus money, if any, arising from any such sale, after deducting the amount of the loan, the interest then due on the same, and the expenses of the advertisement and sale, shall be paid over by the pawnbroker to the person who would be entitled to redeem the pledge in case no such sale had taken place.

12. No pawnbroker shall make any loan on the separate or divided part or parts of any one article or thing, and which article or thing shall have been offered entire or collectively to him or her, by way of pawn or pledge.

13. No pawnbroker shall, under any pretence whatever, purchase or buy any second-hand furniture, metals, or clothes, or any other article or thing whatever, offered to him or her as a pawn or pledge.

14. Every pawnbroker who shall violate, or neglect, or refuse to comply with any or either of the provisions of the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, or thirteenth sections of this title shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100 dollars.

AN ANALYSIS of the PLEDGES REDEEMED at a PAWNBROKER'S (being the same House of Business as that referred to in Statement C.) on ONE SATURDAY, 7th May 1870.

	Number of Pledges Redeemed.	Amount which had been Lent on the same.	Interest at Redemption.	Ticket Fees at Time of Pledging.	TOTAL Charges.	Per-centage on the Money that had been Advanced on the Pledges.
Redeemed within One Month of the Date of Pledging - - -	1,553	304 17 4	5 18 8½	3 8 -½	9 6 9	= 3·05 per cent.
Those Pledged at more remote Dates - -	346	72 8 2	8 6 2½	- 14 11½	9 1 2	= 12·57 per cent.
TOTAL - - -	1,899	377 5 6	14 4 11	4 3 -	18 7 11	= 4·88 per cent.

It will be seen from the above, that the gross remuneration on one (ordinary) Saturday's business was equal to 4·88 per cent. on the amount which had been lent; and, by reference to Statement C., it will be found that the business expenses (4·355 per cent.) absorb nearly the whole of that remuneration.

Note.—The object of putting in this statement is to show that many pawnbroking transactions can yield no profit to the Pawnbroker, while others must necessarily occasion a loss.

Saturday's redemptions are mostly new date pledges, therefore the per-centage is lower than on other days, when the redemption of a larger proportion of old date pledges tends to raise the per-centage of remuneration. This may be at once seen by Columns 1 and 2 of the Schedule at foot of Statement C.

[N.B.—In this Index the Figures following the Names of the Witnesses refer to the Questions in the Evidence; and those following App., to the Pages in the Appendix.]

A.

ACCOUNTS. Approval of separate books and accounts for pledges above and below 10 s., Hardaker 85-89. 117, 118. 150. 161; M'Call 1400——Simple and uniform plan on which pawnbrokers' accounts in London are generally kept, the result of each business and the profit made being clearly shown from day to day, Dicker 443, 444——Improvement if pawnbrokers were required by law to record all their transactions, Williamson 1636–1641.

Advantage if it were required that pawnbrokers should keep three books instead of two, by having a book for pledges under 5 s., Walter 2438–2445——There is no entry in detail by witness of the receipts in redemption of the pledges, ib. 2456–2458——Books kept by witness produced in explanation of his daily system of business, ib. 2459–2466.

Careful record now kept of each transaction, Rd. Attenborough 2712–2714. 2766–2768——Objection by witness to his being compelled to record all transactions above 10*l.*, though he does so voluntarily, ib. 2783–2785. 2796–2802.

Disapproval of the proposal in the Bill as to not keeping books in cases of special contract, Sir T. Henry 3577, 3578——Instance of irregularity in the filling up of a pawnbroker's book before the pledgers had entered the premises, Johnston 4099-4104.

Acts of Parliament. Enumeration of the several Acts by which the pawnbroking trade is regulated, Hardaker 6-14——Consideration of, and objections to, several clauses in the principal Act, the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, as to the mode of calculating and charging the interest on advances, ib. 15 et seq. ——Simplification required in several of the clauses of the Act 9 & 10 Vict., ib. 162, 163.

Simplification required in many of the clauses of the Pawnbrokers' Act, G. Attenborough 735, 736; G. M'Kay 4386, 4387——Ignorance of witness's customers as to the Act of Parliament, May 1109, 1110——Very imperfect character of the Pawnbrokers Act, Brooking 1165–1167.

Witness has written a book on pawnbroking, but found it most difficult to compress and simplify the law, Stubbs 3027-3034——Conclusion as to certain clauses of the Pawnbrokers' Act not being necessary, or admitting of abbreviation, Turner 3929-3933 Expediency of the "Dolly Shop Act" (19 & 20 Vict.) being incorporated with the proposed new Act, ib. 3938.

See also Evasion of Act. Freedom of Contract. Interest.

Advances on Pledges. Full value advanced upon the goods deposited, Dicker 639; G. Attenborough 693–696.

Age of Pledgers. Hardship in manufacturing towns if children under sixteen years of age could not pledge goods; approval of this restriction in Liverpool, Hardaker 264. 278–280——Approval of pledgers being necessarily sixteen years of age, G. Attenborough 827——Penalty under local Act at Liverpool, for receiving pledges from persons under sixteen years of age, Stubbs 3080——Suggestion for the adoption of a uniform limit of age below which pledges should not be taken, Turner 3625, 3926——Recommendation that the limit of age for persons pledging in Scotland be fixed at sixteen years, Johnston 4125.

Amsterdam. Twofold system of pawnbroking in operation in Amsterdam; particulars hereon, Keeson 2366–2393.

Form of Amsterdam small pawnhouse ticket, App. 243.

Arrestment of Wages. Effect of the tally system and of the law of arrestment of wages in increasing the practice of pawning in Scotland, M'Donald 3782-3789. 3814——Benefit anticipated from the Arrestment of Wages Bill, ib. 3785. 3819——Tendency of the Arrestment of Wages Bill to check the pawning of club blankets and Bibles, Scoular 4581, 4582.

Attenborough, George. (Metropolitan Pawnbrokers' Protection Society.) (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been engaged in pawnbroking for about forty years; is honorary secretary of the Metropolitan Pawnbrokers' Protection Society, 663–668——Dissatisfaction expressed with the present rate of interest in the case of small pledges, an adoption of the Irish rate in England being desirable, 668-673——Opinion that there should be a penny ticket fee upon all pledges, 674–976——Conclusion that for several reasons freedom of contract is desirable, in conjunction with a statutory rate; the competition would prevent any prejudice to the public, 677–695. 704-709. 737–749.

Statement as to the unprofitable character of the business of pawnbrokers in the case of the smaller pledges redeemed within a month, 684–689. 714–719——Full value advanced by witness upon the goods deposited, 693–696——Circumstance of about 95 per cent. of the pledges being redeemed; loss upon the five per cent. unredeemed, 696-699. 768–770——Extensive manufactory of goods in London for "duffing" purposes, pawnbrokers being frequently victimised in advancing upon these goods, 700–703. 765–767.

Suggestion that special contracts be not made with persons under twenty-one years of age, and that the form of contract be signed in each case, 708–710. 737–739——Very small quantity of stolen goods disposed of by pledging, 711–713——Improvement if instead of seven days of grace after the first month there were ten days of grace, and if then another month were charged, 720–724——Expediency of forfeiture of all pledges at the end of six months, 725–733——Approval of the pawner's right to overplus on sale of pledges over 10 s.; 733, 734.

Simplification required in many of the clauses of the Pawnbrokers Act, 735, 736——Severe loss sustained by witness on his sales of pledges, whilst there are but few overpluses unclaimed, 750–755. 764——Large number of "leaving-shops" or "dolly shops" in London, it being very difficult to suppress them, 756–763——Separate establishment kept by witness for the sale of pledges under 10 s., there being, on the whole, a loss upon such sales, 771–777.

Publicity of the auction sales of goods above 10 s., the pawnbrokers sometimes buying the goods for private sale, 778–782——Question considered whether the law requires alteration on the subject of overpluses and deficiencies when pledges above 10 s. are sold; hardship in some cases of overplus if the pawnbrokers cannot make a set-off for a deficiency, 783–792. 812.

Use generally made of the county court rather than of the magistrate's court in proceedings against pawnbrokers, 793–796——Amendment required in the law in cases where the pawnbroker is required to deliver up pledges on affidavit, though not made by the owner, 796-803——Unprofitable character of the pawnbroking business further adverted to; large proportion of pawnbrokers who become insolvent or bankrupt, 804–808.

Explanation relative to a certain return which shows that the expenses per pledge taken vary greatly in different years, 809-811. 825, 826——Objections to pawnbrokers insuring pledges in the interests of the pledgers, 812–822——Great difficulty involved in the fractional charges of interest; practice of witness in the matter, 822–824——Approval of pledgers being necessarily sixteen years of age, 827——Non-objection to the hours of business being from eight to seven, except on Saturday, when the hour should be extended to eleven, 828, 829.

Attenborough, George (Strand and Fleet-street). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Long experience of witness as a pawnbroker in London, where he has two shops, one in Fleet-street, and one in the Strand, 5132, 5133——Fallacy of the calculations whereby the promoters of the Bill contend that the cost of each pledge is from 2 d. to 2½ d., 5134, 5135. 5150, 5151——Defence of the pro ratâ system of charge, though involving fractions and farthings; facility with which calculated, 5136. 5140–5143. 5152——Statement that half the pawnbrokers in London are well contented with the present rate, 5136.

Very prejudicial effect upon the pawner if a rate of ½ d. for 2 s., or if any "step process" be adopted in lieu of the pro ratâ system, 5136–5141——Considerable aggravation of the pawnbroker's profit by the proposal to charge for a full month after ten days' grace, 5136——Large number of low pledges as well as of high pledges taken by witness, 5144–5149——Conclusion that pledges under 10 s. are remunerative, and that an average of 6 s. pays at the present rate of charge, 5150–5157.

Attenborough, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Pawnbroker in Piccadilly; deals chiefly in large pledges above 10*l.*, 2682–2686. 2879–2881——Payment of 15 per cent. interest by the special contract pledges, less the working expenses, which range from 5 to 7½ per cent., 2687. 2763–2765——Diminution in the scale of profit when the pledges are under 1*l.*, 2688, 2689——Less liability to deception by "duffers" in the high class goods goods than in low pledges, 2690, 2691——Importance of a fixed statutory rate for the smaller pledges; the limit might, however, be reduced from 10*l.* to 5*l.*, 2692, 2693. 2698–2701. 2876–2878.

Complicated and unintelligible character of the present scale of charge, very few of the lower classes properly comprehending what they ought to pay, 2693. 2882——Amended scale suggested, by which a pledger should pay a 1*d.* on 3*s.* for the first two months, increasing to 2*d.* for the third and fourth months; simplicity to be secured by this scale, which witness believes would be remunerative, 2693, 2694. 2769–2775. 2847–2863. 2868–2875. 2920–2926.

Respects in which a six months' forfeiture would be a great improvement, 2695, 2696. 2776–2780. 2883, 2884——Effect of entire freedom of contract that every dolly shop would become a licensed pawn shop, to the injury of the public, 2696. 2761, 2762——Expediency of freedom of contract as regards bulky articles, such as pianos, 2702–2707. 2782——Approval of the endorsement of the charge upon the ticket, 2708–2712——Careful record now kept of each transaction, 2712–2714. 2766–2768.

Practice of witness as to giving up pledges when tickets are lost without an affidavit being made; risk incurred, 2715–2716——Great reluctance of respectable pledgers to give their real names and addresses, 2720–2727——Constant renewal of many of witness's pledges, hardly 5 per cent. being forfeited, 2728–2731——Information relative to the public sales of witness's forfeited pledges; hardship in his being called upon to give up the surplus in some cases, whilst generally he cannot recover any deficiency, 2732–2753. 2760. 2803–2806. 2826–2828. 2885–2915.

Remunerative character of witness's business, the sale trade being an important portion of it, 2754–2759. 2885, 2886. 2915——Approval of a prohibition on the sale of tickets, 2781——Objection by witness to his being compelled to record all transactions above 10*l.*, though he does so voluntarily, 2783–2785. 2796–2802——Very small quantity of stolen property pledged with witness; occasional pledging of plate, through the carelessness of housekeepers, 2786–2795. 2815–2818. 2834–2839.

Strong objection to a general power of police interference or inspection, 2807–2814. 2822–2825——Advantage of charitable societies for advancing upon pledges of low value, 2819–2821——Loss involved on pledges on which a halfpenny is taken, 2829——Profits under the French system adverted to; absence of competition, 2830–2833——Approval of a higher license duty, 2841——Objection to the licenses being granted and controlled by the magistrates, 2842, 2843.

Great activity of the "duffing" trade, many persons living by it, 2844, 2845. 2864–2867——Approval of compulsory notice to the pledgers when pledges above 5*l.* are to be sold, 2903–2907——Charge of 5 per cent. by the auctioneer, 2908–2910——Objection to officially appointed auctioneers, 2913——Disapproval of the Irish rate as too complicated for the poorer classes, 2916–2918——Absence of necessity for applying the provisions of the Factory Act to pawnshops, 2927–2930.

Attenborough, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Decided objection to the proposal for free trade in pawnbroking, as tending greatly to lower the character of the trade, and to drive a large amount of capital out of it, 3241, 3242. 3287. 3293. 3426——Proposition that the business of pawnbrokers be confined to pledges below 2*l.* or 5*l.*, and that advances above such limit be made by silverbrokers, who should pay a double license duty, 3243–3261——Very large capital (more than 100,000*l.*) employed by witness, 3249. 3376.

Sufficiency of interest at the rate of 15 per cent. for advances above 2*l.*, 3257–3259——Suggested adoption of the Irish rate of a halfpenny for 2*s.* up to 2*l.*, fractions and farthings being at the same time abolished, 3262–3265. 3307–3309. 3412–3416——Proposal that after ten days' grace an additional month be charged, 3262, 3263——Strong condemnation of dolly shops and their operation, more stringent police control being much required, 3265–3277. 3396–3401.

Decided objection to increased powers of inspection and interference by the police over pawnbrokers in London, though the Glasgow pawnbrokers may require such inspection, 3278–3287——Evil results expected if there were freedom of contract in regard to low pledges, as many dolly-shop keepers and dishonest Jews would license as pawnbrokers, and would exact exorbitant interest, 3287. 3292, 3293. 3310–3315. 3327–3329——Approval of the hours of business being from eight till seven, 3288–3291.

Advantage of prohibiting the sale of tickets, 3294, 3295——Suggestion for empowering pledgers to call for a sale when they cannot redeem the goods, 3295, 3296——Very large auction sales of witness's pledges; great respectability of the auctioneers, 3296——Failure of freedom of contract in Australia, 3297——Approval of a six months' forfeiture, with three months' notice; effect thereof in lessening the amount of capital required, 3298–3304.

Effect of competition in preventing large profits, 3305, 3306——Suggestion that the interest be 25 per cent. on pledges up to 2*l.*, 20 per cent. from 2*l.* to 5*l.*, and 15 per cent. beyond 5 l., 3307–3309——Conclusion as to pledgers of the lower class not being able to protect themselves in the absence of a compulsory rate, 3310–3315. 3331–3342. 3356–3359——Low character of many of the Glasgow pawnshops, 3315. 3320–3322——Approval of prohibiting pledges under 2 s. 6 d., 3316–3318.

Dissent from the view that the money obtained on small pledges is mostly spent in drink or is otherwise dissipated, 3319, 3320. 3341, 3342——Beneficial effect of pawnshops, the money being frequently raised for provident purposes, though there is a large amount of shame felt in resorting to the practice, 3323–3326. 3341–3348——Information in connection with witness's business, the large value of a great portion of the pledges, the interest charged, &c., 3349–3393.

Statement as to witness not making any profit on his sales, 3389——Payment by witness of 500 l. a year in overplus from sales, 3390–3393——Approval of notice of sale being given to the pledger, 3394, 3395——Objection to pawnbrokers being required to apply to the magistrates for their licenses, 3402–3411——Exceptions taken to the calculations of Mr. Dicker, with reference more especially to his mode of arriving at the average cost per pledge, 3416–3426.

Blackwood, Benjamin. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has an extensive business at Bradford as pawnbroker, 1651–1660——Number of pawnbrokers in Bradford with reference to the population, 1654. 1738–1740——Particulars relative to witness's business; very moderate profits made, 1661–1682——Way in which he deals with unredeemed pledges; system of quarterly sale by public auction, all the Bradford pawnbrokers joining in such sales, 1682–1692.

Suggested increase of the present rate by charging 1 d. for all tickets under 10 s. as in Ireland, 1693–1695——Great difficulty in applying the fractional charges, whereas it is desirable to be able to tell the pledgers precisely what they will have to pay, 1696–1700. 1743–1745——Feeling of the Bradford pawnbrokers in favour of freedom of contract for pledges above 40 s.; witness would approve of unrestricted freedom in the matter, 1701–1711. 1751–1771. 1815–1818.

Evasion of the Act in Bradford in farthings not being reckoned, 1712, 1713——Views of the majority of the Bradford pawnbrokers in favour of the twelve months' forfeiture being made absolute, without three months' notice, 1714. 1741, 1742——Suggestion that after seven or ten days' grace a month's interest be charged, 1715——Grounds for inferring that very few stolen goods are ever pledged with witness, 1717–1735——Non-objection to freer facilities of inspection to the heads of the police, as in Glasgow, 1736, 1737.

Approval of the duplicates stating that the day and place of sale of the pledge, if unredeemed, may be ascertained on inquiry, 1749, 1750——Examination to the effect that recourse to pawnshops is not, as a rule, a proof of improvidence, and is frequently a provident proceeding, 1760–1771. 1782. 1789–1814——Further reference to the auction sales at Bradford; absence of abuse as regards purchases by the pawnbrokers, 1772–1781. 1783–1788.

Deposit Notes. Form of deposit note, as adopted by Mr. Richard Attenborough and others, App. 244——Forms adopted by Mr. Asher of Sunderland, and Mr. Chilton of Berkhampstead, ib. 246.

Dicker, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Long experience of witness as a pawnbroker in the metropolis, where he has four establishments; he is also treasurer of the Metropolitan United Pawnbrokers' Protection Society, 420–434——Primary importance attached by witness to an alteration of the rate of profit, the system of one rate for all kinds of transactions being very objectionable, 435——Much greater expenses of pawnbroking than when the rate of profit was laid down seventy years ago, ib.——Badness of the law in leading largely to evasion, and as having a demoralising effect, ib.

Argument that there should be perfect freedom of contract as to the rate charged, but that a fixed rate should be laid down for convenience, which should be binding if special contracts were not made, 436–442——Approval of the Irish rate, 438——Simple and uniform plan on which pawnbrokers' accounts in London are generally kept, the result of each business and the profit made being clearly shown from day to day, 443, 444.

Sundry accounts submitted to the Committee (App. 250–253), and explanations in detail thereon, showing the very small profit made by witness at his different shops, 444–483——Proportion of expenses charged by witness to his sale business, 468–474——Result of witness's accounts that the net earnings from pledges are only about 5½ per cent., whilst the earnings upon the sales yield about 27 per cent, 475. 483——Average of 6 s. 11 d. as the amount of each pledge during a year, the average cost of expense being 3¼ d., 477–481.

[Second Examination.]—Small part of witness's profit on sales which arises from unredeemed pledges, 484——Further information as to the expenses for staff and rent in connection with the sale business, 485–493 — Particulars with further reference to the question of profit, showing in detail the gross earnings and the expenses, 494–506——Calculation showing a loss upon those pledges which are redeemed within a month, 502–507. 522–527.

Large number of transactions on Saturday night, this business not being profitable, 508–511. 522–527. 662——Information as to the mode of calculation when fractions are involved; excess frequently charged so as to avoid farthings or fractions, 512–515——Approval of the interest being marked on the ticket when the article is pledged; facility of doing this if the rate in Ireland be extended to England, 516–519——Necessity of paying the shop assistants liberally, 520, 521——Custom of many houses not to charge the halfpenny ticket fee in the case of very small amounts, 528, 529.

Proposition that the Irish rate of interest be adopted, concurrently with freedom of contract; particulars hereon as to the operation of the Irish rate when the transactions are small, 530–553. 567–571——Doubt whether it is desirable to alter the present ticket fee or not, 530. 541——Suggestion that when there is a special contract, the signature of the person making the contract should be insisted upon 555. 615–618.

Respects in which forfeiture at the end of six months instead of twelve months would be more convenient to the public as regards payment of interest, 556–559——Statement as to the sale of forfeited pledges being a losing part of the pawnbroking business; necessity, however, of a sale business attached to the pawnbroking department, 560–565. 656——Non-objection to the license duty being raised as a means of ensuring respectable pawnbrokers, brokers, 572-574——More stringent measures required as regards "dolly shops," 575-577.

Belief as to the right of recovery of deficiency on the re-sale of pledges, 578, 579——Difficulty of accounting for the large number of pawnbrokers, considering the business is so unprofitable, 578-588——Conclusion that as there are now no laws for protection against usury, there ought to be a law of free contract, 589-592——Illustrations of the expediency of pawnbrokers being allowed to charge special rates for bulky articles and for articles involving special risks, 592-606. 615-619.

Approval of the regulation as to the hours of business not being longer than from eight in the morning till seven in the evening, 607-609. 614——Very rare instances of any pawnbrokers opening on Sunday, 610-612——Grounds for concluding that, under a system of freedom of contract, the more needy pledgers would not be prejudiced, 620-622. 639——Advantage to the poorer classes in being able to raise money through pawnbrokers, instead of going to unlicensed shops or to loan societies; views of the late Mr. Dickens on this point, 623-625.

Explanation as to the prohibition upon unlicensed persons taking in pledges and advancing money upon them; considerable evasion on the part of dolly shops, 626-634 Doubt as to the necessity of any reduction of the time in which overpluses may be claimed, 635-638——Statement as to pawnbrokers lending the full amount on goods on account of the competition in the trade, 639.

Grounds for the conclusion that there is but an exceedingly small quantity of stolen property taken in by pawnbrokers, 639-648——Strong objection to increased police interference with pawnbroking, 648-650——Advantage if the tickets were taken from a book in which a counterfoil should be kept by the pawnbroker, 651, 652——Instances of unredeemed goods sold for much more than was advanced upon them, the surplus not being surrendered unless it be demanded, 653-661.

Drunkenness and Improvidence:

1. Concurrence of Evidence as to the large Use made of Pawnshops by the Drinking and Improvident Classes.
2. Evidence to a contrary Purport.

1. Concurrence of Evidence as to the large Use made of Pawnshops by the Drinking and Improvident Classes:

Advantage if there were no pledges under 5 s. or 6 s., the money being generally spent in drink, M'Call 1329-1331. 1381-1387. 1427, 1428. 1444-1447——Expenditure in drink of most of the money raised in Glasgow on small pledges, ib. 1330, 1331. 1444-1447—— Belief that pawnbroking is injurious to the working classes, as facilitating the disposal of their property by the improvident, ib. 1357. 1380-1396. 1417, 1418. 1433-1435——Conclusion that the pawnbroking system tends to the demoralisation of the lower classes by affording facilities for obtaining drink, Miller 1464-1471. 1562 1566.

Grounds for the conclusion that drunkenness and misery are amongst the results of the pawnbroking system in Scotland, Hector 1856-1858. 1993-2003——Particular instances in illustration of the effect of pawnbroking in facilitating drunkenness and misery, ib. 1890-1898. 1902——Great prevalence of drunkenness and crime in other districts, as well as in East Renfrewshire, ib. 1982, 1983. 1987-1988. 1993-2001.

Great temptation to drink under the system of pawning, the system having a demoralising tendency as regards the lower classes, Sir T. Henry 3663-3666——Examination in support of the view that the practice of small pawns is especially objectionable, and should be abolished, the money being usually expended in drink, Johnston 4019-4022. 4031-4033. 4150-4158. 4166-4172.

Expenditure in drink of a large portion of the money raised by pledges at Nottingham, the tickets being frequently lost, Raynor 4235-4245.——Probability of the advances in London being in many instances spent upon drink, Sir W. Bodkin 4690——Very extensive prevalence of weekly pledging by the improvident and poorer classes in Edinburgh, the general result being that they gradually become poorer and sink into pauperism, McDonald 3773-3784. 3807-3824. 3875-3887.

2. Evidence to a contrary Purport:

Dissent from the view that pawnbroking facilities lead to improvidence and drunkenness among the working classes, Hardaker 423-425——Belief that as a rule the money raised by pledges at Salford does not go in drink, May 1022-1027——Examination to the effect that recourse to pawnshops is not, as a rule, a proof of improvidence, and is frequently a provident proceeding, Blackwood 1760-1771. 1782. 1789-1814.

2. Evidence to a contrary Purport—continued.

Evidence to the effect that the money raised on pledges is not largely spent in drink or improvident purposes, A. M'Kay 2090-2115. 2162-2178. 2195-2198; Robert Attenborough 3323-3326. 3341-3348——Dissent from the view that the money obtained on small pledges is mostly spent in drink, or is otherwise dissipated, ib. 3319, 3320. 3341, 3342.

Grounds for concluding that the money raised on pledges is not spent on drink, Scoular 4469-4471——Denial that pawning is a proof of improvidence; degree of analogy hereon between pawners and borrowers from banks, Shaw 3490-3500. 3525-3533. 3553-3557.

Duffing. Extensive manufactory of goods for "duffing" purposes, pawnbrokers being frequently victimised in advancing upon these goods, G. Attenborough 700-703. 765-767——Frequent imposition practised by "duffers," in pledging made-up watches and other articles, May 952, 953.

Statement showing that the public, as well as the pawnbrokers, are defrauded by "duffers," Walter 2610-2613——Collusion at times between the pawnbrokers and the "duffers," with a view to the latter selling their pawn tickets to the public; suggestion hereon that the sale of tickets be prohibited altogether, and that the pledgers be empowered to call for a sale of the goods, ib. 2614-2634——Great difficulty in convicting "duffers," ib. 2621.

Less liability to deception by "duffers" in the high-class goods than in low pledges, Richard Attenborough 2690, 2691——Great activity of the "duffing" trade, many persons living by it, ib. 2844, 2845. 2864-2867——Custom of "duffers" at Glasgow to buy clothing at sales and to re-pledge it at a profit, Scoular 4437. 4551-4553.

E.

Edinburgh:

Immense numbers of the poorer classes in Edinburgh who are in the habit of pawning and redeeming goods weekly, the average amount of the pledges in each family being about 5 s., M'Donald 3773-3784. 3875-3884——Arrangement by which a special police force is set apart for inquiry after stolen property at the pawnshops, ib. 3825, 3826.

Explanation of witness's duties, as procurator fiscal in Edinburgh, in regard to prosecutions against pawnbrokers; Johnston 4010-4015——Limited extent to which cases of violation of the Pawnbroking Acts and questions of stolen goods come before witness, ib. 4012-4018——Grounds for the conclusion that stolen goods are taken to pawnshops in very considerable quantities, the convictions for theft being no criterion of the extent of the practice, ib. 4016. 4022-4032.

Very improper manner in which auction sales are conducted on the pawnbrokers' premises in Edinburgh; expediency of all sales being conducted periodically by one auctioneer on his own premises, Johnston 4050-4080——Statement to the effect that there is no objectionable secrecy in carrying on the pawning of goods in Edinburgh, ib. 4125, 4126——Small number of prosecutions brought by witness against pawnbrokers; amount of penalties enforced, ib. 4145-4149.

As manager of the Equitable Loan Company of Scotland, carrying on business at Edinburgh, witness explains generally the operations of the company, Russell 4712-4714——Employment by the company of a capital of 27,000 l., ib. 4715-4718——Total of about 72,000 pledges received in the year; small proportion of these under 2 l., ib. 4719-4723——Average of 11 s. 3 d. received on each pledge, ib. 4729-4731.

Statement as to the periods for which the pledges remain, about ten per cent. being unredeemed, Russell 4732-4738——Practice of witness's company in holding periodical sales, duly advertised, at which all forfeited pledges are sold without reserve, ib. 4739-4753——Evidence showing in detail the receipts, expenses, and profits, ib. 4754 et seq.

Receipt of pledges by witness from persons in all ranks of society; very large advances sometimes made, Russell 4833-4837——Charge of fifteen per cent. for advances under special contract, bulky articles being received without extra charge, ib. 4838-4847——Exceedingly small quantity of stolen property pledged with the Edinburgh pawnbrokers, ib. 4860-4863——Effectual inspection by the police, every facility being given by the pawnbrokers, ib. 4868-4877——Large quantity of cheap watches and jewellery pledged with witness, these, if forfeited, being grouped for sale, ib. 4911-4914.

Entrances to Pawnshops. More effectual check by the police if there were but one entrance to each pawnshop, and if such entrance were as public as possible, M'Call 1403–1407—— Use of two entrances to most of the London pawnshops, one being for the sake of privacy, Williamson 1612–1614. 1627–1629.

Equitable Loan Company of Scotland. See Edinburgh.

Evasion of Act. Frequent evasion of the provisions of the Pawnbrokers' Act as to fractions or farthings being charged, Hardaker 30. 55–61—— Badness of the law in leading largely to evasion, and as having a demoralising effect, Dicker 435—— Circumstance of the Pawnbrokers' Act being constantly evaded by witness as regards auction sales, and in other respects; evasion of the Act, more or less, by the pawnbrokers generally in Manchester and Salford, May 1048–1054. 1077. 1102–1108. 1145–1151—— Statement as to witness not placing in his shop a table of interest, as required by the Act, Walter 2512. 2663–2671—— Obstacles to successful prosecutions in Edinburgh under the present Act, even though it be constantly evaded, Johnston 4064–4069.

F.

Factory Act. Absence of necessity for applying the provisions of the Factory Act to pawnshops, Rd. Attenborough 2927–2930; Sir T. Henry 3751.

Farthings and Fractions. Very objectionable operation of clauses 4 & 5 of the Act 39 & 40 Geo. 3, as involving fractional calculations very difficult to carry out; frequent evasion under Clause 4, Hardaker 22–32. 50, 51. 55–75—— The present rate is not remunerative, even after taking advantage of the fractions of farthings, ib. 50—— Information as to the mode of calculation when fractions are involved; excess frequently charged, so as to avoid farthings or fractions, Dicker 512–515—— Great difficulty involved in the fractional charges for interest; practice of witness in the matter, G. Attenborough 822–824.

Unsatisfactory working of the Pawnbrokers' Act, as involving fractions of money and of months, of a very complicated and unintelligible character; instances of this, May 919–924. 988, 989—— Practice of witness in discontinuing receipt or payment of farthings, and in charging halfpence instead, ib. 1077. 1078. 1155, 1156—— Great difficulty in applying the fractional charges, whereas it is desirable to be able to tell the pledgers precisely what they will have to pay, Blackwood 1696–1700. 1743–1745—— Evasion of the Act in Bradford, in farthings not being reckoned, ib. 1712, 1713.

Decided objection to farthings and fractions, Walter 2436, 2437—— Witness decidedly objects to farthings; nor would he have any halfpence, Rd. Attenborough 2693. 2771—— Legal difficulty now liable to arise in respect of the payment of farthings, Turner 2956–2959—— Inoperativeness of the Act in Liverpool as to farthings being given, Stubbs 3095.

Suggested abolition of farthings, Johnston 4081, 4082—— Proposed abolition of fractional parts of a month, as not being understood by the lower classes; suggestion that an average rate be adopted instead, ib. 4105–4108—— Witness would have no fractional parts and no half months, Scoular 4485—— Difficulty of witness at Edinburgh as to the fractional calculations, Russell 4771–4784. 4901.

Objection to fractions not being retained; suggestions hereon, Shaw 3448–3452.

3. Question of Alteration as regards the Three Months' Notice.
4. Suggested Freedom of Contract as to Time, the present Period being retained as the implied Time.
5. Proposed Simplification of the Law in the Matter of Forfeiture.

1. Suggestions for a Reduction of the present Period of Forfeiture:

Evidence showing that much disadvantage arises from the present period of forfeiture, and that a six months' forfeiture would be exceedingly beneficial both to the pawnbroker and to the pledgers, Hardaker 184–205. 217–235; G. Attenborough 725–733; Nathan 896; May 933. 1134–1136; Brooking 1168. 1195. 1202–1204. 1222; A. Mc Kay 2039–2043. 2131–2135. 2187, 2188; Scoular 4537–4542. 4546–4548: Scotson 5016–5018. 5105, 5106. 5111.

1. Suggestions for a Reduction of the present Period of Forfeiture—continued.

Larger sums advanced upon goods if the time of forfeiture were reduced to six months, Hardaker 201——Respects in which forfeiture at the end of six months, instead of twelve months, would be more convenient to the public as regards payment of interest, Dicker 556–559.

Approval of the period of forfeiture being shortened with reference to certain specified articles, M'Call 1346–1348; Williamson 1611; Russell 4848–4852——Advantage of reducing the period of forfeiture for clothing and all articles liable to deterioration, Keeson 2394–2398.

Respects in which a six months' forfeiture would be a great improvement Rd. Attenborough 2695, 2696. 2776–2780. 2883, 2884——Advantage of only six months' forfeiture in the case of winter clothing, Stubbs 3127–3129——Approval of a six months, forfeiture, with three months' notice; effect thereof in lessening the amount of capital required, Rt. Attenborough 3298–3304.

2. Objections to the proposed Limitation:

Disapproval of a reduction of the term of forfeiture to six months, Hector 1972–1975——Grounds for strongly objecting to the proposed reduction of the time of forfeiture to six months; injury thereby to the public, Walter 2487–2501. 2595, 2596——Objection to any reduction of the time for redeeming the pledges; complaints already made by pawners on this subject, Sir T. Henry 3571–3575. 3621, 3622. 3633–3638. 3690. 3737.

3. Question of Alteration as regards the Three Months' Notice:

Objection to the clause under which by means of notice the time of forfeiture may be extended from twelve to fifteen months, Hardaker 190–198.——Approval of a retention of the three months' notice, if the period of forfeiture be reduced to six months, May 1152–1154——Views of the majority of the Bradford pawnbrokers in favour of the twelve months' forfeiture being made absolute, without three months' notice, Blackwood 1714. 1741, 1742——Approval of the right of three months' notice for redemption, Walter 2506, 2507——Amendment suggested as regards the system of three months' grace, Turner 3904–3907.

4. Suggested Freedom of Contract as to Time, the present Period being retained as the implied Time:

Contemplated freedom of contract as to the time for which a pledge should be received, there being also an implied arrangement, Hancock 2244, 2245. 2256. 2263–2265—— Proposal that the present time of forfeiture be the implied time, subject to eventual alteration, ib. 2255, 2256. 2263–2265.

5. Proposed Simplification of the Law in the Matter of Forfeiture:

Suggestion with a view to the law being made more clear as to goods under 10 l. value being absolutely forfeited on the expiration of a year, Turner 3901–3903.

Forged Tickets. Proposal that the section of the Act relating to forged notes or tickets be struck out, and that this offence be dealt with under the general law, Turner 2972–2978.

Fractional Calculations. See Farthings and Fractions.

FRANCE:

Sundry details relative to the constitution and working of the monts de piété, Keeson 2273 et seq.——Charitable object of these institutions which are a monopoly, private persons having no right in France to advance upon pledges, ib. 2276–2280——Power of pledgers to deal with the central establishment or with commissionaires or auxiliary establishments; particulars relative to the practice in each case, ib. 2281 et seq.; 2409–2430.

Inquiry made of the pledgers, and forms exacted, before money is advanced upon goods, Keeson 2291–2298——Unduly large tickets given to the pledgers, ib. 2296. 2301——Practice of redemption of pledges; absence of privacy, ib. 2301–2307——Minimum of three francs advanced, there being no maximum limit, and the average being very high, ib. 2308. 2314, 2315. 2329–2331. 2334. 2342——Different rates of interest in different parts of the country; other charges made, ib. 2309, 2310.

Long periods before the redemption of the pledges, twelve months being the time of forfeiture, Keeson 2323–2326——Varying cost per pledge of conducting the monts de piété in different towns; high value of the pledges adverted to hereon, ib. 2332–2334——Conditions in France and other foreign countries relative to the delivery of stolen property pledged, ib. 2337–2341——Practice as to the sales of forfeited pledges in France, and as to the disposal of the surplus, ib. 2343–2348—— Small proportion of forfeitures, ib. 2348——Frequent renewal of the loans upon the pledges, ib. 2349–2352.

Several restrictions in France as to the persons from whom goods may be received at the monts de piété, Keeson 2353, 2354——Conditions required in the event of loss of ticket, ib. 2355–2357——Belief as to there being illicit pawnshops in Paris, ib. 2358——Very valuable character of large numbers of the pledges, a considerable proportion of the advances being, however, made to the working classes on clothing, &c. ib. 2359–2365. 2409–2414. 2422——Absence of freedom of contract in France, ib. 2427——Practice as to the borrowing of money by the monts de piété; low rate at which raised, ib. 2428–2430.

Profits under the French system adverted to; absence of competition, Rd. Attenborough 2830–2833.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT:

1. Evidence in Favour of Freedom of Contract generally, or as regards bulky Articles and Pledges above 2l. Value.
2. Evidence opposed to Freedom of Contract, more especially as regards small Pledges.
3. Suggested Freedom of Contract as to the Time of Redemption, as well as the Amount of Charges.

1. Evidence in Favour of Freedom of Contract generally, or as regards bulky Articles and Pledges above 2l. Value:

Expediency of pawnbrokers being allowed to make special contracts in the case of large articles which occupy much warehouse room, Hardaker 20, 21. 52–54——Argument that there should be perfect freedom of contract as to the rate charged, but that a fixed rate should be laid down for convenience, which should be binding if special contracts were not made, Dicker 436–442——Suggestion that when there is a special contract the signature of the person making the contract should be insisted upon, ib. 555. 615–618.

Illustrations of the expediency or pawnbrokers being allowed to charge special rates for bulky articles and for articles involving special risks, Dicker 592–606. 615–619——Grounds for concluding that under a system of freedom of contract the more needy pledgers would not be prejudiced, ib. 620–622. 639.

Conclusion that, for several reasons, freedom of contract is desirable in conjunction with a statutory rate; the competition would prevent any prejudice to the public, G. Attenborough 677–695. 704–709. 737–749——Importance of freedom of contract with reference to bulky articles, ib. 705–707——Suggestion that special contracts be not made with persons under twenty-one years of age, and that the form of contract be signed in each case, ib. 708–710. 737–739.

Expediency of a power to make special contracts under certain conditions, there being also a statutory rate, Telfer 859; Nathan 896–911; Brooking 1196–1204——The right of special contract might be limited to pledges above 40*s.*, Nathan 899–909——There should be no special contract with any pledger under twenty-one years of age, Nathan 910, 911; A. M'Kay 2228.

Conclusion as to the importance of a right of special contract in the interests both of the pledger and the pawnbroker, May 925–932. 1045–1047. 1058. 1066, 1067. 1079–1086——Under freedom of contract, pledgers would be perfectly able to take care of themselves, ib. 1033–1037——Feeling of the Bradford pawnbrokers in favour of freedom of contract for pledges above 40*s.*; witness would approve of unrestricted freedom in the matter, Blackwood 1701–1711. 1751–1771. 1815–1818——Approval of freedom of contract for bulky and perishable articles exclusively, A. M'Kay 2208–2218; Rd. Attenborough 2702–2707. 2782.

Conclusion that the repeal of the usury laws should be made complete, by removing the restriction upon pawnbrokers, and by establishing freedom of contract, as in all other trades, Hancock 2234–2242. 2252——Recommendation that in conjunction with freedom of contract there be a statutory implied rate, ib. 2237–2243. 2252–2262.

Statement in favour of freedom of contract as regards furniture and other bulky articles, the present rate not paying the pawnbroker, on account of the expense of storage; doubt as to the enhanced rate to be charged, Turner 3956–3961. 3984–4009——Argument that freedom of contract as to pledging at enhanced rates is a boon to parties wanting to raise money, as compared with the obligation of selling their property for the purpose, ib. 3994–4009.

Approval of special contract for advances of two guineas and upwards, Russell 4917, 4918. 4934, 4935; Stubbs 3096–3101. 3133–3179——Suggestion for freedom of contract for bulky articles, and for articles above 2*l.*, provided the pledger be not under 20 or 21 years of age, Scotson 5019–5023. 5104. 5112, 5113.

Objections

2. Evidence opposed to Freedom of Contract, more especially as regards Small Pledges:

Objections to a right of special contract, more especially as regards articles below 10 s.; M'Call 1320–1345. 1357–1360——Capability generally of the poorer classes, in London, to look after their own interests in their dealings with pawnbrokers; objection, however, to a system of freedom of contract, Williamson 1591–1593. 1604–1610——Strong objection to freedom of contract under 2 l.; effect thereof in greatly encouraging the licensing of "leaving shops," Walter 2569–2571. 2581. 2605——Great prejudice to the poorer and illiterate classes if freedom of contracts were applied to pledges under 40 s.; ib. 2659. 2674. 2677.

Importance of a fixed statutory rate for the smaller pledges; the limit might, however, be reduced from 10 l. to 5 l., Rd. Attenborough 2692, 2693. 2698–2701. 2876–2878——Effect of entire freedom of contract that every dolly-shop would become a licensed pawnshop, to the injury of the public, ib. 2696. 2761, 2762——Doubt as to the poorer classes being capable of protecting themselves in the event of special contracts for pledges below 2 l.; non-objection above that amount, Stubbs 3096–3101. 3133–3179.

Decided objection to the proposal for free trade in pawnbroking, as tending greatly to lower the character of the trade, and to drive a large amount of capital out of it, Rt. Attenborough 3241, 3242. 3287. 3293. 3426——Evil results expected if there were freedom of contract in regard to low pledges, as many dolly-shop keepers, and dishonest Jews, would license as pawnbrokers and would exact exorbitant interest, ib. 3287. 3292, 3293. 3310–3315. 3327–3329——Conclusion as to pledgers of the lower class not being able to protect themselves in the absence of a compulsory rate, ib. 3318–3315. 3331–3342. 3356–3359.

Decided objection to special contracts being allowed; question hereon whether for those in need the power of pledging is not better than the necessity of selling, Shaw 3453–3490. 3515–3524——Grounds for the conclusion that it would be very mischievous to allow freedom of contract, or to permit free trade as low as 40 s. pledges, Sir T. Henry 3576–3581. 3591. 3618–3620. 3691–3693. 3706–3720. 3722–3730——Disapproval of freedom of contract, save above 10 l., Johnston 4115, 4116.

3. Suggested Freedom of Contract as to the Time of Redemption, as well as the Amount of Charge:

Proposition for freedom of contract as to the time of redemption, the present period being retained as the implied time, Hancock 2244, 2245. 2255, 2256. 2263–2265.

Glasgow:

1. Extent and Character of the Pawnbroking Business of Glasgow.
2. Stolen Goods.
3. Police Regulations.
4. Sales of Pledges.
5. Wee Pawns.

1. Extent and Character of the Pawnbroking Business of Glasgow:

Total of 109 pawnbrokers, in Glasgow, a very large business being transacted, M'Call 1242–1252. 1375–1379——Great majority of the pledges under 10 s. value, ib. 1253——Respectability of the Glasgow pawnbrokers as a class, though there are exceptions to this rule, witness citing various instances of dishonest practice, ib. 1256–1275——Advantage if the licenses of three pawnbrokers, out of 109, were cancelled, ib. 1349. 1429——Varying form of books and of tickets in use, ib. 1353–1356——Low class of the population which deals with pawnbrokers, this class showing no improvement socially or physically, ib. 1380–1396. 1412–1414.

Conclusions as to the very injurious effects of the pawnshops as regards the lower classes, Miller 1464 et seq.——Estimate of from 150,000 l. to 200,000 l. as spent yearly in interest in Glasgow, ib. 1564–1566.

Calculation that 6,960,000 pledges are made annually in Glasgow, the average of each pledge being 4 s., A. M'Kay 2011–2013. 2111——Respectability of the Glasgow pawnbrokers as a body, ib. 2199–2202.

Low character of many of the Glasgow pawnshops, Rt. Attenborough 3315. 3320–3322.

Calculation that there are about 5,000,000 pledges in Glasgow yearly, Scoular 4413——Average of about 3 s. 6 d. as the value of the pledges below 10 s., ib. 4414——Principal classes of articles pledged with witness, clothing being largely pawned, ib. 4415–4421——Considerable number of club blankets and club bibles pawned, ib. 4547–4550. 4578–4580.

2. Stolen Goods:

Exceptional instances of stolen goods being taken knowingly by the pawnbrokers; they might, however, give greater facility to the police on this score, M'Call 1269–1281——Grounds for the conclusion that there is a very large quantity of stolen goods pawned in Glasgow, the pawnshops tending moreover to encourage theft, ib. 1371–1374. 1401. 1455–1458——Frequency of stolen goods being pledged in Glasgow, Miller 1547, 1548.

Expediency of sending to Pollockshaws, and other places, lists of articles stolen in Glasgow, Hector 1868——Great number of articles reported to the Glasgow police as stolen, witness contending that these articles are mainly disposed of through pawnbrokers and brokers, ib. 1869–1874.

Statement showing the facilities given by pawnbrokers for the detection of theft, A. M'Kay 2053. 2136–2148——Very small losses of witness through stolen goods, ib. 2081. 2119–2123—— Conclusion as to very little stolen property in Glasgow being taken to pawnbrokers, but rather to the receiving shops, ib. 2093–2095. 2149–2156—— Explanation as to the apparently large number of pawnbrokers or of assistants who are witnesses in prosecutions, ib. 2096–2098——Exceedingly small quantity of stolen property deposited in pawnshops, Scoular 4442–4448.

3. Police Regulations:

Provisions in the Glasgow Police Act for regulating and restricting the pawnbroking business, and for preventing fraud; beneficial effect of these restrictions, M'Call 1291–1303——Facilities at present for the inspection by the police of pawnbrokers' books, ib. 1421–1424. 1430–1432.

Complaint in regard to the course pursued towards the pawnbrokers when goods are alleged to be stolen, A. M'Kay 2081–2086. 2145–2148——Tendency of the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act to check the pledging of stolen property, ib. 2136–2144.

Ample facilities of the Glasgow police for inspection, so as to detect stolen goods pledged, Scoular 4449–4456——Statement as to the police not taking proper trouble to find out the pledgers of stolen goods, ib. 4482, 4483. 4516, 4517.

4. Sales of Pledges:

Practice of the pawnbrokers in regard to sales, M'Call 1436–1439——Practice of witness as to selling all unredeemed pledges by public auction; serious loss incurred by these pledges, Scoular 4422–4441. 4510–4515. 4518–4521. 4526–4530——There are only about six pawnshops having saleshops attached, Scoular 4554, 4555; Davidson 4600.

Previous publicity given to the auction sales of unredeemed pledges in Glasgow, Davidson 4590–4595. 4611——Attendance chiefly of brokers, who are the principal purchasers, the public not largely attending, ib. 4596, 4597.

Exceptional instances of pawnbrokers bidding at the auction sales, or buying in the pledges through the auctioneer; particulars hereon as to the conduct of the sales by witness, and as to the prices realised, Davidson 4598 et seq.——Inaccuracy of a statement as to sham sales being got up in Glasgow and Edinburgh for pawnbrokers' pledges, ib. 4643, 4644.

5. Wee Pawns:

Total of about 450 licensed "wee pawns" in Glasgow, M'Call 1448, 1449——Large number of brokers in Glasgow who carry on the "wee pawn" system; expediency of this being prevented, Hector 1867——Very large and irregular business formerly done by the "wee pawns" in Glasgow, the restriction upon this system having led to a large increase of legal pledging, A. M'Kay 2061–2076.

Large increase in the number of licensed pawnbrokers in Glasgow after prosecutions were conducted against the "wee pawns" under the Act of 1856, Scoular 4395–4400——Considerable number of "wee pawns" still in Glasgow, the charges being much higher than in the licensed shops, and the mode of transacting business being very objectionable, ib. 4401–4411.

Government. The Government might very well take up the whole question of pawnbroking, Miller 1553——Advantages of the Government system of pawn establishments in France and other countries; check thereby upon crime, Sir T. Henry 3602-3606. 3610, 3611. 3667-3677. 3703-3705——Approval of a Government system in this country, as on the Continent, ib. 3673–3677——Suggestion whether Government might not take charge of pawnbroking, G. M'Kay 4344-4346——Exceptions taken to a system of Government advances as in France, and to the exclusion of pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.*, Scotson 5090–5101.—— See also France.

H.

Hancock, William Neilson, LL.D. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Barrister-at-law in Dublin; has made an official report upon the Irish pawnbroking laws, 2229-2231——Existence of the present Pawnbroking Acts in Ireland since before the Union, 2232, 2233——Origin of the pawnbroking laws as an exception to the usury laws, 2234——Conclusion that the repeal of the usury laws should be made complete by removing the restrictions upon pawnbrokers, and by establishing freedom of contract as in all other trades, 2234-2242. 2252.

Recommendation that in conjunction with freedom of contract there be a statutory implied rate, 2237-2243. 2252-2262——Contemplated freedom of contract as to the time for which a pledge should be received, there being also an implied arrangement, 2244, 2245. 2256. 2263-2265——Statement as to witness having in 1850 recommended the repeal of the usury laws in Ireland; beneficial results as regards the working classes, 2249-2252.

Failure of an attempt made in Ireland several years ago to establish monts de piété, at reduced rates of interest, 2252, 2253——Suggestion that the present rates in Ireland and in England be adopted in the first instance as the implied rates, to be altered or assimilated subsequently, as experience may prove to be desirable, 2254. 2259-2262——Proposal also that the present time of forfeiture be the implied time subject to eventual alteration, 2255, 2256. 2263-2265.

Explanation as to Government not having yet taken action upon witness's report, 2257——Apparent claim of English pawnbrokers to a revision of the existing rate, 2261——Satisfactory working of the Irish rate, 2262. 2271, 2272——Failure of the system in Ireland of official auctioneers or appraisers for the sale of pledges, 2266, 2267——Advantage if pledgers had facilities of proceeding against pawnbrokers in the police courts, 2266.

Grounds for recommending that the pawnbroker should give notice to the pledger of intended sales, 2268, 2269——Explanation of witness's recommendation that the detective police in Ireland should have statutory power of searching pawnbrokers' shops without warrant, 2270.

Hardaker, Alfred. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had large experience as a pawnbroker at Liverpool, 1-5——Enumeration of the several Acts by which the pawnbroking trade is regulated, 6-14——Consideration of, and objections to, several clauses in the principal Act, the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, as to the mode of calculating and charging the interest on advances, 15 et seq.——Expediency of pawnbrokers being allowed to make special contracts in the case of large articles which occupy much warehouse room, 20, 21. 52-54.

Very objectionable operation of clauses 3, 4, and 5 of the Act 39 & 40 Geo. 3, as involving fractional calculations very difficult to carry out; frequent evasion under clause 4; 22-32. 50, 51. 55-75——Suggestion that the rate in Ireland be adopted in England, and that there be a uniform charge of a halfpenny per month for each 2 s. or part of 2 s., without any intermediate calculations for portions of a month, 25-28. 32——Satisfaction to be given by an extension of the days of grace from seven to fourteen, if at the end of fourteen days a full month may be charged for, 33-49. 63, 64——Allowance of only three days of grace in Ireland, after which the whole month is charged for, 33. 69-72

Difficulty of getting from pledgers their correct name and address; unnecessary particulars required, 76-84. 105-116. 120. 124, 125. 132-134——Suggestion that the keeping of two books should suffice; one for pledges under 10 s., and one for pledges over 10 s., 85-89. 117, 118. 150-161——Proposal that the pawnbroker be obliged to place upon the duplicate the interest to be charged per month, 90-92. 126, 127——Expediency of a revision of the rate of charge for the ticket or duplicate, as well as a revision generally of the law, it being found that the trade is not at present remunerative, 92-97. 119. 121-123.

Statement as to the small pledges being no profit at all, but rather a loss, on account of the labour involved, 93. 145, 146. 299, 300. 322-332. 373-381. 416-418——Objection to the clause requiring the pawnbroker to endorse on the ticket the amount of profit received, 98-104. 281. 285, 286——Explanation on the subject of the unremunerative character of the pawnbroking business, the profits arising chiefly on the sale stock, 121-123. 299-310. 320, 321. 360-372.

Much larger proportion of pledges below 10 s. than above 10 s., 128-131——Necessity of selling by public auction all pledges above 10 s.; loss incurred by witness in respect of these pledges, 135-141——Approval of a penalty for mis-description by pledgers, 142-144——Satisfaction to be given by the present charge for tickets if the Irish rate of interest be adopted, 147——Simplification required in several of the clauses of the Act 9 & 10 Vict.; 162, 163——Amendment required in the provisions as to declarations rations signed by magistrates; propriety of the pawnbroker being exempt from liability when he has delivered up goods under certificate declared before a magistrate, 162–183.

Varying forms of pawn tickets in different towns, 170 —— Grounds for the conclusion that the period of forfeiture should be reduced from one year to six months, 184–205. 217–235—— Objection to the clause under which, by means of notice the time of forfeiture may be extended from twelve to fifteen months, 190–198——Practice as to the advertisement of sales; obstacle to a strict compliance with the Act in this respect, 206–209. 213–216——Non-objection to honest competition in the trade, so long as the law is not evaded, 235–238.

Liability of the pawnbroker for loss of goods, or for injury, where negligence can be proved, 239–242——Exception taken to the requirement that certain pledges, such as Fine Art goods, shall be sold separately at particular seasons of the year, 243–248—— Objection to so long a period as three years within which application may be made for the surplus from sales, 249–263—— Hardship in manufacturing towns if children under sixteen years of age could not pledge goods; approval of this restriction in Liverpool, 264. 278–280.

Grounds for concluding that it may safely be left to the pawnbrokers to regulate their own hours of business, 264–277——Practice of some pawnbrokers to advance in excess of 10*l.*, the Act of Parliament not applying beyond this limit; form of agreement used in such cases, and varying interest charged, 284. 288–298 —— Expectation that under the amended rates proposed by witness there would be no loss of business by pawnbrokers, 311–319.

Numerous small or low pledges now taken to "leaving-shops," where advances are illegally made; advantage if these pledges were taken by pawnbrokers, under an amended system of charge, 316–319. 409–418—— Examination upon the question of witness procuring statistics from the trade as to the number of pledges of different amounts, as to the interest received, and as to the actual profits made, 333–372——Antic pated objection by the trade and the public to a discontinuance of advances under 2*s.* 6*d.*, 382, 383. 398, 399.

Small quantity of blankets and bed-clothing pledged at witness's establishment; doubt as to blankets being pledged by the working classes in large numbers, 384–395——Inexpediency of any restriction upon the pledging of body-clothing or bed-clothing, 396–406. 419–422—— Dissent from the view that pawnbroking facilities lead to improvidence and drunkenness among the working classes, 423–425.

Hector, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is procurator fiscal for the eastern district of Renfrewshire; has had long official experience in the district, which includes Pollockshaws, 1821–1826——Statistics as to the great increase of crime in this district since 1840, and as to the great increase of poor rates in Eastwood parish since 1835; 1827–1840—— Marked change for the worse in the habits of the people of Pollockshaws after the introduction of two "wee pawns" in 1835, the system of pawnbroking having been beyond a doubt one of the principal causes of the change, 1841–1845.

Part taken by witness and the magistrates of East Renfrewshire in causing the passing of the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 27, bringing the "wee pawns" under license, 1846–1848—— Great extent to which pledging is carried at the two pawnshops in Pollockshaws, blankets and body-clothing being among the chief articles pawned, 1849–1856——Grounds for concluding that a very large proportion of the money raised by pawning at Pollockshaws goes in drink, and that pauperism and crime are greatly fostered thereby, 1856–1858. 1993–2003.

Comparative novelty of the system of pawning in Scotland, there having been only one pawnbroker in 1806; rapid increase in recent years, 1859–1861—— Estimated aggregate of 18,720,000 pledges in Scotland, and of 207,780,000 in the United Kingdom, 1862—— Communications received by witness from all parts of Scotland, concurring in the view that pawnbroking encourages crime, 1863——Large proportion of the witnesses in cases of theft, &c., which consists of pawnbrokers, 1864–1866. 1958, 1959.

Large number of brokers in Glasgow who carry on the "wee-pawn" system; expediency of this being prevented, 1867——Necessity of sending to Pollockshaws and other places lists of articles stolen in Glasgow, 1868——Great number of articles reported to the Glasgow police as stolen, witness contending that these articles are mainly disposed of through pawnbrokers and brokers, 1869–1874——Entire inadequacy of the police inspection of the register as a means of detection of stolen goods, 1872. 1876.

Inducements to the less respectable pawnbrokers to receive stolen goods, 1875—— Grounds for concluding that pawnbrokers in Scotland are a thriving class, 1877, 1960–1963. 1978, 1979——Advantage if pawnbrokers had to come to the magistrates once a year for renewal of their licenses, 1878. 1892—— Statement in favour of entire separation of the sale department from the pawnbroking department; inducement at present to encourage forfeiture of pledges for the sake of sale, 1879. 1960–1963.

Belief as to the occurrence of much abuse in respect of sales by public auction, through there there being collusion between the pawnbroker and auctioneer, and through the public not attending, 1880–1890. 1963. 1965–1967——Particular instances in illustration of the effect of pawnbroking in facilitating drunkenness and misery, 1890–1898. 1902——Suggestion that pawnbrokers should not take goods from married women without authority from their husbands, 1899–1901.

Witness further submits that the large resort to pawnshops in Scotland is chiefly for the sake of indulgence in drink and is most demoralising and pauperising, 1902-1911. 1921–1926. 1936-1940. 1993–2003——Operation of "wee pawns" and of brokers as well as of pawnbrokers; restrictions suggested as regards the former, 1912–1920. 1927–1935——Different license in Glasgow for brokers and for pawnbrokers, it being desirable to place the annual renewal in each case under the magistrates, 1927–1935.

Large proportion of the pledges which are for small amounts, 1941–1947 ——Doubt as to the advantage of abolishing pledges of small value, witness preferring rather to abolish pawnbroking altogether in Scotland, 1948–1957——Improvement if the auctioneer at public sales of pledges were appointed by the magistrates, 1963——Forfeiture of any surplus on sale at the end of three years, 1964.

Compliance generally with the Act in Scotland as regards the rate of charge, which is the same as in England, 1969, 1970——Objection to any increase of the present rate, which is amply remunerative, 1971. 1978, 1979——Disapproval of a reduction of the term of forfeiture to six months, 1972–1975——Large proportion of forfeited pledges, those in Edinburgh amounting to twelve per cent., 1975–1977. 1991.

Excellent means of employment in Pollockshaws, whereas the pauperism is immense, 1980, 1981. 1984, 1985——Great prevalence of drunkenness and crime in other districts as well as in East Renfrewshire, 1982, 1983. 1986–1988. 1993–2001 ——Respectable character of the two pawnbrokers in Pollockshaws, 2004, 2005——Statement in favour of a Government stamp of one halfpenny on every pawn ticket, 2006.

Henry, Sir Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Large experience of witness as to the working of the Pawnbrokers' Act, 3558. 3560——Diminished number of complaints relative to overcharge of interest, the rate being now well understood by the lower classes, 3561–3567. 3589, 3590. 3639–3647——Complaints formerly by common informers, for the sake generally of sharing in the penalty; approval of the abolition of this system, 3565, 3566. 3588–3590 ——Belief as to the pawnbrokers making a profit on the forfeited pledges sold, 3568–3570. 3613–3615.

Objection to a reduction of the time for redeeming the pledges; complaints already made by pawnbrokers on this subject, 3571–3575. 3621, 3622. 3633–3638. 3690. 3737. ——Grounds for the conclusion that it would be very mischievous to allow freedom of contract, or to permit free trade as low as 40*s.* pledges, 3576–3581. 3591. 3618–3620. 3691–3693. 3706–3720. 3722–3730——Disapproval of the proposal in the Bill as to not keeping books in cases of special contract, 3577, 3578.

Opinion that the present rate is sufficiently remunerative, and that there is no need either for an increased rate or for free contracts, 3582–3587. 3592. 3612–3615——Very great extent to which stolen goods in London are pawned; numerous cases in the police courts daily, 3593–3596. 3600. 3601. 3655–3657. 3678–3689——Carelessness of pawnbrokers' assistants in taking pledges, so that pledgers of stolen goods are not easily identified, 3596. 3731–3734——Further facilities suggested as regards police inspection, 3597–3599. 3623, 3624. 3626–3628. 3655–3662. 3699, 3700.

Advantages of the Government system of pawn establishments in France and other countries; check thereby upon crime, 3602–3606. 3610, 3611. 3667–3677. 3703–3705 ——Suggestion that the maximum limit of pledges under the Pawnbrokers' Act be raised from 10*l.* to 20*l.*, 3608. 3616, 3617. 3711–3716. 3722, 3723——Opinion that there is no necessity for placing the licenses under the magistrates, 3609. 3648–3654. 3696–3698. 3721. 3738–3740.

Witness considers that it was an unwise move on the part of the pawnbrokers to start the present Bill, and thinks the public would be injured if the Bill were passed, 3624, 3625.

Very numerous applications to the police magistrates for forms of declaration through loss of ticket; very few false affidavits, 3629-3632——Ready facilities afforded generally by the pawnbrokers in cases of theft, 3660, 3661. 3700-3702——Great temptation to drink under the system of pawning, the system having a demoralising tendency as regards the lower classes, 3663–3666——Advantage if pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.* were prohibited, as in France, 3666–3672——Approval of a Government system in this country, as on the continent, 3673–3677.

Concurrence in a suggestion that supervision may usefully be extended to the sale departments of pawnbrokers, 3678–3682——Exception taken to the conclusion that the forfeited pledges average only five per cent., 3694, 3695——Prescribed rate contemplated templated for sums over 10*l.* as well as under, 3722–3730——Non-liability of the pawnbroker after he has parted with pledges on sworn declaration, 3735, 3736.

Opinion that pledges under 10*s.* should be sold by auction, and that the pledgers should have a right to any surplus, 3741——Insufficient knowledge of the public as to their right of inspecting the books and claiming the surplus, 3742, 3743——Difficulty in giving notice of sale to the pawner, 3744——Approval of the present hours of business, 3745–3750.

Argument that there is good reason for applying special restrictions to the practice of pawning, though there are not similar restrictions upon the sale of second-hand goods, 3752–3767——Great evil of the leaving shops in London; supervision exercised over them by the police, 3768–3770.

Hours of Business. Grounds for concluding that it may safely be left to the pawnbrokers to regulate their own hours of business, Hardaker 264–277——Approval of the hours of business being from eight till seven, Dicker 607–609. 614; Rt. Attenborough 3288–3291——Concurrence in approval of the hours of business being from eight till seven, except on Saturday when the hour for closing should be eleven, G. Attenborough, 828, 829; Nathan 912–914; Walter 2509–2511. 2564——Objection to any restriction upon the hours of business, Brooking 1195, 1196. 1216, 1217.

Expediency of further restriction upon the hours of business of pawnbrokers, M'Call 1361–1363. 1419, 1420——The nearer the hours are brought to daylight the better, ib. 1363. 1419—— Doubt as to the necessity of altering the hours of business, Williamson 1642–1647——Advantage if pawnshops were closed at ten on Saturday evening, A. M'Kay 2091–2098.

Approval of the present hours of business, Sir T. Henry 3745–3750—— Objection to any extension of the hours of business, Johnston 4110, 4111——Advantage of earlier closing on Saturday, ib. 4112–4114. 4163–4165——Objection to the pawnshops being closed earlier than eleven on Saturday night, Scoular 4472–4476.

Informers. Statement as to there being much less protection for pawners since the abolition in 1840 of the system of common informers, Shaw 3428–3432. 3536–3541——Complaints formerly by common informers for the sake generally of sharing the penalty; approval of the abolition of this system, Sir T. Henry 3565, 3566. 3588–3590.

Inspection. Expediency of inspectors for preventing abuses under the Pawnbroking Acts, as under the Factory Act, Johnston 4034–4041——Advantage of the appointment of an inspector as a means of checking irregularities of various kinds, ib. 4098, 4099.

Insurance of Pledges. Objections to pawnbrokers insuring pledges in the interests of the pledgers, G. Attenborough 812–822——Security required as regards the insurance of pawned goods against fire; way in which it might be optional in the pawner whether his goods should be insured, Turner 3944–3955. 3980–3983.

very objectionable, Dicker 435——Dissatisfaction expressed with the present rate of interest in the case of small pledges, G. Attenborough 668-673.

Great inequality in there being a fixed charge for all kinds of goods, May 925——Very little attention paid by pledgers to the rates as empowered by Act of Parliament, ib. 955-957——Apparent claim of English pawnbrokers to a revision of the existing rate, Hancock 2261.

Complicated and intelligible character of the present scale of charge, very few of the lower classes properly comprehending what they ought to pay, Richard Attenborough 2693. 2882——Very complicated provisions relative to the rate of profit or interest, Turner 2938.

Result of witness's inquiries, that he considers the present scale of charge too low, Stubbs 3035. 3046. 3107-3114——Suggested consolidation of sections 2 and 3 of the Pawnbrokers' Act as to the rate of charge, ib. 3089-3095.

Opinion that the present rates of interest are rather small, and are too complicated; alterations suggested, Sconlar 4484, 4485. 4498. 4501-4508, 4522-4524. 4531-4533——Great difficulty in calculating the interest by reason of the intermediate and fractional sums; adherence of witness to the prescribed scale as closely as possible, Russell 4771-4784. 4901.

2. Suggestions generally for an amended Scale and System:

Proposal that the initial charge might be larger, and should cover two months as the minimum time, Telfer 853-864——Satisfaction of witness with the rate of a halfpenny for each half-crown, May 1055, 1056——Suggestions for a new system of charge, partly for interest and partly for brokerage, the former to be at the rate of 12½ l. per cent., Brooking 1172-1186——Expediency of the rate of interest being remunerative, as tending to increase the respectability of the trade, M'Call 1410, 1411.

Amended scale by which a pledger should pay 1 d. on 3 s. for the first two months, increasing to 2 d. for the third and fourth months; simplicity to be secured by this scale, which witness believes would be remunerative, Richard Attenborough 2693, 2694. 2769-2775. 2847-2863. 2868-2875. 2920-2926——The cost of the ticket should be included in the penny, ib. 2773. 2920.

There might be a charge of a halfpenny at starting on each transaction, for the expense of the ticket and of clerkship, thus making it 1 d. on 2 s. for the first month, Turner 2940-2942——Proposal for simplifying the Act, and for increasing the charge, the greater simplicity being a compensation to the poor for the increased charge, Stubbs 3036-3041. 3107-3118. 3130-3132——Suggestion that the charge be a halfpenny per month for 2 s. 6 d., there being in addition a ticket charge, ib. 3037-3041.

Sufficiency of interest at the rate of 15 l. per cent. for advances above 2 l., Robert Attenborough 3257-3259——Suggestion that the interest be 25 l. per cent. on pledges up to 2 l., 20 l. per cent. from 2 l. to 5 l., and 15 l. per cent. beyond 5 l., ib. 3307-3309——Sufficiency of interest at the rate of 4 d. in the pound, Shaw 3445——Desire expressed for an increased rate, Russell 4773-4775. 4901-4903——Suggested increase of the rate of interest, the low pledges not being remunerative, Scotson 4950. 5048, 5049.

Suggested table of profits, as prepared and submitted by Mr. Brooking, App. 241.

3. Suggestions for the Adoption in England of the Irish Rate:

Proposition that the rate in Ireland be adopted in England, and that there be a uniform charge of a halfpenny per month for each 2 s. or part of 2 s., without any intermediate calculations for portions of a month, Hardaker 25-28. 32——Expectation that under the amended rates proposed by witness there would be no loss of business by pawnbrokers, ib. 311-319.

Proposal that the Irish rate of interest be adopted concurrently with freedom of contract; particulars hereon as to the operation of the Irish rate when the transactions are small, Dicker 438. 530-553. 567-571——The Irish rate is halfpenny for every 2 s. or part of 2 s., ib. 552, 553.

Approval of the adoption of the Irish rate in England, G. Attenborough 668-673; Telfer 858——Satisfaction to be given by the adoption of the Irish scale of charge, Nathan 894, 895; Walter 2435——Approval of the Irish rate, whereby the minimum charge would be 1½ d. instead of 1 d., A. M'Kay 2079, 2080. 2193, 2194.

Suggestion that the present rates in Ireland and in England be adopted in the first instance as the implied rates, to be altered or assimilated subsequently as experience may prove to be desirable, Hancock 2254. 2259-2262——Amended scale suggested by witness, at the rate of a halfpenny per month for 2 s., Turner 2939-2955.——Increase of 25 l. per cent. by the proposal to charge a halfpenny per month for each 2 s. up to 1 l., ib. 3972-3976.

3. Suggestions for the Adoption in England of the Irish Rate—continued.

Suggested adoption of the Irish rate of a halfpenny for 2 s. up to 2 l., fractions and farthings being at the same time abolished, Robert Attenborough 3262–3265. 3307–3309. 3412–3416——Recommended adoption of the Irish rate, fractions being abolished, Scotson 5013–5015.

4. Exceptions taken to the proposed Increase or Alteration of the existing Rate:

Disapproval of the changes proposed by the Bill now before Parliament, Brooking 1169, 1170. 1194, 1195——Objection to the proposal for raising the rate of interest to 25 l. per cent., ib. 1194——Grounds for the opinion that too much interest is now charged, and that a revision is required, Miller 1495–1519. 1535, 1536——Objection to any increase of the present rate, which is amply remunerative in Scotland, Hector 1971. 1978, 1979——Disapproval of the Irish rate as too complicated for the poorer classes, Richard Attenborough 2916–2918.

Diminished number of complaints in the metropolis relative to overcharge of interest, the rate being now well understood by the lower classes, Sir T. Henry 3561–3567. 3589, 3590. 3639–3647——Opinion that the present rate is sufficiently remunerative, and that there is no need either for an increased rate or for free contracts, ib. 3582–3587. 3592. 3612–3615.

Defence of the pro ratâ system of charge, though involving fractions and farthings; facility with which calculated, G. Attenborough 5136. 5140–5143. 5152——Statement that half the pawnbrokers in London are well contented with the present rate, ib. 5136——Very prejudicial effect upon the pawner if a rate of ½*d.* for 2*s.* or if any "step process" be adopted in lieu of the pro ratâ system, ib. 5136–5141.

Johnston, Robert Bruce. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Explanation of witness's duties, as procurator fiscal in Edinburgh, in regard to prosecutions against pawnbrokers, 4010–4015——Limited extent to which cases of violation of the pawnbroking Acts and questions of stolen goods come before witness, 4012–4018——Grounds for the conclusion that in Edinburgh stolen goods are taken to pawnshops in very considerable quantities, the convictions for theft being no criterion of the extent of the practice, 4016. 4022–4032.

Great advantage of prohibiting all pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.* or 3*s.*, as the proceeds are, in the great majority of cases, spent in drink, 4019–4022. 4031–4033. 4140——Benefits of the pawnbroking system if rightly worked, 4022. 4137–4144——Expediency of inspectors for preventing abuses under the pawnbroking Acts as under the Factory Act, 4034–4041——Suggestion that pawners be compelled to give their correct name and address, and be liable to prosecution and penalties for not doing so, 4042–4045. 4077.

Proposal that pawnbrokers be licensed in the same way as publicans, the license to be renewable every six months, 4046–4048——Advantage in the premises also being licensed, 4048, 4049——Very improper manner in which auction sales are conducted on the pawnbrokers' premises in Edinburgh; expediency of all sales being conducted periodically by one auctioneer on his own premises, 4050–4080——Obstacles to successful prosecutions in Edinburgh under the present Act, even though it be constantly evaded, 4064–4069.

Propriety of a return of the surplus derived from sales, 4077——Suggested abolition of farthings, 4081, 4082——Approval of a retention of the description "housekeeper" or "lodger," 4082, 4083——Expediency of pawnbrokers being required to give on the ticket an accurate description of the property pledged; illustrations hereon, 4083–4086——Advantage in some respects if the selling of pawn tickets by the pawners were prohibited, 4087, 4088.

Feeling of the more respectable pawnbrokers in Edinburgh in favour of the license duty being increased; opinion that it might be raised to 20 l., 4089, 4090. 4173——Expediency of a check upon the splitting up of pledges; instances of the prevalence of this practice, 4090–4097——Advantage of the appointment of an inspector as a means of checking checking irregularities of various kinds, 4098, 4099——Instance of irregularity in the filling up of a pawnbroker's book before the pledges had entered the premises, 4099–4104.

Proposed abolition of fractional parts of a month, as not being understood by the lower classes; suggestion that an average rate be adopted instead, 4105–4108——Opinion as to days of grace being of no value, 4109——Objection to any extension of the hours of business, 4110, 4111——Advantage of earlier closing on Saturday, 4112–4114. 4163–4165——Disapproval of freedom of contract, save above 10*l.*, 4115, 4116——Suggestions with a view to prosecutions in Scotland being conducted under the Summary Procedure Act, 4117–4121. 4125——Useful facilities under the Summary Procedure Act for the recovery of penalties, 4122–4125.

Recommendation that the limit of age for persons pledging in Scotland be fixed at sixteen years, 4125——Statement to the effect that there is no objectionable secrecy in carrying on the pawning of goods in Edinburgh, 4125, 4126——Suggestion that before delivery of any pledge on the tender of the duplicate with the declaration, the pawnbroker should send notice to the owner, 4126. 4127——Approval of limiting to six months the time for forfeiture of pledges, 4128, 4129.

Great extent to which the system of "wee pawns" is carried on at Edinburgh under the Police Act of 1848; conclusion as to the system being a violation of the Act 19 & 20 Vict., 4130–4134. 4159–4162—— Importance of abolishing "wee pawns," the money being almost invariably raised for procuring drink, 4135, 4136——Small number of prosecutions brought by witness against pawnbrokers; amount of penalties enforced, 4145–4149.

Examination in further support of the view that the practice of small pawns is especially objectionable, and should be abolished, the money being usually expended in drink, 4150–4158. 4166–4172——Non-objection to the pawnbroker putting a reserve price on articles at sales, if the auction be conducted away from his premises, and in a proper manner, 4174, 4175——Suggestion that the law be made clear whether a pawnbroker is bound to deliver up goods obtained by false pretences, and pledged with him, 4176–4178.

Keeson, Alfred. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is conversant with the constitution and working of the monts de piété in France, and submits sundry details on the subject, 2273 et seq.——Charitable object of these institutions, which are a monopoly, private persons having no right in France to advance upon pledges, 2276–2280——Power of the pledgers to deal either with the central establishment or with commissionaires or auxiliary establishments; particulars relative to the practice in each case, 2281 et seq. 2409–2430.

Inquiries made of the pledgers, and forms exacted, before money is advanced upon goods, 2291–2298——Unduly large tickets given to the pledgers, 2296–2301——Practice of redemption of pledges; absence of privacy, 2301–2307——Minimum of three francs advanced, there being no maximum limit, and the average being very high, 2308. 2314, 2315. 2329–2331. 2334–2342——Different rates of interest charged in different parts of the country; other charges made, 2309, 2310——Long periods before the redemption of the pledges, twelve months being the time of forfeiture, 2323–2326.

Varying cost per pledge of conducting the monts de piété in different towns; high value of the pledges adverted to hereon, 2332–2334——Great variation in the rates of interest charged in the Belgian monts de piété, 2335——Conditions in France and other foreign countries relative to the delivery of stolen property pledged, 2337–2341——Practice as to the sales of forfeited pledges in France, and as to the disposal of the surplus, 2343–2348——Frequent renewal of the loans upon the pledges, 2349–2352.

Several restrictions in France as to the persons from whom goods may be received at the monts de piété, 2353, 2354——Conditions required in the event of loss of ticket, 2355–2357——Belief as to there being illicit pawnshops in Paris, 2358——Very valuable character of large numbers of the pledges, a considerable proportion of the advances being, however, made to the working classes, on clothing, &c., 2359–2365. 2409–2414. 2422——Twofold system of pawnbroking in operation in Amsterdam; particulars hereon, 2366–2393.

Advantage of reducing the period of forfeiture in this country for clothing and all articles liable to deterioration, 2394–2398——Doubt as to the advantage of requiring all pledgers to write down their names and addresses, 2399——Opinion in favour of a uniform charge of 1 d. for all tickets, 2403–2406——Probable advantage in empowering pledgers to require a sale of their goods after three months, 2423–2426——Absence of freedom of contract in France, 2427——Practice as to the borrowing of money by the monts de piété; low rate at which raised, 2428–2430.

L.

Leaving Shops. Numerous small or low pledges now taken to "leaving shops," where advances are illegally made; advantage if these pledges were taken by pawnbrokers under an amended system of charge, Hardaker 316–319. 409–418——More stringent measures required as regards "dolly shops," Dicker 575–577——Explanation as to the prohibition upon unlicensed persons taking in pledges and advancing money upon them; considerable evasion on the part of "dolly shops," ib. 626–634.

Large numbers of "leaving shops" or "dolly shops" in London, it being very difficult to suppress them, G. Attenborough 756–763——Great reduction of illicit pawnbroking at Salford and Manchester; further improvement if pawnbrokers might take bulky articles at special rates, May 968, 969. 1028, 1029——Strong condemnation of "dolly shops" and their operation, more stringent police control being much required, R. Attenborough 3265–3277. 3396–3401.

Great evil of the leaving shops in London; supervision exercised over them by the police, Sir T. Henry 3768–3770——Increase of "leaving shops" if legalised pawnshops were abolished, Sir W. Bodkin 4706–4708——Expediency of stringent restrictions upon "leaving shops," much fraud being practised by the owners, ib. 4709. 4710——Check exercised over the dolly shops at Leeds by means of license, Scotson 4958.

Leeds. Adherence generally to the statutory rate at Leeds, farthings, however, not being regularly used, Scotson 4950–4955——Respectability of the great majority of the Leeds pawnbrokers, ib. 4956, 4657——Very little stolen property deposited with the pawnshops, ib. 4959–4663——Practice sometimes to lend on bulky articles at a special rate, ib. 4983, 3984. 5021. 5024, 5025.

Large number of pledges, the capital invested being from 150,000 l. to 170,000 l., Scotson 4985–4989——Large number of low pledges deposited with witness, articles of clothing being constantly pawned weekly, ib. 4996–5011——Particulars of witness's business on certain days, showing the number of pledges delivered and the amounts received, ib. 5003–5012——Very little "duffing" business at Leeds, ib. 5057–5061——Rare instances of pledgers being ashamed to be seen entering pawnshops, ib. 5114–5116.

Legal Proceedings. Use generally made of the county court rather than of the magistrates' court, in proceedings against pawnbrokers, G. Attenborough 793–796——Opinion that prosecutions should come before the magistrates, who should grant the licenses, M'Call 1309–1311——Advantage if pledgers had facilities of proceeding against pawnbrokers in the police courts, Hancock 2269——Proposed limitation to three months of the time for prosecuting by information, Walter 2567, 2568.

Advantage in sending certain cases under 10 l. to the county court instead of to a magistrate, Turner 3934–3937——Expediency of the pawnbroker being competent to appear as a witness in suits before magistrates, as in the county courts, ib. 3968–3971——Suggestions with a view to prosecutions in Scotland being conducted under the Summary Procedure Act, Johnston 4117–4121. 4125.

Legislative Restrictions. Argument that there is good reason for applying special restrictions to the practice of pawning, though there are not similar restrictions upon the sale of second-hand goods, Sir T. Henry 3752–3767——Restriction upon lending money on goods under 10 l., save under the provisions of the pawnbroking Acts, Turner 3939–3943.

Leicester. Return from four pawnbrokers at Leicester, showing the number of pledges in 1869, and the number of attendances at police court, App. 248.

Liability of Pawnbrokers. Liability of the pawnbroker for loss of goods or injury, where negligence can be proved, Hardaker 239–242.

LICENSES AND LICENSE DUTY:

1. Question of placing the Licenses under the Magistrates.
2. Question of increasing and assimilating the License Duty.
3. Number of Licenses and Amount of Duty in the United Kingdom.

1. Question of placing the Licenses under the Magistrates:

Concurrence of objections to the licenses being granted and controlled by the magistrates, May 1031, 1032; A. M'Kay 2219–2225; Richard Attenborough 2842, 2843; Robert Attenborough 3402–3411; Scotson 5063–5069.

Suggestions for empowering the magistrates in Glasgow to deal with the licenses to pawnbrokers, and thus to exercise control, as in the case of publicans, M'Call 1304–1319. 1415, 1416——The licenses should first be granted by the Excise, on the certificate of of the magistrates, M'Call 1304, 1305. 1415——The license should be renewed from year to year, ib. 1416.

Approval of pawnbrokers being placed under the magistrates, in the same way as publicans, Miller 1520——Advantage if pawnbrokers had to come to the magistrates once a year for renewal of their licenses, Hector 1878. 1892——Different license in Glasgow for brokers and for pawnbrokers, it being desirable to place the annual renewal in each case under the magistrates, ib. 1927-1935.

Doubt as to the necessity at Liverpool of placing pawnbrokers' licenses under the magistrate, Stubbs 3125, 3126——Opinion that there is no necessity for placing the licenses under the magistrates, Sir T. Henry 3609. 3648-3654. 3696-3698. 3721. 3738-3740.

Proposal that pawnbrokers be licensed the same way as publicans, the license to be renewable every six months, Johnston 4046-4048——Suggestion that where there is gross carelessness on the part of a pawnbroker or his assistants, the license be endorsed accordingly, and after a certain number of similar instances be revoked, Sir W. Bodkin 4651. 4659-4669——Opinion adverse to pawnbrokers' licenses being granted and controlled by the magistrates in the same way as publicans' licenses, ib. 4652, 4653. 4667-4672——Approval of the license being withheld when facilities are refused for the detection of stolen goods, Russell 4898-4900.

2. Question of increasing and assimilating the License Duty:

Non-objection to the license duty being raised as a means of insuring respectable pawnbrokers, Dicker 572-574——Doubt as to any advantage in raising the license on pawnbroking, May 1030——Approval of a higher license duty, Richard Attenborough 2841.

Question as to the expediency of retaining the present difference between the rate of license duty paid in London and in the country, Turner 2938——Feeling of the more respectable pawnbrokers in Edinburgh in favour of the license duty being increased; opinion that it might be raised to 20 l., Johnston 4089, 4090. 4173——Objection to an increase to 50 l., ib. 4089. 4173——Non-objection to the license being raised to 50 l., Russell 4904, 4905. 4915, 4916. 4919-4921.

3. Number of Licenses and Amount of Duty in the United Kingdom:

Return showing the number of licensed pawnbrokers in each city, borough, &c., and the amount of duty received; total of 27,585 l. from licenses in cities and boroughs, and of 6,232 l. 10 s. from licenses in the rest of each county, App. 254-271.

being bound to assist in the detection of crime, 1282-1291——Provisions in the Glasgow Police Act for regulating and restricting the pawnbroking business, and for preventing fraud; beneficial effect of these restrictions, 1291-1303.

Suggestions for empowering the magistrates in Glasgow to deal with the licenses to pawnbrokers, and thus to exercise control as in the case of publicans, 1304-1319. 1415, 1416——Opinion that prosecutions should come before the magistrates who grant the licenses, 1309-1311.——Objections to a right of special contract, more especially as regards articles below 10 s., 1320-1345. 1357-1360——Restriction desirable as regards the pawning of body-clothes, 1322-1329. 1382-1385.——Advantage if there were no pledges under 5 s. or 2 s. 6 d., the money being generally spent in drink, 1329-1331. 1381-1387. 1427, 1428. 1444-1447.

Approval of the period of forfeiture being shortened with reference to certain specified articles, 1346-1348——Advantage if the licenses of three pawnbrokers in Glasgow, out of 109, were cancelled 1349. 1429——Possession of capital by the Glasgow pawnbrokers generally, very few failing in trade, 1350-1352——Varying form of books and of tickets in use in Glasgow, 1353-1356——Belief that pawnbroking is injurious to the working classes, as facilitating the disposal of their property by the improvident, 1357. 1380-1396. 1417, 1418. 1433-1435.

Expediency of further restriction upon the hours of business of pawnbrokers, 1361-1363. 1419, 1420——Further facilities desirable to be given by pawnbrokers for the detection by the police of stolen property when pledged, and for the conviction of the offenders, 1364-1370. 1421-1426——Grounds for the conclusion that there is a very large quantity of stolen goods pawned in Glasgow, the pawnshops tending moreover to encourage theft, 1371-1374. 1401. 1455-1458——Low class of the population of Glasgow which deals with pawnbrokers, this class showing no improvement socially or physically, 1380-1396. 1412-1414.

Advantage in pawnbrokers retaining the duplicates for some time after the redemption, of the pledges, 1397, 1398 ——Expediency of uniform tickets being prescribed by Act 1399——Approval of separate books for pledges above and below 10 s., 1400——More effectual check by the police if there were but one entrance to each pawnshop, and if such entrance were as public as possible, 1403-1407——Expediency of the rate of interest being remunerative, as tending to increase the respectability of the trade. 1410, 1411.

Facilities at present for the inspection by the police of pawnbrokers' books in Glasgow, 1421-1424. 1430-1432——Advantage of restricting the number of pawnbrokers, and of checking undue competition, 1433-1435. 1440-1443——Practice of the Glasgow pawnbrokers in regard to sales, 1436-1439——Total of about 450 licensed "wee pawns" in Glasgow, 1448, 1449——Amendments suggested in the practice with respect to affidavits, 1449-1454.

M'Donald, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is engaged in practising in the minor courts in Edinburgh, 3771, 3772——Immense numbers of the poorer classes in Edinburgh who are in the habit of pawning and redeeming goods weekly, the average amount of the pledges in each family being about 5 s.; 3773-3784. 3875-3884——General practice of pawning clothes on Monday morning and redeeming them on Saturday evening, 3778, 3789. 3899——Effect of the tally system and of the law of arrestment of wages in increasing the practice of pawning, 3782-3789. 3814.

Objectionable course pursued by certain licensed pawnbrokers who formerly kept "wee pawn" shops; practice of splitting the pledges, thus increasing the charge for tickets and interest, 3789-3806. 3890-3893. 3897-3900——Opinion that it would be a great benefit to the improvident or "lapsing" classes, if pawnbrokers were prevented from taking in pledges below 2 s. 6 d.; question hereon, whether these would not sell instead of pawn, 3807-3824. 3888——Suggestion also that no pawnbroker be allowed to advance less than 10 s. upon anything that was not a single article, 3807.

Arrangement in Edinburgh by which a special police force is set apart for inquiring after stolen property at the pawnshops, 3825, 3826——Suggestion for supplying the police with a knowledge of every article pledged, 3827-3830——Power of any pledger to inspect the pawnbroker's books by payment of a penny; this applies only to pledges above 10 s., 3830-3842. 3894-3896——Facilities for the pawning of stolen property by reason of the private doors and counters at which pledgers enter and transact business; suggestion that open counters be required, as in other businesses, 3843-3849.

Evil of the system of having the pawnshop and saleroom together; illegality of the practice of selling goods with the consent of the pledger before the expiration of a year, 3850-3861——Frequent difficulty through the pawn tickets not being legibly written; advantage in the name and article being specified on the ticket, 3862-3871——Illegality of the system of "wee pawns" in Edinburgh; the police have, however, almost entirely suppressed suppressed the system, 3872-3874——Very extensive prevalence of weekly pledging by the improvident and poorer classes further adverted to, the general result being that they gradually become poorer and sink into pauperism, 3875-3887.

M'Kay, Archibald. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a pawnbroker at Glasgow, and is secretary to the Glasgow Pawnbrokers' Association, 2007-2010—— Calculation that 6,960,000 pledges are made annually in Glasgow, the average of each pledge being 4 s., 2011-2013. 2111—— Particulars relative to the capital employed by witness, the interest received on advances and the expenses; small profit left, 2014-2029. 2116-2128—— Average of seven and a-half per cent. of the pledges unredeemed, 2030.

Practice of witness to sell nearly all the unredeemed pledges by auction, there being generally a loss, rather than a surplus, 2031-2038. 2126-2128——Very exceptional instances of witness or other Glasgow pawnbrokers buying back pledges at auctions, or selling pledges by retail, 2036. 2044-2049. 2116, 2117——Grounds for the conclusion that a reduction of the period of forfeiture to six months would be beneficial both to the pledger and the pawnbroker, 2039-2043. 2131-2135. 2187, 2188.

Statement showing the facilities given by the Glasgow pawnbrokers for the detection of theft, 2050-2053. 2136-2148—— Custom of pledgers to give a false name, for the sake of privacy, 2054-2056——Numerous pledges brought by women, this being chiefly owing to their husbands being at work and unable to come, 2057-2060. 2205-2207. 2226, 2227——Very large and irregular business formerly done by the "wee pawns" in Glasgow, the restriction upon this system having led to a large increase of legal pledging, 2061-2076.

Calculation showing that the cost of working the pledges of 2 s. 6 d. and under, results in a loss when they are redeemed in less than two months, 2076-2078. 2125. 2129, 2130. 2186-2192——Approval of the Irish rate whereby the minimum charge would be 1½ d. instead of 1 d., 2079, 2080. 2193, 2194——Very small losses of witness through stolen goods, 2081. 2119-2123——Complaint in regard to the course pursued towards the pawnbrokers when goods are alleged to be stolen, 2081-2086. 2145-2148——Objection to the police having undue facilities of inspecting the books or searching the premises pawnbrokers, 2087-2089. 2136-2139. 2149-2162.

Advantage if pawnshops were closed at 10 on Saturday evening, 2091-2093——Conclusion as to very little stolen property in Glasgow being taken to pawnbrokers, but rather to the receiving shops, 2093-2095. 2149-2156——Explanation as to the apparently large number of pawnbrokers, or of assistants, who are witnesses in prosecutions, 2096-2098.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that the advances made by witness on pledges are a great boon and benefit to the working classes, and are rarely expended in drink; particular instances cited, 2099-2115. 2162-2178. 2195-2198——Tendency of the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act to check the pledging of stolen property, 2136-2144——Hardship upon the poor if pledges under 2 s. 6 d. were prohibited, 2185—— Respectability of the Glasgow pawnbrokers as a body, 2199-2202.

Extremely rare instances of application to witness for surpluses on pledges sold, 2203, 2204——Approval of freedom of contract for bulky and perishable articles exclusively, 2208-2218——Objection to pawnbrokers' licenses being granted by the magistrates, 2219-2225——Expediency of special contracts being made only with persons of twenty-one years of age and upwards, 2228.

M'Kay, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is provost of Pollockshaws, and is a pawnbroker there, 4246-4252——Average of from 42,000 to 48,000 pledges taken at witness's shop, there being another pawnbroker, and the population being about 25,000; 4253-4269——Very small sums sometimes advanced by witness, 4270-4273——Large proportion of the pledges deposited on Monday and redeemed on Saturday, these consisting largely of articles of clothing, 4274-4285——Practice of witness not to divide suits of clothing into separate pledges, 4286-4289.

Very few stolen articles deposited with witness or the other pawnbroker at Pollockshaws; facilities given to the police in such cases, 4290-4299—— Recourse had to pawning chiefly by the working classes, most of the money being required for food, rent, &c.; denial that it goes mainly in drink, 4300-4315. 4333-4337——Increase of poor rates in Pollockshaws; causes of this irrespectively of pawnshops, 4304. 4316-4343.

Suggestion whether Government might not take charge of pawnbroking, 4344-4346——Inability of witness to give details as to the expenses of his business and the actual profits, 4347-4365——Practice of witness as to the sale by auction in Glasgow of unredeemed pledges above 10 s., 4365-4385——Opinion that the Pawnbrokers Act might be simplified in several respects, 4386, 4387.

Married Women. Suggestion that pawnbrokers should not take goods from married women without authority from their husbands, Hector 1899–1901——Numerous pledges at Glasgow brought by women, this being chiefly owing to their husbands being at work and unable to come, A. M'Kay 2057–2060. 2205–2207. 2226, 2227.

May, John Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Pawnbroker at Salford; is one of the committee of the Manchester and Salford Pawnbrokers Association, 915–918—— Unsatisfactory working of the Pawnbrokers' Act as involving fractions of money and of months of a very complicated and unintelligible character; instances of this, 919–924. 988, 989——Great inequality in there being a fixed charge for all kinds of goods, 925 ——Conclusions as to the importance of a right of special contract in the interests both of the pledger and the pawnbroker, 925–932.

Evidence showing that much disadvantage arises from the present period of forfeiture, and that a six months' forfeiture would be exceedingly beneficial both to the pawnbroker and to the pledger, 933. 1134–1136——Total of 76,603 pledges received by witness within a year, about twenty-four per cent. of which were under 2 s., 934, 935——Probable accuracy of a calculation that the expenses average 2½ d. for each pledge, 936. 989. 1063, 1064. 1121, 1122——Obstacle in numerous cases to ascertaining the correct names and addresses of pledgers; difficulty as to requiring them to state whether they are housekeepers or lodgers, 937–939. 1017–1021.

Absence of inquiry by pledgers as to the indorsement of the charge on the ticket, 940–942——Responsibility incurred by pawnbrokers in detaining pledgers or pledges when theft is suspected, 943, 944——Average of about four per cent. of witness's pledges unredeemed, 945. 1039–1042——Sale by witness of unredeemed pledges, without much profit on the whole, if any, 946, 947. 1057——Unsatisfactory result of sales by auction at Salford; practice of witness in order to obviate such sales, 948–951. 1102–1107. 1131–1134——Frequent imposition practised by "duffers" in pledging made-up watches and other articles, 952, 953.

Absence of application to witness in respect of goods sold when over 10 s.; he keeps no books of such sales, 954. 1107. 1131–1134——Very little attention paid by pledgers to the rates as empowered by Act of Parliament, 955–957——Considerable difficulty in dealing with lost duplicates; practice of witness to give up the pledges without requiring a formal declaration, 958, 959. 1043, 1044——Regular practice of many workmen at Salford to pledge their clothes or other articles weekly, this being the class of business which witness largely gets, and which he prefers; benefit to the pledgers in being thus enabled to obtain loans of capital, 960–964. 1000–1016. 1073–1075. 1100, 1101. 1123–1125——More equitable distribution required as regards the charge for tickets, 965–967.

Great reduction of illicit pawnbroking at Salford and Manchester; further improvement if pawnbrokers might take bulky articles at special rates, 968, 969. 1028, 1029—— Examination to the effect that pawnbroking in Manchester and Salford is not found to be a lucrative business, and that it is only by great application witness derives a fair return on his capital, 970–996. 1111–1120. 1127–1130——Doubt as to the number of witness's pledges at varying amounts; the average amount is 4*s.* 3*d.*, 1005–1013.

Belief that, as a rule, the money raised by pledges at Salford does not go in drink, 1022–1027——Necessity of pawnshops as a means of enabling the poorer classes to obtain food in time of pressure, 1027, 1028——Doubt as to any advantage in raising the license on pawnbroking, 1030——Objection to the licenses being granted by the magistrates, 1031, 1032——Conclusion that, under freedom of contract, pledgers would be perfectly able to take care of themselves, 1033–1037.

Much inconvenience at times from false names being given, 1038——Further evidence in favour of freedom of contract, 1045–1047. 1058. 1066, 1067. 1079–1086——Circumstance of the Pawnbrokers Act being constantly evaded by witness as regards auction sales, and in other respects; evasion of the Act more or less by the pawnbrokers of Manchester and Salford, 1048–1054. 1077. 1102–1108. 1145–1151——Satisfaction of witness with the rate of a halfpenny for each half-crown, 1055, 1056.

Conclusion as to the ticket money being for appraisement, and having no reference to the cost of warehousing, 1068–1072——Advantage if the charge per month were stated on the ticket when issued, 1076——Circumstance of witness never endorsing the tickets, 1077——Practice of witness in discontinuing receipt or payment of farthings, and in charging halfpence instead, 1077, 1078. 1155, 1156——Explanation of the practice as to the splitting of some pledges, and of charging for separate tickets, 1089–1099.

Ignorance of witness's customers as to the Act of Parliament, 1109, 1110——Loss incurred by witness on pledges under 2 s., 1126——Doubt as to any great facility to the police by requiring pledgers to write their names in a book, 1137–1139——Statement of the ticket charge on each pledge and on each renewal, 1142,1143——Objection to the Irish system as regards sale of pledges through official auctioneers, 1144—— Approval

Approval of a retention of the three months' notice if the period of forfeiture be reduced to six months, 1152–1154.

Miller, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Considerable experience of witness as a magistrate of Glasgow, and of the counties of Renfrew and Lanark, 1459–1462——Conclusion that the pawnbroking system tends to the demoralisation of the lower classes by affording facilities for obtaining drink, 1464–1471. 1562–1566——Explanation that witness does not propose the abolition of pawnshops, but he considers that further restrictions upon their operation are most desirable, 1472 et seq.

Suggestions for restricting the lower classes from pawning their clothing and such things as are necessaries of life, the money constantly going in drink, 1475–1494. 1534. 1537–1546. 1556–1562. 1568——Grounds for the opinion that too much interest is now charged, and that a revision is required, 1495–1519. 1535, 1536——Advantage if pawnbrokers were placed under the magistrates in the same way as publicans, 1520——Proposal that the surplus on sales of unredeemed pledges should, if not returned to the pledgers, be handed over to local charities, 1521–1534.

Misery of large numbers of the poorer classes in Glasgow and elsewhere through want of furniture and bed-clothing under pledge in pawnshops, 1537–1546——Frequency of stolen goods being pledged, 1547, 1548——Effect of pawnshops in fostering theft, 1549——Estimate of from 150,000 l. to 200,000 l. as spent yearly in interest in Glasgow, 1564–1566——Improvement if there were no advance under 2*s.* 6*d.*, 1567, 1568.

Names and Addresses, &c. (Pledgers.) Difficulty of getting from pledgers their correct name and address; unnecessary particulars required, Hardaker 76–84. 105–116. 120. 124, 125. 132–134; Turner 3962–3964——Obstacle in numerous cases to ascertaining the correct names and addresses of pledgers; difficulty of ascertaining whether they are housekeepers or lodgers, May 937–939. 1017–1021; Stubbs 3060–3065——Much inconvenience at times from false names being given, May 1038.

Doubt as to the advantage of requiring all pledgers to write down their names and addresses, May 1137–1139; Keeson 2399——Non-compliance with the Act, in the metropolis, in not ascertaining whether the pledgers are housekeepers or lodgers, Williamson, 1572–1574——Custom of pledgers to give a false name, for the sake of privacy, A. M'Kay 2054–2056.

Statement as to witness never asking whether a pledger is a housekeeper or lodger, or what is his Christian name and address; futility of the provisions of the Act on this score, Walter 2445–2553. 2597–2603. 2638–2651.

Great reluctance of respectable pledgers to give their real names and addresses, Rd. Attenborough 2720–2727——Difficulty in ascertaining whether the pledger is a housekeeper or a lodger, ib. 2727.

Suggestion that pawners be compelled to give their correct name and address, and be liable to prosecution and penalties for not doing so, Johnston 4042–4045. 4077——Approval of a retention of the description "housekeeper" or "lodger," ib. 4082, 4083.

Practice of pledgers at Glasgow generally to give their right name and address, Scoular 4477–4481——Practice of witness as to entering the names and addresses of pledgers; advantage of this regulation, Russell 4854–4859——Safeguard by entering the names and addresses of the pledgers, Scotson 4990–4993.

Objection to pawners being required to record their names and addresses; large number unable to write, Scotson 5117–5131.

Nathan, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Information relative to the profits of witness, who is a pawnbroker at Limehouse; these are very small in reference to the capital, and as compared with other trades, 878–893——Satisfaction to be given by the adoption of the Irish scale of charge, 894. 895——Great improvement by diminishing the period of forfeiture to six months, 896——Expediency of a power to make special contracts under certain conditions, there being also a statutory rate, 896–911——Approval of the hours of business being from eight till seven, except on Saturday, when the hour for closing should be eleven, 912–914.

New York. Copy of the New York Pawnbrokers Act, App. 245.

Nottingham. Information relative to the number of robberies at Nottingham, and the extent to which stolen goods are pledged; very little stolen property in the last twelve months, Raynor 4181 et seq.——Expenditure of a large portion of the advances in drink, 4235–4245.

Pollockshaws (Renfrew). Statistics as to the great increase of crime in the East Renfrewshire district since 1840, and as to the great increase of poor rates in Eastwood parish since 1835, Hector 1827–1840——Marked change for the worse in the habits of the people of Pollockshaws after the introduction of two "wee pawns" in 1835, the system of pawnbroking having been beyond a doubt one of the principal causes of the change, ib. 1841–1845——Great extent to which pledging is carried at the two pawnshops in Pollockshaws, blankets and body-clothing being among the chief articles pawned, ib. 1849–1856.

Grounds for concluding that a very large proportion of the money raised by pawning at Pollockshaws goes in drink, and that pauperism and crime are greatly fostered thereby, Hector 1856–1858. 1993–2003——Excellent means of employment in Pollockshaws, whereas the pauperism is immense, ib. 1980, 1981. 1984, 1985——Respectable character of the two pawnbrokers in Pollockshaws, ib. 2004, 2005.

Average of from 42,000 to 48,000 pledges taken at witness's shop, there being another pawnbroker and the population being about 25,000, G. M'Kay 4253–4269——Very small sums sometimes advanced by witness, ib. 4270–4273——Large proportion of the pledges deposited on Monday and redeemed on Saturday, these consisting largely of articles of clothing, ib. 4274–4285.

Very few stolen articles deposited with witness or the other pawnbrokers at Pollockshaws; facilities given to the police in such cases, G. M'Kay 4290–4299——Recourse had to pawning chiefly by the working classes, most of the money being required for food, rent, &c.; denial that it goes mainly in drink, ib. 4300–4315. 4333–4337 ——Increase of poor rates in Pollockshaws; causes of this irrespectively of pawnshops, ib. 4304. 4316–4343.

State of employment in the parish of Eastwood adverted to with reference to the increase of the poor rates, G. M'Kay 4316–4343——Practice of witness as to the sale by auction in Glasgow of unredeemed pledges above 10 s., ib. 4365–4385.

Premises of Pawnbrokers. Advantage in the premises being licensed, Johnston 4048, 4049.

PROFITS OF PAWNBROKERS:

1. Question as to the profitable or unprofitable Character of the Trade generally.
2. Particular Instances in Proof of the small Profits made.

1. Question as to the profitable or unprofitable Character of the Trade generally:

Expediency of a revision of the rate of charge for the ticket or duplicate, as well as a revision generally of the law, it being found that the trade is not at present remunerative, Hardaker 92–97. 119. 121–123. 299–310——Examination upon the question of witness procuring statistics from the trade as to the number of pledges of different amounts, as to the interest received, and as to the actual profits made, ib. 333–372.

Difficulty of accounting for the large number of pawnbrokers, considering the business is so unprofitable, Dicker 578–588 —— Unprofitable character of the pawnbroking business; large proportion of pawnbrokers who become insolvent or bankrupt, G. Attenborough 804–808——Objection to the Pawnbrokers' Act as not admitting of sufficient profit; preference, however, expressed for the Act as compared with the Bill before the Committee, Walter 2434, 2435. 2604——Diminution in the scale of profit when the pledges are under 1 l., Rd. Attenborough 2688, 2689.

Prosperity of the London pawnbrokers as a class, their profits, however, being largely made from other business as well as pawnbroking, Storr 3226–3236——Less profits from the actual pawning than are made in an ordinary retail business, ib. 3237–3240.

Conclusion as to the excellent profits made by pawnbrokers, Shaw 3510. 3514. 3546. 3551, 3552——Calculation that pledges under 10 s. are remunerative, and that an average of 6 s. pays at the present rate of charge, G. Attenborough 5150–5157.

Examination to the effect that pawnbroking in Manchester and Salford is not found to be a lucrative business, and that it is only by great application witness derives a fair return on his capital, May 970–996. 1111–1120. 1127–1130——Possession of capital by the Glasgow pawnbrokers generally, very few failing in trade, M'Call 1350–1352 ——Several instances of insolvency of pawnbrokers at Glasgow, Scoular 4556 —— Good profits made by some of the pawnbrokers in Leeds, Scotson 5072–5075.

2. Particular Instances in Proof of the small Profits made:

Explanation on the subject of the unremunerative character of witness's pawnbroking business, the profits arising chiefly on the sale stock, Hardaker 299–310. 320, 321. 360–372—— Sundry accounts submitted to the Committee, and explanations in detail thereon, showing the very small profit made by witness at his different shops, Dicker 444–483—— Result of witness's accounts that the nett earnings from pledges are only about 5½ per cent., whilst the earnings upon the sales yield about 27 per cent., ib. 475. 483——Particulars ticulars with further reference to the question of profit, showing in detail the gross earnings and expenses, Dicker 494–506.

Witness submits statistics relative to his business, showing that his nett profits from pawnbroking are exceedingly small, and that on the smaller transactions pledged for short periods there is an actual loss, Telfer 832–848. 865–870——Information relative to the profits of witness, who is a pawnbroker at Limehouse; these are very small in reference to the capital, and as compared with other trades, Nathan 878–893——Total of about 36,000 pledges received by witness in the year, his expenses being from 250 l. to 300 l. a year, and his gross profit being about 3 d. on each pledge, Brooking 1210–1215. 1221.

Particulars relative to witness's business at Bradford; very moderate profits made, Blackwood 1661–1682——Information relative to the capital employed by witness at Glasgow, the interest received on advances, and the expenses; small profit left, A. M'Kay 2014–2019. 2116–2128——Particulars relative to the financial results of witness's pawnbroking at Glasgow, one shop having been much more profitable than the other, Scoular 4557–4577——Statistics of witness's business, showing the capital, number of pledges, expenses, and profits, Walter 2514–2521. 2569. 2573–2580.

Account of profits on business at 139 East-street, Walworth-road, for the year 1869; nett profit of 167 l. 3 s. 6 d. after deducting interest on capital, App. 238——Balance sheet submitted by Mr. Telfer containing particulars of receipt and expenditure, and showing the profits made, ib. 240——Paper handed in by Mr. M'Kay of Glasgow, showing the profit made by him in 1869, ib. 241——Papers handed in by Mr. Dicker in illustration of the very moderate profits made by him at different shops, ib. 250–353.

Prosecutions. See Legal Proceedings.

Public, The (Poorer Classes). Advantage to the poorer classes in being able to raise money through pawnbrokers instead of going to unlicensed shops or to loan societies; views of the late Mr. Dickens on this point, Dicker 623–625——Necessity of pawnshops as a means of enabling the poorer classes to obtain food in time of pressure, May 1027, 1028.

Misery of large numbers of the poorer classes in Glasgow and elsewhere through want of furniture and bed-clothing, under pledge in pawnshops, Miller 1537–1546——Use made of pawnshops by the provident as well as the improvident, Williamson 1648–1650.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that the advances made by witness on pledges are a great boon and benefit to the working classes, and are rarely expended in drink; particular instances cited, A. M'Kay 2099–2115. 2162–2178. 2195–2198——Conclusion as to the great importance of pawnbroking to the lower classes; deadlock if it were prohibited, Walter 2651. 2660–2662——Beneficial effect of pawnshops, the money being frequently raised for provident purposes, though there is a large amount of shame felt in resorting to the practice, Rt. Attenborough, 3323–3326. 3341–3348.

Witness considers that it was an unwise move on the part of the pawnbrokers to start the present Bill, and thinks the public would be injured if the Bill were passed, Sir T. Henry 3624, 3625——Benefits of the pawnbroking system if rightly worked Johnston 4022. 4137–4144——Important convenience of pawnshops, if properly conducted, to the working classes, Sir W. Bodkin 4654. 4685.

Raynor William Bowles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Long experience of witness as a police officer in Nottingham, where he is Head Superintendent, 4179, 4180——Information relative to the number of robberies at Nottingham, and the extent to which stolen goods are pledged; very little stolen property in the last twelve months, 4181 et seq——Facilities given by the pawnbrokers when the police are inquiring as to stolen property; opinion that there is no necessity for increasing the power of the police to interfere, 4200–4230. 4234——Expenditure in drink of a large portion of the money raised by pledges, the tickets being frequently lost, 4235–4245.

Re-appointment of Committee. Recommendation by the Committee that they be re-appointed at the commencement of next Session to continue their inquiry, Rep. iii.

Redemption of Pledges. Very large per-centage of pledges redeemed, Hardaker 191, 192. 221; G. Attenborough 696–699; May 945. 1039–1042; Rd. Attenborough 2728–2731; Scolson 5027 —— Redemption of eighty per cent. of the pledges within three months, Hardaker 222.

Paper submitted by Mr. Dicker containing an analysis of pledges redeemed within one month, and of pledges redeemed at more remote dates, App. 253.

Russell, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of the Equitable Loan Company of Scotland, carrying on business at Edinburgh. 4712–4714——Employment by the company of a capital of 27,000 l., 4715–4718——Total of about 72,000 pledges received in the year; small proportion of these under 2 s., 4719–4723——Discouragement of the practice of splitting the pledges, 4724–4728——Average of 11 s. 3 d. received on each pledge, 4729–4731 —— Statement as to the periods for which the pledges remain, about ten per cent being unredeemed, 4732–4738.

Practice of witness's company in holding periodical sales, duly advertised, at which all forfeited pledges are sold without reserve, 4739–4753 —— Evidence relative to the operations of the company, showing in detail the receipts, expenses, and profits, 4754 et seq.——Great difficulty in calculating the interest by reason of the intermediate and fractional sums; adherence to the prescribed scale as closely as possible, 4771–4784. 4901——Desire expressed for an increased rate, 4773–4775. 4901–4903

Receipt of pledges by witness from persons in all ranks of society; very large advances sometimes made, 4833–4837——Charge of 15 per cent. for advances under special contract, bulky articles being received without extra charge, 4838–4847——Expediency of some articles being liable to forfeiture after six months, 4848–4852——Advantage of the charge for interest being clearly printed on the back of the ticket, 4853.

Practice of witness as to entering the names and addresses of pledgers; advantage of this regulation, 4854–4859——Exceedingly small quantity of stolen property pledged with the Edinburgh pawnbrokers 4860–4863——Disposal of a large quantity of stolen property through the "wee pawns" 4864–4867——Effectual inspection by the police, every facility being given by the pawnbrokers, 4868–4877 —— Frequent instances of loss of ticket and of delivery of the goods upon declaration; protection of the pawnbroker in such case against further liability, 4882–4890.

Large quantities of body-clothing and of blankets pawned in Edinburgh, 4891–4897 —— Approval of the license being withheld when facilities are refused for the detection of stolen goods, 4898–4900 —— Benefits anticipated from the abolition of pledges under 2 s., the money frequently going in drink, 4903–4910. 4922–4926. 4930–4932—— Non-objection to the license being raised to 50 l., 4904, 4905. 4915, 4916. 4919–4921—— Inaccuracy of the view that increase of pawnbroking leads to increase of poor-rates, 4907, 4908 —— Large quantity of cheap watches and jewellery pledged with witness, these, if forfeited, being grouped for sale, 4911–4914.

Approval of special contract for advances of two guineas and upwards, 4917, 4918. 4934, 4935——Statement as to pledges of 2 s. 6 d. and under costing as much as 5 d. each and not being remunerative unless they remain for four or five months, 4927–4929. 4940–4943——Doubt as to competition being increased by the proposed Bill, 4933, 4934——Increased business of "wee pawns" in Edinburgh if small pledges were prohibited, as proposed by witness; belief that the police would check abuse in this respect, 4936–4939.

SALES (UNREDEEMED PLEDGES):

1. Practice in regard to Auction Sales of Unredeemed Pledges above 10 s.
2. Unprofitable Results of Sales of Forfeited Pledges.
3. Charge for inspecting Books in Reference to Sales.
4. Question of Notice of Sale being given to the Pawner.
5. Suggestions for giving to Pawners increased Facilities of Sale.
6. Proposal that Pledges under 10*s. be sold by Public Auction.*
7. Suggested Separation of the Sale Department from the Pawnbroking Department.

1. Practice in regard to Auction Sales of Unredeemed Pledges above 10 s.:

Course pursued in London as to the advertisement of sales; obstacle to a strict compliance with the Act in this respect, Hardaker 206–209. 213–216——Publicity of the auction sales of goods above 10 s., the pawnbrokers sometimes buying the goods for private sale, G. Attenborough 778–782——Objection to the Irish system as regards sale of pledges through official auctioneers, May 1144; Hancock 2266, 2267.

Way in which witness deals with unredeemed pledges; system of quarterly sale by public auction, all the Bradford pawnbrokers joining in such sales, Blackwood 1682–

1692——Further reference to the auction sales at Bradford; absence of abuse as regards purchases by the pawnbrokers, ib. 1772–1781. 1783–1788.

Belief as to the occurrence of much abuse in respect of sales by public auction in Scotland, through there being collusion between the pawnbrokers and auctioneer, and through the public not attending, Hector 1880–1890. 1913. 1965–1967——Improvement if the auctioneers at public sales of pledges were appointed by the magistrates, ib. 1963——Very exceptional instances of witness, or other Glasgow pawnbrokers buying back pledges at auctions, or selling pledges by retail, A. M'Kay 2036, 2044–2049. 2116, 2117.

Satisfactory character of the present arrangements as to sales by auction in London, Walter 2502–2505——Denial that witness evades the requirements of the Act in his book of auction sales; practice of witness sometimes to buy at these sales, ib. 2541–2556——Purchase by witness at auction sales when the goods are not bid for by the public at a reserved price, ib. 2622, 2623. 2625.

Explanation as to witness sometimes buying in at his own sales; advantage thereby to the pledger, Rd. Attenborough 2740–2742. 2803–2806. 2887–2889——Attendance of the public at auction sales as well as pawnbrokers and dealers, ib. 2890–2897——Charge of 5 per cent. by the auctioneer, ib. 2908–2910——Objection to officially appointed auctioneers, ib. 2913.

Attendance of pawnbrokers, general dealers, and of the public at the sales conducted by witness's firms, there being always an active bidding, and the pawnbrokers buying only a small proportion of the articles, Storr 3182–3197. 3204–3217——Charge of 5 per cent. by witness's firm on the produce of the sales, the lots being all prepared by the pawnbrokers, ib. 3199–3201——Separate sale of each pledge above 10 s., the low pledges above that amount being sometimes combined into one lot, ib. 3202, 3203. 3218–3223——Inaccuracy of the assumption that dealers combine to prevent the public from bidding, and run up the prices against them, ib 3210, 3211. 3216, 3217.

Very large auction sale of witness's pledges; great respectability of the auctioneers, Rt. Attenborough 3296——Question considered as to the illegality of auctioneers, who have periodical sales, making advances on goods received in the interim, Turner 3962–3967——Non-objection to the pawnbroker putting a reserve price on articles at sales, if the auction be conducted away from his premises, and in a proper manner, Johnston 4174, 4175——Course pursued at Leeds in the sale of unredeemed pledges above and below 10 s. respectively; attendance of the public and of pawnbrokers and dealers, Scotson 4964–4982.

2. Unprofitable Results of Sales of Forfeited Pledges:

Necessity of selling by public auction all pledges above 10 s.; loss incurred by witness in respect of these pledges, Hardaker 135–141——Much larger per-centage of profit on witness's sale business than on his pawnbroking business, Dicker 475. 483; Telfer 888–891——Small part of witness's profit on sales which arises from unredeemed pledges, Dicker 484——Statement as to the sale of forfeited pledges being a losing part of the pawnbroking business; necessity, however, of a sale business attached to the pawnbroking department, ib. 560–565. 656.

Severe loss sustained by witness on his sales of pledges, whilst there are but few overpluses unclaimed, G. Attenborough 750–755. 764——Separate establishment kept by witness for the sale of pledges under 10 s., there being on the whole a loss upon such sales, ib. 771–777——Sale by witness of unredeemed pledges without much profit on the whole, if any, May 946, 947. 1057——Unsatisfactory result of sales by auction generally at Salford; practice of witness in order to obviate such sales, ib. 948–951. 1102–1107. 1131–1134——Explanation of the practice at Exeter in regard to auction sales of pledges above 10 s.; loss incurred by witness on these sales, Brooking 1187–1192. 1205–1209. 1218–1220. 1224–1227–1232–1236——Practice of witness at Glasgow to sell nearly all the unredeemed pledges by auction, there being generally a loss, rather than a surplus, A. M'Kay 2031–2038. 2126–2128.

Fallacy of the notion that the pawnbroker derives a large profit from the sale of unredeemed pledges, Walter 2619——Realisation of about the amounts advanced on the pledges, Storr 3198——Statement as to witness not making any profit on his sales, Rt. Attenborough 3389——Belief as to the pawnbrokers making a profit on the forfeited pledges sold, Sir T. Henry 3568–3570. 3613–3615——Very small profit at Leeds on the sale of pledges, Scotson 5028–5039.

3. Charge for inspecting Books in Reference to Sales:

Suggestion that the charge for inspecting the auction book be 6 d., instead of 1 d., Walter 2562. 2635–2637——Power of any pledger at Edinburgh to inspect pawnbrokers' books by payment of a penny; this applies only to pledges above 10 s., McDonald 3839–3842. 3894–3896.

4. Question of Notice of Sale being given to the Pawner:

Approval of the duplicates stating that the day and place of sale of the pledge, if unredeemed, may be ascertained on inquiry, Blackwood 1746–1750——Grounds for recommending that the pawnbroker should give notice to the pledger of intended sales, Hancock 2268, 2269; Rt. Attenborough 3394, 3395——Approval of compulsory notice to the pledgers where pledges above 5 l. are to be sold, Rd. Attenborough 2903–2907——Difficulty in giving notice of sale to the pawner, Sir T. Henry 3744——Non-objection to notice of sale being required to be given to the pledger, Scotson 5043, 5044.

5. Suggestions for giving to Pawners increased Facilities of Sale:

Probable advantage in empowering pledgers to call for a sale of their goods, Keeson 2423-2426——Suggestion for empowering pledgers to call for a sale when they cannot redeem the goods, Rt. Attenborough 3295, 3296——Approval of the pawner being empowered to bargain with another person for the sale to him of the goods in pawn, Turner 3918–3924——Approval of the pledger being allowed to call for a sale after three months, Scotson 5045–5047.

6. Proposal that Pledges under 10 s. be sold by Public Auction:

Opinion that pledges under 10 s. should be sold by auction, and that the pledgers should have a right to any surplus, Sir T. Henry 3741.

7. Suggested Separation of the Sale Department from the Pawnbroking Department:

Statement in favour of entire separation of the sale department from the pawnbroking department; inducement at present to encourage forfeiture of pledges for the sake of sale, Hector 1879. 1960–1963——Evil of the system of having the pawnshop and sale-room together; illegality of the practice of selling goods with the consent of the pledger before the expiration of a year, McDonald 3850–3861.

Scotland. Opinion that if pawnshops in Scotland were abolished altogether, it would be no loss in a national sense, M'Call 1417, 1418——Explanation that witness does not propose the abolition of pawnshops in Scotland, but he considers that further restrictions upon their operation are most desirable, Miller 1472 et seq.

Conclusions as to the effect of the pawnbroking system in Scotland, in largely producing drunkenness, pauperism, and crime, Hector 1856 et seq.——Comparative novelty of the system of pawning in Scotland, there having been only one pawnbroker in 1806; rapid increase in recent years, ib. 1859–1861——Grounds for concluding that pawnbrokers in Scotland are a thriving class, ib. 1877. 1960–1963. 1978, 1979.

Witness further submits that the large resort to pawnshops in Scotland is chiefly for the sake of indulgence in drink, and is most demoralising and pauperising, Hector 1902–1911. 1921–1926. 1936–1940. 1993–2003——Compliance generally with the Act in Scotland as regards the rate of charge, which is the same as in England, ib. 1969, 1970.

Statement as to its not having been known previously to 1806 that the pawnbroking Act applied to Scotland, Scoular 4392–4394.

feiture to six months, 5016–5018. 5105, 5106. 5111——Suggestion for freedom of contract for bulky articles, and for articles above 2 l., provided the pledger be not under twenty or twenty-one years of age, 5019–5023. 5104, 5112, 5113——Average of seven per cent. of witness's pledges unredeemed, 5027——Very small profit on the sale of pledges, 5028–5039——Few applications to witness for the surplus from sales, 5040–5042.

Non-objection to notice of sale being required to be given to the pledger, 5043, 5044 Approval also of the pledger being allowed to call for a sale after three months, 5045–5047——Estimate of 1¼ d. as witness's cost of taking in each pledge, 5048——Defence of the system of low advances, such as 1 s.; belief that the loan is a great convenience to the working classes, and is not often spent in drink, 5050–5052. 5076–5095. 5107–5110——Discouragement by witness of the practice of splitting pledges, 5053–5056——Very little "duffing" business at Leeds, 5057–5061.

Beneficial effect of many of the penal clauses of the Act, 5062——Objection to policemen having the power of inspecting the books, 5062. 5070, 5071——Disapproval of the licenses being controlled by the magistrates, 5063–5069——Good profits made by some of the pawnbrokers in Leeds, 5072–5075——Exceptions taken to a system of Government advances, as in in France, and to the exclusion of pledges under 2 s. 6 d.; 5090–5101——Rare instances at Leeds of pledgers being ashamed to be seen entering pawnshops, 5114–5116——Objection to pawners being required to record their names and addresses; large number unable to write, 5117–5131.

Scoular, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Considerable experience of witness as a pawnbroker in Glasgow, 4388–4391——Statement as to its not having been known previously to 1806 that the Pawnbroking Act applied to Scotland, 4392–4394——Large increase in the number of licensed pawnbrokers in Glasgow after prosecutions were conducted against the "wee pawns" under the Act of 1856; 4395–4400——Considerable number of "wee pawns" still in Glasgow, the charges being much higher than in the licensed shops, and the mode of transacting business being very objectionable, 4401–4411.

Calculation that there are about 5,000,000 pledges in Glasgow yearly, 4413——Average of about 3 s. 6 d. as the value of the pledges below 10 s., 4414——Principal classes of articles pledged with witness, clothing being largely pawned, 4415–4421——Practice of witness as to selling all unredeemed pledges by public auction; serious loss incurred by these pledges, 4422–4441. 4510–4515. 4518–4521. 4526–4530——Custom of "duffers" to buy clothing at sales, and to re-pledge it at a profit, 4437. 4551–4553.

Exceedingly small quantity of stolen property deposited in pawnshops in Glasgow, 4442–4448——Ample facilities of the Glasgow police for inspection, so as to detect stolen goods pledged, 4449–4456——Uselessness of the power of pledgers to apply for the surplus on sales; suggested forfeiture in all unredeemed cases, 4457, 4458. 4499, 4500. 4525, 4526——Discontinuance by witness of the practice of splitting pledges, 4459–4461——Very large number of pledges of clothing on Monday, which are redeemed on Saturday, 4462–4468——Grounds for concluding that the money raised on pledges is not spent on drink, 4469–4471.

Objection to the pawnshops being closed earlier than eleven on Saturday night; 4472–4476——Practice of pledgers generally to give their right name and address, 4477–4481——Statement as to the Glasgow police not taking proper trouble to find out the pledgers of stolen goods, 4482, 4483. 4516, 4517——Opinion that the present rates of interest are rather small, and are too complicated; alterations suggested, 4484, 4485. 4498. 4501–4508. 4522–4524. 4531–4533.

Information relative to the form of pawn ticket used by witness, and the particulars furnished upon it, 4486–4497——Approval of the interest being marked upon the ticket, if fractional parts be abolished, 4498——Objection to discontinuing the charge for the ticket, 4502. 4531–4533——Unprofitable character of the small pledges redeemed within a month, 4533–4536——Approval of six months, rather than twelve months, as the period of forfeiture, 4537–4542. 4546–4548——Comparatively few pledges so low as 6 d. or 1 s.; 4543–4545.

Considerable number of club blankets and club Bibles pawned in Glasgow, 4547–4550. 4578–4580——Very few Glasgow pawnbrokers who keep sale shops, 4554, 4555——Several instances of insolvency of pawnbrokers at Glasgow, 4556——Particulars relative to the financial results of witness's pawnbroking, one shop having been much more profitable than another, 4557–4577——Tendency of the Arrestment of Wages Act to check the pawning of club blankets and Bibles, 4581, 4582.

Shaw, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for twelve years a pawnbroker's assistant; has been connected with the trade for many years, 3427. 3508–3510. 3534, 3535——Statement as to there being much less protection for pawners since the abolition, in

in 1840, of the system of common informers, 3428-3432. 3536-3541——Comment upon the power obtained by the pawnbrokers in 1860, of charging a halfpenny for the ticket on pledges below 5*s.*; 3433-3437. 3450——Unduly heavy charge now paid by poor persons who pledge such things as flat irons for a day or for a week, 3437-3441.

Practice adopted of splitting the pledges when the halfpenny ticket Act was passed, 3442-3444——Sufficiency of interest at the rate of 4*d.* in the pound, 3445——Immense per-centage of interest when goods are only pawned for a day or for a week, 3445-3447. 3511, 3512——Objection to fractions not being retained; suggestions hereon, 3448-3452——Decided objection to special contracts being allowed; question hereon whether for those in need the power of pledging is not better than the necessity of selling, 3453-3490. 3515-3524.

Denial that pawning is a proof of improvidence; degree of analogy hereon between pawners and borrowers from banks, 3490-3500. 3525-3533. 3553-3557——Objection to prohibiting pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.*, though restrictions are necessary for the protection of the pledgers, 3501-3507. 3542-3550——Conclusion as to the excellent profits made by pawnbrokers, 3510. 3514. 3546. 3551, 3552.

Shop Assistants. Necessity of paying the shop assistants liberally, Dicker 520, 521——Carelessness of assistants in taking pledges, Sir T. Henry 3596. 3731-3734.

Short-time Pledges. Calculation showing a loss upon those pledges which are redeemed within a month, Dicker 502-507. 522-527; Scoular 4533-4536——Large number of transactions on Saturday night, this business not being profitable, Dicker 508-511. 522-527. 662; Telfer 865-873——Loss incurred by witness upon every pledge less than 5*s.* which is redeemed within the month, G. Attenborough 714-719.

Unduly heavy charge now paid by poor persons who pledge such things as flat irons for a day or for a week, Shaw 3437-3441——Immense per-centage of interest when goods are only pawned for a day or for a week, ib. 3445-3447. 3511, 3512.

Silverbrokers. Proposition that the business of pawnbrokers be confined to pledges below 2*l.* or 5*l.*, and that advances above such limit be made by silverbrokers, who should pay a double license duty, Rt. Attenborough 3243-3261.

SMALL PLEDGES:

1. Proportion of Pledges of Low Value.
2. Unprofitable Character of Small Pledges.
3. Question of prohibiting Pledges below a certain Amount.

1. Proportion of Pledges of Low Value:

Much larger proportions of pledges below 10*s.* than above 10*s.*; Hardaker 128-131——Total of 76,603 pledges received by witness within a year, about 24 per cent. of which were under 2*s.*; May 934, 935——Doubt as to the number of witness's pledges at varying amounts; the average amount is 4*s.* 3*d.*; ib. 1005-1013.

Large proportion of the pledges in Glasgow, &c., which are for small amounts, Hector 1941-1947——Comparatively few pledges at Glasgow so low as 6*d.* or 1*s.*, Scoular 4543-4545.

2. Unprofitable Character of Small Pledges:

Statement as to the small pledges being no profit at all, but rather a loss, on account of the labour involved, Hardaker 93. 145, 146. 299, 300. 322-332. 373-381. 416-418——Concurrence of evidence as to the unprofitable character of the business of pawnbrokers in the case of the smaller pledges redeemed within a month, Dicker 502-507. 522-527; G. Attenborough 684-689. 714-719; Scoular 4533-4536.

Loss incurred by witness on pledges under 2*s.*, May 1126——Inadequate rate of interest now paid by the lower class of pledges, Brooking 1171——Calculation showing that the cost of working the pledges of 2*s.* 6*d.* and under results in a loss when they are redeemed in less than two months, A. M'Kay 2076-2078. 2125. 2129, 2130. 2189-2192——Loss involved on pledges on which only a halfpenny is taken for interest, Richard Attenborough 2829.

3. Question of prohibiting Pledges below a certain Amount:

Anticipated objection by the trade and the public to a discontinuance of advances under 2*s.* 6*d.*, Hardaker 382, 383. 398, 399——Statement in favour of abolishing all pledges under 5*s.* or 6*d.*, M'Call 1329-1331. 1381-1387. 1444-1447——Approval of prohibiting pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.*, Miller 1567, 1568; Robert Attenborough 3316-3318.

Doubt as to the advantage of abolishing pledges of small value, witness preferring rather to abolish pawnbroking altogether in Scotland, Hector 1948-1957——Hardship upon the poor if pledges under 2*s.* 6*d.* were prohibited, A. M'Kay 2185; Walter 2652-2658——

2658—— Objection to prohibiting pledges under 2 s. 6 d., though restrictions are necessary for the protection of the pledgers, Shaw 3501-3507. 3542-3550.

Advantage if pledges under 2 s. 6 d. were prohibited, as in France, Sir T. Henry 3666-3672——Opinion that it would be a great benefit to the improvident or "lapsing" classes if pawnbrokers were prohibited from taking in pledges below 2 s. 6 d.; question hereon whether these would not sell instead of pawn, M'Donald 3807-3824. 3888—— Great advantage of prohibiting all pledges under 2 s. 6 d. or 3 s., as the proceeds are, in the great majority of cases, spent in drink, Johnston 4019-4022. 4031-4033. 4140. 4150-4158. 4166-4172—— Personally, witness would prefer that there were no advances under 5 s., ib. 4021. 4040. 4153.

Convenience of the smaller pledges more especially, Sir W. Bodkin 4685-4689—— Benefits anticipated from the abolition of pledges under 2 s., the money frequently going in drink, Russell 4903-4910. 4922-4926. 4930-4932—— Defence of the system of low advances, such as 1 s.; belief that the loan is a great convenience to the working classes, and is not often spent in drink, Scotson 5050-5052. 5076-5095. 5107-5110—— Objection to the abolition of advances under 2 s. 6 d., as in France, ib. 5090-5101.

Special Contracts. Practice of some pawnbrokers to advance in excess of 10 l., the Act of Parliament not applying beyond this limit; form of agreement used in such cases, and varying interest charged, Hardakr 284. 288-298—— Payment of 15 l. per cent. profit, by the special contract pledges taken by witness, less the working expenses, which range from 5 l. to 7½ l. per cent., Richard Attenborough 2687. 2763-2795—— Remunerative character of witness's business, the sale trade being an important portion of it, ib. 2754-2759. 2885, 2886. 2915——Information in connection with witness's business, the large value of a great portion of the pledges, the interest charged, &c., Robert Attenborough 3349-3393.

Suggestion that the maximum limit of pledges under the Pawnbrokers' Act be raised from 10 l. to 20 l., Sir T. Henry 3608. 3616, 3617. 3711-3716. 3722, 3723——Prescribed rate contemplated for sums over 10 l. as well as under, ib. 3722-3730.

Form of special contract and regulations respecting the same, App. 239.

See also Freedom of Contract. Sales, &c. Stamp (Special Contracts). Stamped Agreements.

Splitting of Pledges. Explanation of the practice at Salford as to the splitting of some pledges, and charging for separate tickets, May 1089-1099——Practice adopted of splitting the pledges when the halfpenny ticket Act was passed, Shaw 3442-3444—— Suggestion that no pawnbroker be allowed to advance less than 10 s. upon anything that was not a single article, M'Donald 3807——Expediency of a check upon the splitting up of pledges; instances of the prevalence of this practice, Johnston 4090-4097.

Discountenance by witness of the practice of splitting pledges, Scoular 4459-4461; Scotson 5053-5056—— Discouragement by witness at Edinburgh of the practice of splitting the pledges, Russell 4724-4728——Inference from the splitting of pledges that the low pledges are profitable at present rates, G. Attenborough 5156, 5157.

Stamp (Special Contracts). Non-objection to a stamp duty on special contracts, May 1081-1086.

Stamp on Tickets. Statement in favour of a Government stamp of one halfpenny on every pawn ticket, Hector 2006.

Stamped Agreements. Examination as to witness having charged 1 s. 6 d. a month on a certain advance of 2 l. 16 s., and having used a sixpenny stamp for the agreement made, so that he contends there was no violation of the Act of Parliament, Walter 2522-2540. 2557-2561. 2581-2590. 2605-2609—— Further defence of witness's practice as to the use of stamped agreements, ib. 2675-2679.

Entire illegality of the practice of making special contracts for pledges under 10 l. by resorting to the use of a stamped agreement, Turner 2638.

property taken in by pawnbrokers, Dicker 639-648——Very small quantity of stolen goods disposed of by pledging, G. Attenborough 711-713——Large quantity of stolen goods pawned on account of the facilities of the system, Williamson 1575-1581. 1596-1599——Grounds for inferring that very few stolen goods are ever pledged with witness, at Bradford, Blackwood 1717-1735——Very small quantity of stolen property pledged with witness; occasional pledging of plate through the carelessness of housekeepers, Richard Attenborough 2786-2795. 2815-2818. 2834-2839.

Very great extent to which stolen goods in London are pawned; numerous cases in the police courts daily, Sir T. Henry 3593-3596. 3660, 3661. 3655-3657. 3678-3689——There are doubtless very many cases which never come before the courts, ib. 3657. 3684——Results of witness's judicial experience, that a considerable portion of stolen property in the metropolis finds its way into the hands of pawnbrokers, Sir W. Bodkin 4645-4648. 4660.

2. Nature of the Checks or Facilities in respect of the Pawning of Stolen Property, and the Conviction of the Pawners:

Responsibility incurred by pawnbrokers in detaining pledgers or pledges when theft is suspected, May 943, 944——Further facilities desirable to be given by pawnbrokers for the detection by the police of stolen property when pledged, and for the conviction of the offenders, M'Call 1364-1370. 1421-1426——Advantage in pawnbrokers retaining the duplicates for some time after the redemption of the pledges, ib. 1397, 1398.

Effect of pawnshops in fostering theft, Miller 1549——Difficulty in the police detecting stolen goods at pawnbrokers' sales, Williamson 1615-1618——Very little use of the list of jewel robberies sent daily to the pawnbrokers, ib. 1619, 1620——Inducements to the less respectable pawnbrokers to receive stolen goods, Hector 1875.

Complaint as to the requirement relative to the detention of pledgers suspected of bringing stolen goods; liability thus incurred, Walter 2467-2475——It is greatly to the interest of the pawnbrokers to take precaution against stolen pledges, Richard Attenborough 2818. 2834. 2919——A thief cannot go to a more dangerous place for him than a pawnshop, ib. 2834——Suggested payment of pawnbrokers for their services in helping to convict thieves, Stubbs 3057-3059.

Carelessness of pawnbrokers' assistants in taking pledges, so that pledges of stolen goods are not easily identified, Sir T. Henry 3596. 3731-3734——Ready facilities afforded generally by the pawnbrokers in cases of theft, ib. 3660, 3661. 3700-3702.

Carelessness and recklessness shown by many pawnbrokers in the reception of stolen goods, Sir W. Bodkin 4649. 4659-4662——Great respectability of many pawnbrokers, although on the whole adequate facilities are not given for the detection of stolen goods pledged, ib. 4693-4705——It is against the interest of the pawnbroker to give facilities for detection, ib. 4695-4697——Means of detection afforded by the pawn tickets, there being no such facility of detection in the case of "leaving shops," ib. 4699-4703.

3. Objection to the Loss incurred by Pawnbrokers in the Forfeiture of Stolen Goods:

Exception taken to the requirement that mony advanced on stolen goods shall be forfeited; unless there be negligence there should not be forfeiture, Walter 2477-2482.

Storr, Rayner. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is largely engaged as auctioneer in selling unredeemed pledges for pawnbrokers, 3180, 3181——Attendance of pawnbrokers, general dealers, and of the public at these sales, there being always an active bidding, and the pawnbroker buying only a small proportion of the articles, 3182-3197. 3204-3217——Realisation of about the amounts advanced on the pledges, 3198.

Charge of five per cent. by witness's firm on the produce of the sales, the lots being all prepared by the pawnbrokers, 3199-3201——Separate sale of each pledge above 10*s.*, the low pledges above that amount being sometimes combined into one lot, 3202, 3203. 3218-3223——Inaccuracy of the assumption that dealers combine to prevent the public from bidding and run up the prices against them, 3210, 3211. 3216, 3217.

Prosperity of the London pawnbrokers as a class, their profits, however, being largely made from other business as well as pawnbroking, 3226-3236——Less profits from the actual pawning than are made in an ordinary retail business, 3237-3240.

Stubbs, Lucas Peter. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is in the office of the borough magistrates of Liverpool; has written a work on pawnbroking, but found it most difficult to compress and simplify the law, 3027-3034——Result of witness's inquiries, that he considers the present scale of charge too low, 3035. 3046. 3107-3114——Proposal for simplifying simplifying the Act, and for increasing the charge, the greater simplicity being a compensation to the poor for the increased charge, 3036–3041. 3107–3118. 3130–3132.

Large amount of pawning at Liverpool by labourers, who pledge to equalise their wages, 3042–3045——Frequent loss by pawnbrokers in having to restore property stolen or illegally pledged, 3046–3053——Care taken generally by the pawnbrokers with a view to the rejection of illegal pledges of stolen goods, facilities being, with some exceptions, readily afforded to the police, 3052–3056. 3102–3105. 3119–3124——Suggested payment of pawnbrokers for their services in helping to convict thieves, 3057–3059.

Obstacle to carrying out the law as to pledgers giving their correct name and address, &c., 3060–3065——Doubt as to much abuse at Liverpool in respect of declarations when tickets are lost; amendment suggested in the practice on this subject for the better protection of the pawnbroker, 3066–3079——Penalty under local Act at Liverpool for receiving pledges from persons under sixteen years of age, 3080.

Provisions in the Liverpool Act as to the compulsory restoration of stolen goods by the pawnbroker; similar clause in the Pawnbrokers' Act, 3081–3088——Suggested consolidation of sections 2 and 3 of the Pawnbrokers' Act as to the rate of charge, 3089–3095——Inoperativeness of the Act in Liverpool as to farthings being given, 3095.

Approval of freedom of contract for bulky articles, and for pledges generally above 2 l.; doubt as to the poorer classes being capable of protecting themselves in the event of special contracts for pledges below 2 l., 3096–3101. 3133–3179——Suggestion for increased power of search, under certain restrictions, 3106——Doubt as to the necessity at Liverpool of placing pawnbrokers' licenses under the magistrates, 3125, 3126——Advantage of only six months' forfeiture in the case of winter clothing, 3127–3129.

Sunday Pledging. Very rare instances of any pawnbrokers opening on Sunday, Dicker 610–612.

Surplus (Sale of Forfeited Pledges). Objection to so long a period as three years within which application may be made for the surplus from sales, Hardaker 249–263——Doubt as to the necessity of any reduction of the time in which surpluses may be claimed, Dicker 635–638——Instances of unredeemed goods sold for much more than was advanced upon them, the surplus not being surrendered unless it be demanded, ib. 653–661

Approval of the pawner's right to overplus on sale of pledges over 10 s., G. Attenborough, 733, 734——Question considered whether the law requires alteration on the subject of overpluses and deficiencies where pledges above 10 s. are sold; hardship in some cases of overplus, if the pawnbrokers cannot make a set-off for a deficiency, ib. 783–792, 812——Absence of application to witness in respect of goods sold where over 10 s.; he keeps no books of such sales, May 954. 1107. 1131–1134.

Proposal that the surplus on sales of unredeemed pledges should, if not returned to the pledgers, be handed over to local charities, Miller 1521–1534——Forfeiture of any surplus on sale at the end of three years, Hector 1964——Extremely rare instances of application for surpluses on pledges sold, A. M'Kay 2203, 2204; Walter 2508; Scotson 5040–5042——Propriety of a return of the surplus derived from sales, Walter 2508. 2563; Johnston 4077.

Information relative to the public sales of witness's forfeited pledges; hardship in his being called upon to give up the surplus in some cases, whilst generally he cannot recover any deficiency, Richard Attenborough 2732–2753. 2760. 2803–2806. 2826–2828. 2825–2915——Payment by witness of 500 l. a year in overplus from sales, ib. 3390–3393.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that when there is a surplus on one pledge and a deficit upon another, both belonging to the same pawner, the pawnbroker should have the right of set-off; legal doubt on this point at present, Turner 3908–3917.

Insufficient knowledge of the public as to their right of inspecting the books and claiming the surplus, Sir T. Henry 3742, 3743——Uselessness of the power of pledgers to apply for the surplus on sales; suggested forfeiture in all unredeemed cases, Scoular 4457, 4458. 4499, 4500. 4525, 4526.

T.

Telfer, John Ashbridge. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a pawnbroker in St. George's-street, East, and in Whitechapel, 830, 831——Submits statistics relative to his business, showing that his net profits from pawnbroking are exceedingly small, and that on the smaller transactions pledged for short periods there is an actual loss, 832–848. 865–876——Calculation showing the expenses in respect of each pledge, resulting in a loss upon the smaller transactions for less than a month, 850–853. 868–873.

Suggestion

Suggestion that the initial charge might be larger, and should cover two months as the minimum time, 853–864——Approval, on the whole, of the adoption of the Irish rate in England, 858—— Expediency of freedom of contract being allowed, 859——Numerous pledges on Monday taken out on the following Saturday, these not being profitable on account of the expenses, 865–873.

TICKETS:

1. As to the Charge for the Pawn Ticket.
2. As to the Particulars furnished on the Ticket.
3. As to the Forms of Tickets in Use.
4. As to the Sale of Tickets.

1. As to the Charge for the Pawn Ticket:

Satisfaction to be given by the present charge for tickets if the Irish rate of interest be adopted, Hardaker 147——Custom of many houses not to charge the halfpenny ticket fee in the case of very small amounts, Dicker 528, 529——Doubt whether it is desirable to alter the present ticket fee or not, ib. 530, 531——Opinion that there should be a penny ticket fee upon all pledges, G. Attenborough 674–676.

More equitable distribution required as regards the charge for tickets, May 965–967——Conclusion as to the ticket money being for appraisement, and having no reference to the cost of warehousing, ib. 1068–1072——Statement of the ticket charge on each pledge, and on each renewal, ib. 1140–1143.

Suggested increase of the present rate by charging 1 d. for all tickets under 10 l., as in Ireland, Blackwood 1693–1695——Opinion in favour of a uniform charge of 1 d. for all tickets, Keeson 2403–2406——Objection to discontinuing the charge for the ticket, Scoular 4502. 4531–4533——Witness has never taken ½ d. for a pledge under 5 s., G. Attenborough 5147.

Comment upon the power obtained by the pawnbrokers, in 1860, of charging a ½ d. for the ticket below 5 s., Shaw 3433–3437. 3450.

2. As to the Particulars furnished on the Ticket:

Proposal that the pawnbroker be obliged to place upon the duplicate the interest to be charged per month, Hardaker 90. 92. 126, 127——Objection to the clause requiring the pawnbroker to endorse on the ticket the amount of profit received, ib. 98–104. 281. 285, 286——Approval of the interest being marked on the ticket when the article is pledged; facility of doing this if the rate in Ireland be extended to England, Dicker 516–519.

Absence of inquiry by pledgers as to the endorsement of the charge on the ticket, May 940–942——Advantage of the charge for interest being clearly printed on the back of the ticket, May 1076; Richard Attenborough 2708–2712; Russell 4853——Circumstance of witness never endorsing the tickets, May 1077.

Defective manner in which the pawn tickets are frequently written out in the Metropolis, Williamson 1572——Practice of witness always to endorse upon the duplicate, when given up, the amount of charge, Walter 2453–2456——Advantage in the interest and rate per cent. being endorsed upon the ticket under a simplified system, ib. 2512, 2513. 2565——Doubt as to the necessity of the endorsement upon the pledge when the money is returned, Turner 2965–2970.

Frequent difficulty through the pawn tickets not being legibly written; advantage in the name and article being specified on the ticket, M'Donald 3862–3871——Further reference to the proposal as to placing a table of profits on the duplicate, Turner 3927, 3928——Expediency of pawnbrokers being required to give on the ticket an accurate description of the property pledged; illustrations hereon, Johnston 4083–4086——Approval of the interest being marked upon the ticket, if fractional parts be abolished, Scoular 4498.

3. As to the Forms of Tickets in Use:

Varying forms of pawn tickets used by different houses in the trade, Hardaker 170——Advantage if the tickets were taken from a book in which a counterfoil should be kept by the pawnbroker, Dicker 651, 652——Expediency of uniform tickets being prescribed by Act, M'Call 1399——Information relative to the form of pawn ticket used by witness, and the particulars furnished upon it, Scoular 4486–4497.

4. As to the Sale of Tickets:

Suggestion for prohibiting the sale of tickets; check thereby upon "duffing" practices, Walter 2614–2634——Approval of a prohibition on the sale of tickets, Richard Attenborough 2781; Robert Attenborough 3294, 3295—— Advantage in some respects if the selling of pawn tickets by the pawners were prohibited, Johnston 4087, 4088.

Turner, Francis. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Barrister-at-law; has written a work on the "Contract of Pawn," 2932-2934——Suggested amendment on the subject of the legal definition of a pawnbroker, 2935-2937——Entire illegality of the practice of making special contracts for pledges under 10 l., by resorting to the use of a stamped agreement, 2938——Question as to the expediency of retaining the present difference between the rate of license duty paid in London and in the country, ib.

Very complicated provisions relative to the rate of profit or interest, 2938——Amended scale suggested by witness, at the rate of a ½ d. per month for each 2 s., 2939-2955——There might be a charge of ½ d. at starting on each transaction, for the expense of the ticket and of clerkship, thus making it 1 d. on 2 s. for the first month, 2940-2942——Legal difficulty now liable to arise in respect of the payment of farthings, 2956-2959.

Proposal that after three days' grace another month be charged, 2960, 2961——Exceptions taken to the requirements as to the name and address, &c. being supplied by the pledger, 2962-2964——Doubt as to the necessity of the endorsement upon the pledge when the money is returned, 2965-2970——Objection to the section of the Act on the question of unlawful pawning and the disposal of forfeitures, 2971.

Proposal that the section relating to forged notes or tickets be struck out, and that this offence be dealt with under the general law, 2972-2978. Suggested consolidation of the provisions relative to unfinished goods, &c., 2970——Hardship and anomaly under the Act in regard to the restoration by the pawnbroker of goods unlawfully pawned; amendment desirable, 2980, 2981.

Examination relative to the delivery by the pawnbroker of goods upon declaration when when tickets are lost; conclusion as to the expediency of due inquiry by the magistrate as the only means of absolute protection to the pawnbroker, 2982-3026.

[Second Examination.] Suggestion with a view to the law being made more clear as to goods under 10 s. value being absolutely forfeited on the expiration of a year, 3901-3903——Amendment suggested as regards the system of a three months' grace, 3904-3907——Evidence in support of the conclusion that when there is a surplus on one pledge and a deficit on another, both belonging to the same pawner, the pawnbroker should have the right of set-off; legal doubt on this point at present, 3908-3917.

Approval of the pawner being empowered to bargain with another person for the sale to him of the goods in pawn, 3918-3924——Suggestion for the adoption of a uniform limit of age below which pledges should not be taken, 3925, 3926——Further reference to the proposal as to placing a table of profits on the duplicate, 3927, 3928——Conclusion as to certain clauses of the Pawnbrokers' Act not being necessary, or admitting of abbreviation, 3929-3933——Advantage in sending certain cases under 10 l. to the county court instead of to a magistrate, 3934-3937.

Expediency of the "Dolly Shop Act" (19 & 20 Vict.) being incorporated with the new Act, 3938——Restriction upon lending money on goods under 10 l., save under the provisions of the pawnbroking Acts, 3939-3943——Security required as regards the insurance of pawned goods against fire; way in which it might be optional in the pawner whether his goods should be insured, 3944-3955. 3980-3983.

Statement in favour of freedom of contract as regards furniture and other bulky articles, the present rate not paying the pawnbroker on account of the expense of storage; doubt as to the enhanced rate to be charged, 3956-3961. 3984-4009——Question considered as to the illegality of auctioneers who have periodical sales making advances on goods received in the interim, 3962-3967——Expediency of the pawnbroker being competent to appear as a witness in suits before magistrates, as in the county courts, 3968-3971——Increase of 25 per cent. by the proposal to charge ½ d. per month for each 2 s. up to 1 l., 3972-3976.

Explanation that witness's evidence is not the result of consultation with the pawnbrokers, and that he does not represent them on the present occasion, 3977-3979——Argument that freedom of contract as to pledging at enhanced rates is a boon to parties wanting to raise money as compared with the obligation of selling their property for the purpose, 3994-4009.

U.

Unfinished Goods. Suggested consolidation of the provisions relative to unfinished goods, &c., Turner 2970.

Unredeemed Pledges. The proportion of pledges unredeemed varies from five to ten per cent. Hardaker 191, 192. 221——Circumstance of about ninety-five per cent. of witness's pledges being redeemed; loss upon the five per cent. unredeemed, G. Attenborough 696-699. 768-770——Average of about four per cent. of witness's pledges unredeemed, May 945. 1039-1042.

Large proportion of forfeited pledges in Scotland, these in Edinburgh amounting to twelve per cent., Hector 1975–1977. 1991——Average of seven-and-a-half per cent. of witness's pledges in Glasgow unredeemed, A. M'Kay 2030——Constant renewal of many of witness's pledges, hardly five per cent. being forfeited, Richard Attenborough 2728–2731——Average of seven per cent. of witness's pledges unredeemed, Scotson 5027.

Exception taken to the conclusion that the forfeited pledges average only about five per cent., Sir T. Henry 3694, 3695.

Usury Laws. Conclusion that as there are now no laws for protection against usury, there ought to be a law of free contract, Dicker 589–592; Hancock 2234–2242. 2252——Origin of the pawnbroking laws as an exception to the usury laws, Hancock 2234.

W.

Walter, John Morritt. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Pawnbroker in the City of London, 2432, 2433——Objection to the Pawnbrokers' Act, as not admitting of sufficient profit; preference, however, expressed for the Act as compared with the Bill before the Committee, 2434, 2435. 2604——Satisfaction to be given by an adoption of the Irish rate, 2435——Decided objection to farthings and fractions, 2436, 2437——Advantage if it were required that pawnbrokers should keep three books instead of two, by having a book for pledges under 5 s., 2438–2445.

Statement as to witness never asking whether a pledger is a housekeeper or lodger, or what is his christian name and address; futility of the provisions of the Act on this score, 2445–2553. 2597–2603——Practice of witness always to endorse upon the duplicate, when given up, the amount of charge, 2453–2456——There is no entry in detail of the receipts in redemption of the pledges, 2456–2458——Books kept by witness produced in explanation of his daily system of business, 2459–2466.

Complaint as to the requirement relative to the detention of pledgers suspected of bringing stolen goods; liability thus incurred, 2467–2475——Objection to the requirement that money advanced on stolen goods shall be forfeited; unless there be negligence there should not be forfeiture, 2477–2482——Injustice to pawnbrokers under the system of affidavits when tickets are lost, and when a second claim is made by the real owners, 2483–2486.

Grounds for strongly objecting to the proposed reduction of the time of forfeiture to six months; injury thereby to the public, 2487–2501. 2595, 2596——Satisfactory character of the present arrangements as to sales by auction, 2502–2505——Approval of the right of three months' notice for redemption, 2506, 2507——Very few demands upon witness for the overplus from sales, 2508——Approval of any overplus being given up to the pledger, 2508. 2563——Suggestion that the hours be from eight till seven, except on Saturdays, when the houses should be open till eleven, 2509–2511. 2564.

Advantage in the interest and rate per cent. being indorsed upon the ticket under a simplified system, 2512, 2513. 2565——Circumstance of witness having never put a table of profits in his shop, 2512——Statistics relative to witness's business, showing the capital, number of pledges, expenses, and profits, 2514–2521. 2569. 2573–2580——Examination as to witness having charged 1 s. 6 d. a month interest on a certain advance of 2 l. 16 s., and having used a 6 d. stamp for the agreement made, so that he contends there was no violation of the Act of Parliament, 2522–2540. 2557–2561. 2581–2590 2605–2609.

Denial that witness evades the requirements of the Act in his book of auction sales; practice of witness sometimes to buy at these sales, 2541–2556——Suggestion that the charge for inspecting the auction book be 6 d. instead of 1 d., 2562——Proposed limitation to three months of the time for prosecuting by information, 2567, 2568——Strong objection to freedom of contract under 2 l.; effect thereof in greatly encouraging the licensing of "leaving-shops," 2569–2571. 2581. 2605——Facility evinced by witness as regards information to the police, and permission to examine his books, 2592–2594.

[Second Examination.] Statement showing that the public as well as the pawnbrokers are defrauded by "duffers," 2610–2613——Collusion at times between the pawnbrokers and the "duffers," with a view to the latter selling their pawn tickets to the public; suggestion hereon that the sale of tickets be prohibited altogether, and that the pledgers be empowered to call for a sale of the goods, 2614–2634——Great difficulty in convicting "duffers," 2621.

Purchase by witness at auction sales when the goods are not bid for by the public at a reserved price, 2622, 2623. 2625——Further suggestion that pledgers should pay 6 d. in respect of each special sale, 2635–2637——Great difficulty in obtaining correct names and addresses further adverted to, 2638–2651——Conclusion as to the great importance of pawnbroking to the lower classes; deadlock if it were prohibited, 2651. 2660–2662.

Hardship if pledges under 2 s. 6 d. were prohibited, 2652-2658——Great prejudice to the poorer and illiterate classes if freedom of contract were applied to pledges under 40 s., 2659. 2764. 2677——Further statement as to witness not placing in his shop a table of interest, as required by the Act, 2663-2671——Charge by witness of ¾ d. per month for 3 s., and of 1 d. per month for 4 s., this being in accordance with the Act, 2672-2674——Further defence of witness's practice as to the use of stamped agreements, 2675-2679——Failure of freedom of contract in Australia, 2677. 2679-2681.

Wee Pawns (Scotland). Part taken by witness and the magistrates of East Renfrewshire in causing the passing of the Act 19 & 20 Vict., c. 27, bringing the "wee pawns" under license, Hector 1846-1848——Operation of "wee pawns" in Scotland, and of brokers as well as of pawnbrokers; restrictions suggested as regards the former, ib. 1912-1920. 1927-1935.

Objectionable course pursued at Edinburgh by certain licensed pawnbrokers who formerly kept "wee pawn" shops; practice of splitting the pledges, thus increasing the charge for tickets and interest, McDonald 3789-3806. 3890-3893. 3897-3900——Illegality of the system of "wee pawns" in Edinburgh; the police have, however, almost entirely suppressed the system, 3872-3874.

Great extent to which the system of "wee pawns" is carried on at Edinburgh under the Police Act of 1848; conclusion as to the system being a violation of the Act 19 & 20 Vict., Johnston 4130-4134. 4159-4162——Importance of abolishing "wee pawns," the money being almost invariably raised for procuring drink, ib. 4135, 4136.

Disposal of a large quantity of stolen property in Edinburgh through the "wee pawns," Russell 4864-4867——Increased business of "wee pawns" in Edinburgh if small pledges were prohibited, as proposed by witness; belief that the police would check abuse in this respect, ib. 4936-4939.

Williamson, Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Superintendent of the Detective Police of the Metropolis, 1569, 1570——Defective manner in which the pawn tickets are frequently written out in the metropolis, 1572——Non-compliance with the Act in not ascertaining whether the pledgers are housekeepers or lodgers, 1572-1574——Large quantity of stolen goods pawned, on account of the facilities of the system, 1575-1581. 1596-1599——Respects in which the pawnbrokers might give increased facilities to the police; approval on this score of a general adoption of the Glasgow Police Act in a modified form, 1582-1589. 1594, 1595. 1600-1603.

Capability generally of the poorer classes in London to look after their own interests in their dealings with pawnbrokers; objection, however, to a system of freedom of contract, 1591-1593. 1604-1610——Approval of shortening the period of forfeiture as regards certain articles, 1611——Use of two entrances to most of the London pawnshops, one being for the sake of privacy, 1613, 1614. 1627-1629——Difficulty in the police detecting stolen goods at pawnbrokers' sales, 1615-1618——Very little use of the list of jewel robberies sent daily to the pawnbrokers, 1619, 1620.

Objection to a restriction upon the number of licensed pawnshops as tending to foster "leaving-shops;" difficulty in putting down the latter, 1621-1626. 1630-1635——Advantage if pawnbrokers were required by law to record all their transactions, 1636-1641——Doubt as to the necessity of altering the hours of business, 1642-1647——Use made of pawnshops by the provident as well as the improvident, 1648-1650.

REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the operation of the PRISONS ACT and PRISON MINISTERS ACT, so far as respects the RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION provided for PRISONERS other than those belonging to the ESTABLISHED CHURCH;——HAVE considered the matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following REPORT:—

YOUR Committee have taken evidence upon the working of the Prisons and Prison Ministers Acts, by which the appointment of prison ministers other than the chaplain of the Established Church is left to the discretion of the different prison authorities throughout the country. The result has been great inequality in the working of the system. In some prisons, a Roman Catholic prison minister is appointed with an adequate salary, and is placed on terms of equality with the Protestant chaplain; in others, a Roman Catholic prison minister is appointed with a salary, but is not permitted to assemble the Roman Catholic prisoners for Divine Service, being restricted to visiting them in their cells; in a third class, a Roman Catholic clergyman is permitted to visit the prisoners of his persuasion, and to assemble them for Divine Service, but is denied a salary; whilst in a fourth the visits of a Roman Catholic clergyman are only permitted at the express desire of a prisoner. This inequality is specially felt as a grievance by Roman Catholic prisoners, who cannot receive the ministrations of the chaplain of the Established Church without offending against the laws of their own religious persuasion.

Your Committee are of opinion that it is inexpedient and contrary to sound policy that such inequality should exist in the working of our Prison System, and that it is desirable that prisoners of all religious persuasions should be, as far as possible, placed upon a footing of equality with regard to religious ministration and instruction. In this opinion they are supported by the evidence of Captain DuCane, the present, Colonel Henderson, the late, Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons, and Sir Walter Crofton, as to the satisfactory working of the system in the Government prisons, where salaried Roman Catholic chaplains attend the prisoners of their own persuasion, and are recognised as officers of the prison. Your Committee recommend that this system should be made general throughout the country.

The complaints which have arisen have related almost exclusively to Roman Catholics. The cases in which Protestant prisoners have objected to join in Church of England worship, or to receive spiritual assistance from the Chaplain, are very rare, and your Committee are of opinion that when such cases may occasionally occur, they be satisfactorily met by the prison authorities under the powers which by Act of Parliament they at present possess.

Your Committee are, therefore, of opinion that prison authorities should be required by law to appoint Roman Catholic ministers in prisons in which Roman Catholic prisoners are confined; and that hereafter the Roman Catholic minister, when so appointed, shall be classed as one of the officers of the prison, and shall receive an adequate salary for his services.

Your Committee are of opinion that the prison minister so appointed should receive a salary according to the following scale:—

If the average number of prisoners belonging to the Roman Catholic religion during the last three years shall have been—

Number of Prisoners.	Minimum Salary.
More than 10, and less than 20 - - - - -	25
„ 20 „ 100 - - - - -	50
„ 100 „ 200 - - - - -	100
„ 200 „ 300 - - - - -	150
„ 300 - - - - - - - -	200

Your Committee recommend that the Secretary of State should have power to transfer prisoners of any denomination, whose sentences exceed three months, from one prison to another, in order to give greater facilities for religious worship and instruction according to their special tenets.

DRAFT REPORT proposed by the Chairman, read the first time, as follows:—

"YOUR Committee have taken evidence upon the working of the Prisons and Prison Ministers Acts, by which the appointment of prison ministers other than the chaplain of the Established Church is left to the discretion of the different prison authorities throughout the country. The result has been great inequality in the working of the system. In one prison, a Roman Catholic prison minister is appointed with an adequate salary, and is placed on terms of equality with the Protestant chaplain; in another, a Roman Catholic prison minister is appointed with a salary, but is not permitted to assemble the Roman Catholic prisoners for Divine Service, being restricted to visiting them in their cells; in a third case, a Roman Catholic clergyman is permitted to visit the prisoners of his persuasion, and to assemble them for Divine Service, but is denied a salary; whilst in a fourth prison the visits of a Roman Catholic clergyman are only permitted at the express desire of a prisoner. This inequality is more specially felt as a grievance by Roman Catholic than by Protestant prisoners, who may be Dissenters from the Established Church, for the reason that the former cannot, whilst the latter can, receive the ministrations of the chaplain of the Established Church without offending against the laws of their own religious persuasion.

"2. Your Committee are of opinion, that it is inexpedient and contrary to sound policy that such inequality should exist in the working of our Prison System, and that it is desirable that prisoners of all religious persuasions should be, as far as possible, placed upon a footing of equality with regard to their religious instruction. In this opinion they are justified by the evidence of Captain Ducane, the present, and Colonel Henderson, the late, Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons, as to the satisfactory working of the system in the Government prisons, where salaried Roman Catholic, equally with Protestant chaplains, attend the prisoners of their own persuasion, and are recognised as officers of the prison. Your Committee believe that this system should be in force generally throughout the country.

"3. With this view they recommend that the discretion as to appointment should no no longer be left, as at present, with the different prison authorities, but that in all prisons in which application shall hereafter be made for the appointment of a salaried prison minister of a persuasion other than the Established Church, the prison authorities shall be bound to make such appointment, subject to the following conditions:—

 "4. If

"4. If the average number of prisoners belonging to the said religious persuasion during the last three years shall have been—

More than 7 and less than 15,	a minimum salary of	25 l.	shall be given.
Above 15 and less than 30,	ditto	75 l.	,,
Above 30 and less than 75,	ditto	100 l.	,,
Above 50 and less than 100,	ditto	150 l.	,,
Above 100 and less than 200,	ditto	200 l.	,,

"5. Your Committee would also recommend that where the average number of such prisoners shall be less than seven, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State, by order under his hand, to transfer such prisoners from one prison to another, and to sanction an arrangement (which the prison authorities of such prisons shall be bound to make) by which religious instruction may be secured to such prisoners, and their minister paid by joint contributions from each of such prison authorities."

Draft Report proposed by Mr. John Talbot, read the first time, as follows:—

"Your Committee do not think it expedient to fetter unnecessarily the discretion of the Courts of Quarter Sessions:

"But being desirous not to cause any hardship to a substantial number of prisoners, in connection with provision for their religious needs, they recommend that it shall be compulsory to pay a reasonable salary to the minister of any religious denomination, whose numbers amount to 50 and upwards, and to give facilities for worship of other denominations than Church of England.

"They also recommend that it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State to transfer any number of prisoners from one prison to another, to obviate the religious difficulty."

Motion made, and Question put,—That the Draft Report proposed by the Chairman be now read a second time, paragraph by paragraph.—The Committee divided:

JOHN FRANCIS MAGUIRE, IN THE CHAIR.

Reverend ALFRED WHITE, called in; and Examined.

Rev. A. White.

28 March 1870.

1. Chairman.] WITH which prison have you en connected as visiting priest?—With the estminster House of Correction.

2. That which is called Tothill Fields Prison? Yes.

3. You are not connected with it now, I lieve?—No. I have ceased to be connected th it.

4. When were you first connected with it?— bout the month of October 1866. I do not ow the date precisely. I served in the prison l the 18th September 1869.

5. Who was your predecessor?—The Rev. r. Wynne.

6. When you were first connected with that ison, were you allowed free access to the Roman tholic prisoners?—I was allowed free access the Catholic prisoners, inasmuch as I could them singly, one by one.

7. Were you only allowed to see them singly? I was only allowed to see them singly.

8. Were you allowed to assemble them to- her for the purpose of instruction?—No, I s not.

9. Do you consider that assembling the pri- ers together for the purpose of instruction is neficial both to the clergyman and to those o are instructed?—Essentially so. I think if ormation is expected in the life of a prisoner, an only be effected through the ministrations the church to which such prisoner belongs.

10. It would also economise the time of the rgyman?—Of course it would economise his e, because when dealing with them singly u have to repeat your instructions according the number of persons instructed.

11. When you have a large number of pri- ers assembled together, instruction given to is instruction given to all?—Yes; most of m are equally ignorant, so that what you would say to one you would say to the great bulk of them.

12. In fact, it is individual instruction given collectively, if I may say so?—Yes.

13. At the time you first came to this prison, had you any accommodation in point of room or apartment?—The only accommodation provided for me and my predecessors was a common prisoner's cell, one of the many cells in a certain corridor.

14. Will you give the Committee an idea of what was the size of that cell?—I cannot exactly answer that question, but I suppose it would have been about 9 feet by 6 feet.

15. It was an ordinary prison cell?—It was an ordinary prison cell.

16. Were you allowed to administer the sacraments of your Church in that cell?—I was.

17. It was the only place in which you could administer those sacraments?—It was the only place allowed.

18. The administration of the sacrament of the Eucharist is always considered one of the most solemn and sacred offices of the Catholic Church? —It is.

19. Is it not the fact that it is always administered with as much solemnity as the circumstances will admit of?—Certainly.

20. Will you state to the Committee under what circumstances you administer that sacrament to the Catholic prisoner?—I administered the sacrament as well as I could in the limited space of room to which I was restricted. In this cell there was a table with a white cloth and two candles upon it; these articles were of course provided by the prison authorities, and in that room I have administered the communion to as many as 14 or 15 women at a time; they were stuffed into that cell, and the atmosphere of the cell was something revolting, so revolting, in fact, that it made made my predecessor sick, and I may say injured his health permanently; it also injured his predecessor, the Rev. Father Zanetti, who often vomited on coming out of the place.

21. Were you often rendered sick, on many similar occasions?—I felt an inclination to vomit on many occasions, and once I notified to the warder that I felt unwell.

22. Was it the fact that the health of your predecessors in the prison, owing to the want of proper accommodation in this respect, was destroyed?—So I have always understood.

23. Do you know that Father Zanetti often suffered from the same cause?—I know that, and I know that on leaving his work at the prison at Westminster he found himself very often incapable of doing further missionary work that day.

24. At that time what was the average number of Catholic prisoners?—I should say that the average number of those who entered their names as Catholics, at that particular time, would have amounted to about 180.

25. About what time did you first join the prison?—About October 1866.

26. Have you seen the returns for July last?—No; I have not seen the latest prison returns.

27. You would not be surprised to find that by the last return the number of Catholics is 220?—That is so, no doubt.

28. I believe I may say that generally speaking, from the time of your joining the prison until the time you left it, the average has been about 200?—I should say so.

29. Notwithstanding that large number you were only allowed to instruct them one at a time?—One at a time.

30. Did you find that a good mode of conveying instruction, or did you find it to have much effect upon the prisoners?—I found it a very costly mode to myself, seeing that I had to multiply my instructions until I was perfectly sick of the work.

31. But, considering the large number of prisoners, you were able to instruct but a very few?—Very few comparatively.

32. Did you remonstrate with the authorities?—I did; I remonstrated with the authorities in the month of August 1867. I should have remonstrated before that time, but for my certain knowledge that others before me had remonstrated, and remonstrated in vain.

33. Was not the inconvenience you suffered from so many people being stuffed into this narrow cell known to the officers of the prison?—Of course it was known to the officers of the prison.

34. Could it have been otherwise than known?—It could not; and I am certain that all the officers of the prison, as well as the magistrates who attend the prison board, were perfectly aware of that fact.

35. Did you not complain from time to time of the rule limiting the number of prisoners you could receive at a time?—I complained formally in the month of August, and my request was met by a direct refusal.

36. Did you apply by letter to obtain the right to see the prisoners collectively?—I did; I applied for permission to hold divine service, and to see the prisoners collectively for instruction, and I received an answer to the effect that the visiting justices saw no reason to interfere with the resolutions already passed upon that subject.

37. There was some relaxation allowed, I believe, in the following January?—There was, and before that a room was allowed me for my own use, with a retiring room attached to it.

38. When was that?—I cannot tell exactly the time, but I think it was about three months before the new year; I should think that I ministered in the cell for about nine months.

39. When was the time they gave you a room with an ante-room?—That was about from 9 to 10 months after my arrival in the prison.

40. In the month of January 1868 there was a change made, was there not?—There was; I unexpectedly received a letter from the visiting justices in which they consented to allow me to hold a religious service on Sunday mornings, and in which leave was also given to me to see as many as 25 prisoners collectively on week days.

41. You had applied in August for permission to celebrate divine service on Sundays?—I had, and also for permission to instruct the prisoners collectively.

42. And you were then refused?—I was; that was a time when I had great hopes of being indulged in my request, inasmuch as at Coldbath Fields the chaplain had service every Sunday, and was allowed to instruct a certain number of prisoners collectively.

43. In the month of August you asked for these two things; permission to see prisoners collectively, and to celebrate the mass on Sunday?—Yes.

44. You were then refused; will you state to the Committee the answer that was given you by the justices in the following January?—In the following January I received a letter from the visiting justices, in which they acceded to those two requests which I made in the month of August.

45. In the meantime had there not been a good deal of agitation, both in Parliament, and in the press, and at the Quarter Sessions, upon this subject?—Yes, there had.

46. Now, growing bolder, I think, you applied for an afternoon service on the Sunday?—I did.

47. Was that application refused, or granted?—It was granted.

48. What is the character of the service that you hold on the Sunday?—The character of the service is this; it consists of morning prayers, and instruction, and a sermon of 20 minutes, or half an hour's duration, and what we call the sacrifice of the mass; besides these various things, we have the singing of hymns or litanies.

49. And what service had you in the afternoon?—In the afternoon we had, what is called in our Church, the rite of benediction, and there was a sermon in the afternoon, of about the same length of time as in the morning.

50. A sermon of an instructive character?—A sermon of an instructive character.

51. It would be a sermon suited both to the character and position of the prisoners, and to their peculiar circumstances?—I endeavoured to make it so.

52. Is it the general object of Catholic clergymen, in instructing prisoners, to make their instruction as applicable as possible to their circumstances, with a view to their moral improvement?—Certainly.

53. Did you ask permission to hold a day service after that?—Yes; I asked for a daily service, and the magistrates very kindly consented to my request.

54. You

54. You were provided, I think, with a room r public worship?—I was.

55. Do you consider that the prisoners were, nerally, very ignorant?—Very ignorant.

56. And peculiarly requiring instruction?— uite so.

57. Did you ask the visiting justices for any sistance towards that teaching?—I did; I ap- ied to the visiting justices to allow me the rvices of a schoolmistress, whose duty should be instruct those unfortunate women in the ele- ntary truths of Christianity.

58. Was your request granted?—No.

59. Why not?—It seemed to be illegal.

60. Did you apply then for any other assist- ce; did you apply for a Scripture reader?—I d apply for a Scripture reader, and in that I as also met by a refusal.

61. You applied for a Scripture reader to sist in teaching the elementary truths of hristianity?—Yes.

62. Has the Protestant chaplain assistance of similar kind to that for which you asked?—He as, I understand, two assistants.

63. Has he any other religious assistants?— es, a schoolmistress and a clerk; he has the rvices of two or three ladies who assist him in ading the Bible to Protestants prisoners.

64. I suppose you would approve of giving e Protestant chaplain the benefit of the ser- ces of religious ladies?—Decidedly.

65. You think that their presence in the pri- n, and their teaching, would tend to the pri- ners' reformation and to their refinement and evation?—Certainly, that is my idea.

66. Is it within your knowledge that a Catho- c lady of rank applied for permission to perform is Christian duty towards these poor prisoners?—Yes; I am told that a lady of rank applied some w years ago, and that her application was refused.

67. You know her, and, if necessary, her name ould be mentioned?—Yes, I know her well.

68. Did that refusal prevent other applica- ons of a similar nature being made?—It did; t the same time, I must confess, as I told the agistrates themselves on one occasion, that I ould have preferred the services of a school- istress or Bible reader to the services of those dies, because the visiting priest cannot always pend upon their services. I never applied for e services of Catholic ladies, except in one in- ance, when a lady kindly volunteered to play e harmonium for the prisoners at the time of vine service.

69. She was also a lady of rank and position, as she not?—Yes.

70. She wished to play the organ or the har- onium for the advantage of those poor people, nd the greater solemnity of worship?—Yes, e did.

71. What was the answer given to her appli- tion?—The answer was that the thing was mpossible, because ladies were not allowed to sit the prison; that was the answer, and I think at I have got that lady's letter here if the Com- ittee would wish to see it.

72. It is not necessary to produce it; will you st state to the Committee the circumstances of e case?—She was told that ladies were not llowed to visit the prison, and therefore that er request could not be complied with. How- ver, she knew from some source or other that e chairman who addressed her had a daughter ho frequently visited the prison, and she re- called to his mind the fact that his own daughter frequently visited the place, and was allowed to do more than she asked for, as she, the Protest- ant, was allowed to read the Bible and so on, while this lady only wanted to play the harmonium.

73. But still you are of opinion that it was a very meritorious act on the part of the daughter of the magistrate to visit these poor people?— Certainly I am.

74. The visiting justices gave you permission to celebrate divine worship, but did they give you any assistance to enable you to do so?— They put up certain fixtures in the chapel which were absolutely necessary; for instance, there was what they called the Communion Table, and a little side table called the Credence Table, and they fitted up the room with benches, but every thing else more immediately connected with the service at the altar I had to provide myself.

75. Did you do so out of your own pocket?— I did so, at an expense of about 150 l.; I sent to the magistrates a list of things that were neces- sary, and amongst other things there was a har- monium mentioned; they replied that they did not intend to give me any of the things applied for. I should mention that they gave me a carpet; I ordered a carpet at my own expense, and the authorities very kindly offered to pay for it.

76. Is the attendance of a clerk necessary at mass?—It is considered necessary for the proper celebration of the service.

77. Did you apply for a clerk?—I applied for a clerk.

78. Was your application granted?—It was refused; and, in my extremity, I wrote to one of the magistrates to beg if he would have the charity to come and help me in my distress, and he replied that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to come and act as clerk in the gaol.

79. Did he do so?—Yes, he did for five weeks; until I received a letter from the visit- ing justices requesting me to provide a boy for the service.

80. The matron is the chief authority in the prison, is she not?—She is.

81. Her position is that of a governor in a male prison?—Yes.

82. Was there any occasion on which the matron seemed to interfere with the Catholic prisoners in a marked and especial manner?— She made herself somewhat disagreeable the first Sunday morning that we held the service.

83. What day was that?—Easter Sunday, April the 12th.

84. What did the matron do on that occasion? —She assembled the prisoners in the yard almost immediately after divine service, and told them that, although they had a Catholic chapel of their own, they were not obliged to attend it, and that they were at perfect liberty to go to her chapel; she asked those who were desirous of going to the Protestant chapel to hold up their hands, and I am informed that some five or six women put up their hands much to the in- dignation of the other Catholics, and there was very nearly a great disturbance resulting from it.

85. Did any one remonstrate with the matron on that occasion?—I was highly incensed at the indignity which was put upon the Catholics, and I went to see one of the Catholic magistrates, and spoke to him about it; he had a private in- terview with the matron on the subject, and the result result was that some sort of apology was tendered.

86. Were you present upon the occasion when the matron made that appeal to the prisoners?—I was in an adjoining room at the time she was addressing the prisoners, and saw what occurred, but I did not hear what she said.

87. Were you immediately afterwards informed of the nature of her communication to them?—I was told it by many prisoners the next time that I visited the prison.

88. Do you think that an appeal of that kind was fair?—Certainly not.

89. Do you think it would show an animus rather hostile to a clergyman?—Yes; I consider a speech of that sort to be directly against the Act of Parliament.

90. I believe the Protestant chaplain has a fixed permanent officer to help him?—He has.

91. I understand you to say that the Catholic priest has none?—The Catholic priest has no fixed or permanent officer; there is always one attendant, and very often one will wait upon the visiting priest, for a month or two months; but she is removed at the will of the matron, much to the annoyance of the visiting priest, as he has to give fresh explanations to fresh individuals who wait upon him.

92. You did give a daily service up to the time that you left the prison?—I generally gave a daily service.

93. Will you inform the Committee what that daily service consisted of?—The daily service consisted of morning prayers and instruction, and two hymns, and sometimes instead of instruction I used to teach the women music in the chapel, such as the singing of hymns.

94. On the average, what time per day during the week did you give to those ministrations?—It varied a good deal; perhaps two hours a day, taking it all in all; on the Sunday it might be two hours and a half.

95. From your experience of prison and missionary work, would you say that the work of a Catholic chaplain in a prison is very severe?—Very severe.

96. And I understand you to say that even two or three hours per day, whether on a Sunday or week day, would unfit you for other work?—To a certain extent that really did occur.

97. Did your attendance at this prison interfere with your missionary duties?—It did very much so. I was manager of the poor schools at Westminster, where there was an average attendance of about 500 children, and I had to throw up that work in consequence of my prison labours; I could not go on with it. I felt so prostrated about 12 or 1 in the day that I was unfit to attend to this very laborious work of looking after these poor children.

98. Was not the other work also laborious, but a work of great importance?—It was.

99. I believe you belong to a religious order?—I do.

100. To your order are entrusted the missionary duties of the parish of Westminster?—That is so.

101. Were your brother clergymen to a very large extent deprived of your assistance?—They were very much so.

102. What is the character of the congregation coming to your church?—It is about the poorest in all London; hawkers, costermongers, gasmen, and labourers, and perhaps three or four very small shopkeepers.

103. There are very few gentry, I suppose?—Very few gentry; in fact, the parish is so mean and despicable in its character that those gentry who naturally belong to the place by position very often, in fact generally, go elsewhere.

104. For all the services you rendered, or were willing to render, did you receive one single farthing from the justices?—No.

105. Have you any idea what was the salary paid to the Protestant chaplain?—The salary, I think, according to some returns, was 400 l. a year.

106. And considering that the chaplain gives constant attendance, you do not consider that excessive?—Certainly not.

107. There is a note to the last return which runs thus: "This does not include 85 l. 16 s. paid to a schoolmistress, because she instructs prisoners of all denominations;" did you ever apply for a salary?—I applied, not directly to the visiting justices, but I have applied through others, through Mr. Bagshawe, for instance; I applied to the full court of quarter sessions.

108. Was that application actually due to your poor congregation, and to your brother clergymen?—Certainly. I felt that I was a drag upon them in attending to this prison work gratuitously; that I did not contribute towards my own support in the manner in which I should have done, and my brother clergymen had to labour much more in consequence of my attention to the prison; they had to look after sick calls, and instruct the ignorant.

109. You contributed nothing towards the support of the establishment?—Nothing at all.

110. What time did you retire from the prison?—I retired from the prison some time last autumn, the 24th August 1869.

111. What was the immediate cause of your retirement?—The cause of my retirement, or rather my dismissal, from the prison was this, that I published a resolution of the visiting justices, which had appeared in one of the public newspapers.

112. Will you state the nature of that resolution, and whether you considered you were justified in the course you took?—This resolution of the visiting justices had reference to a certain leading article in the "Pall Mall Gazette," entitled, "The Visiting Justices of Tothill Fields, and the Laundry Question." The visiting justices requested me to inform them as to the mode in which that article appeared in the papers, and who the person was who inserted it, and I wrote back to say that I considered their letter to be of a public character, as it regarded what I considered to be a public business, and that I thought the question put to me was not a pertinent one.

113. Will you just state to the Committee what the nature of the letter was. I forget the wording of the letter. What was the origin of the whole matter?—The origin of the whole matter was simply this, that I published a resolution which formed the contents of a letter which was forwarded to me with respect to what I may call the Laundry Question.

114. I wish you to state to the Committee what led to this matter?—The origin of the Laundry Question is simply this: just now I referred to the visit received by the matron from a certain ertain magistrate, who remonstrated with her ut a certain speech which she had delivered he occasion of our having religious services Sunday for the first time; from that time ard she turned the Catholics out of the dry and the kitchen; now these two places supposed to be the favourite places of the oners; the work there is what I may call ciation work, and it is more agreeable than r isolated work. The result of this was these poor Catholic women, in general, on r next committal to prison entered their es as Protestants, in order to get the benefit he laundry and the kitchen, and many com- nts were made to me by the Catholic pri- ers, that they could not enter these places. y often Catholic prisoners assured me that r friends who formerly used to enter their es as Catholics, now entered their names as testants, in order to have the advantage orking in these places.

15. They did that in order to get more agree- association?—Yes.

16. Your knowledge is derived from the state- nts which have been made to you by prisoners? es.

17. Whether the statement be right, or wrong, rely upon their information?—Certainly .

18. Did you address the justices in reference his matter?—Yes, I wrote to the justices, said that I looked upon this as an unfair way roselytizing.

19. There was a correspondence, I believe, it that, I believe?—Yes, there was a corre- idence about that.

20. That correspondence was published, was t?—Yes, it was.

21. It was in reference to that correspondence you were blamed by the justices?—Yes, it for the publication of the letters regarding e laundry matters that I was dismissed.

22. At any rate you thought that there was nfair influence brought to bear against your istration in the prison?—Certainly, I did.

23. With reference to an officer receiving a ry, did you consider yourself, while unsala- and merely permitted to visit, an officer of rison?—During the three years I served the n I considered myself as a simple intruder e sight of the authorities; I had no status ever. I could be ridden over by the matron hat I consider to be an unjustifiable manner. s not treated with courtesy, and the officers taken away from me without my being ulted at all about the matter.

24. But if you had your status, and were a ied officer in the institution, you would be to hold your own fairly?—I should be able old my own.

25. Would it be your wish to do anything to fere with the discipline and order of the n?—By no means.

26. On the contrary, would it be your wish everything to maintain it?—Certainly. I done my best to promote discipline and r in the place; I have prevented women at s from striking the matron. Women have to me in a passion about certain things h have occurred, and I have calmed them .

27. In doing that you were simply discharg- our duty?—I was simply discharging my

128. Have you any remark to make, or suggestion to offer to the Committee; you have no personal interest in the matter now, I believe?—I have not.

129. You are stationed in Glasgow now, are you not?—I am stationed in Glasgow now.

130. If there are any recommendations you would wish to make to the Committee you can do so?—I consider that Catholic prisoners can never be reformed in our county or borough gaols unless by the influence of religion, and they cannot enjoy this influence unless the priest who instructs them is placed upon the same footing as the Protestant minister; he should devote his whole time to it, and should be paid fairly and honourably for his labour. I consider that a prison is the last place of all where there should be any religious wrangling or disputes. We are there for a common end, to effect a common good, and to prevent these people from becoming re-convicted.

131. Sir John Pakington.] I understood you to state that you had no wish to interfere with the discipline and order of the prison; I presume that, acting as you were, you would not have been allowed to interfere with the discipline and order of the prison, even if you had been so minded?—No, certainly not.

132. If you had interfered in any way with the discipline or order of the prison, your dismissal would have been the result?—Certainly, and I am not aware of having broken any prison rule during the three years I was there; the magistrates certainly never reprimanded me.

133. You stated you had no status; who appointed you?—The visiting justices tolerated my presence in the prison, but there is no appointment; the phrasing of it is, that there is "the approval of a priest," not "the appointment of a priest."

134. What caused you to be selected rather than any other Roman Catholic priest?—Because I applied for the appointment.

135. To whom did you apply?—To the visiting justices.

136. They approved of your acting?—Yes, they approved of my acting as visiting priest.

137. Do you not think that that gave you a status in the prison?—Not a status in the sense to which I referred; that is to say, I have never had the status of any other officer there; I was never treated as an officer, and Mr. Serjeant Payne, in one of his discourses at the Clerkenwell Sessions House, insisted upon the fact, that I was there upon my own account, and therefore I ought not to be paid.

138. That is another question; you were there upon your own account, but you were there for three years continuously?—Yes.

139. And until this affair in the laundry took place, you were never interfered with, or denied admission into the prison?—I was never denied admission into the prison.

140. You mentioned a resolution and a letter relating to your dismissal; if I followed rightly what you stated to the Committee, it began by your writing to the visiting justices, to complain of the exclusion of these Roman Catholic women from the laundry?—Yes.

141. Then, I apprehend, you received from the visiting justices an answer to this letter?—Yes, I did.

142. Was that the letter which you published in the newspapers?—It was.

Rev. A. White.

28 March 1870.

143. Was that letter, in its general character and tone, an official letter?—It seemed to be an official letter certainly.

144. It was a letter written officially, in the name of the visiting justices?—Yes, it was.

145. Then you mentioned the resolution which the Committee have not seen or heard anything more about; by whom was that resolution passed?—That resolution was passed by the visiting justices of the prison.

146. Was that in consequence of your application?—It was in consequence of a certain article that appeared in the "Pall Mall Gazette."

147. I apprehend, from what you have said that that article was founded upon the answer you received from the visiting justices?—Yes, it was.

148. And then, after the article appeared, the visiting justices passed a resolution?—After the article appeared they passed a resolution, and that resolution and the correspondence, are, I believe, upon the Table of the House of Commons.

149. Then you say you have no salary whatever?—I have no salary.

150. And you also stated that you applied to the Court; did you apply in person, or by letter?—I applied through Mr. Bagshawe; Mr. Bagshawe made a motion to the effect, that I and the clergy of Westminster, who attended the prison, should be allowed a salary.

151. Was that at the public quarter sessions?—Yes.

152. Was that motion refused?—Yes, it was.

153. Was there a division?—Yes, there was

154. What was the majority against you?—There was a good majority of votes; I cannot tell you the majority, but I considered it to be a large one.

155. Can you tell the Committee what would be about the average number of prisoners, of all denominations, who were confined in the Westminster House of Correction during the time that you officiated there for the Roman Catholics?—I think the daily average might be considered as about 700.

156. Then, in fact, the Roman Catholic criminals constituted, speaking roughly, about one-third of the whole number of people?—Yes.

157. Is not that a larger average of Roman Catholics than is usual in the prisons in England?—I think not; I think in Liverpool, for instance, the average is larger.

158. Referring to the three years during which you held the office, when was it that you made the application before the court of quarter sessions for a salary; was it early in your ministration?—No, it was not early; it was in January 1869, after I had been there two years.

159. Had you been there upwards of two years without making any such application?—Yes.

160. You were content for those two years to labour without salary?—I was not content to do so; but the reason that I did not apply before was, that I had the certainty of not succeeding in the application so I did not make it.

161. Has the application ever since been renewed?—Yes; previous to Mr. Bagshawe's motion a Protestant magistrate of his own accord, Mr. Northall Lawrie, moved in the court of quarter sessions, that the Roman Catholic clergyman should be paid; that was about a year before Mr. Bagshawe's motion; a division took place upon the motion, and there was a large adverse majority.

162. During the period that you were connected with the prison, was there any other minister of religion admitted to attend to the spiritual interests of prisoners of any other denomination besides the Established Church and the Roman Catholic Church?—No one that I know of.

163. Did the woman who is referred to in this printed paper as attending to the instruction of the prisoners, attend to the instruction of the Roman Catholic as well as Protestant prisoners?—Yes, she taught them; there was a Roman Catholic class which she taught by themselves.

164. I think you told us the fact that about the commencement of the year 1868, considerable concessions were made to you as compared with the previous state of things?—Yes, certainly.

165. I believe you were allowed to carry on your services?—Yes, and to see the prisoners collectively.

166. And a room was also assigned to you?—Yes, that was so.

167. Did you collect any number of prisoners together at one time in that room?—No; I did not avail myself of the permission which was given to me of instructing 25 prisoners at a time, because, I said to myself, "For the present I will rest satisfied with the Sunday service, where I shall be able to instruct them collectively, and then later on, I shall ask for a daily service," which was given to me.

168. What do you mean by 25 prisoners?—At the time the magistrates gave me permission to hold the Sunday service, they also gave me permission to see 25 prisoners collectively on week days.

169. The Sunday service was only limited by the size of the room, was it not?—It was only limited by the size of the room.

170. With due regard to health and tolerable comfort, how many prisoners could you assemble in the room for Sunday service?—I should say that 150 would be the greatest number that could be conveniently got into the room.

171. What was the room that was assigned to you after 1868?—A room set aside for the chapel.

172. It was a room fitted up for your purposes, and was practically a chapel?—Yes.

173. That room, I understand, with decent convenience, would hold 150 prisoners?—Yes, it would.

174. That number would leave a considerable margin of those who could not get into it?—It would.

175. How did you manage with the service for those prisoners who did not get in?—Of course they had no service at all; I could not give two services in the morning, because I had other work to do in the town.

176. Did you make any arrangement by which those who did not come on one morning could come on another?—No, I had nothing to do with such regulations; I wrote to the visiting justices in the year 1868 to the effect that the room was too small for the number of prisoners and I made a complaint of the prisoners being unable to attend, but the answer was, that the room was large enough for the average number of prisoners.

177. In the early part of your evidence you state ted that you were not allowed to collect the soners together?—No.

78. Then you stated, almost immediately erwards, that you administered the sacrament 15 women at a time?—I used to instruct the soners, one by one, for communion, and then en the day for administering the sacrament ived, I was allowed to see them for communion ether.

79. For that one purpose?—Yes.

80. As long as you were confined to that cell, y did you administer the sacrament to all that nber?—All do not receive at the same time; mited number only go.

81. On the whole, how much of your time occupied by your duties in prison?—I think ut two hours a day.

82. On the average through the week?—On verage through the week.

83. Do you mean to say that on week days were engaged in your ministration to the ent of two hours a day?—I think so, taking ll in all; I never timed myself, so I could say exactly; sometimes I was more, sometes I might be less.

84. Beyond those two hours a-day you were free for other duties?—I was left free for er duties with the exception of those two rs a-day; of course there was a certain numof letters to be written, which I had to do at e, and prison matters to be conducted; for ance, providing the necessary things for the bration of divine service; all that occupied a ain portion of my time.

85. After the concessions were made in 1868, ou consider, as a Roman Catholic clergyman inted to look after the spiritual interests of Roman Catholic prisoners in that goal, that had any serious cause of complaint beyond fact that you have not received any remuation for your services?—That was the chief e of complaint certainly.

86. Mr. O'Reilly.] As I understand, you conr you are not a regularly appointed officer of prison?—Yes, that is so.

87. Being merely an extern allowed to visit? es.

88. Are there any other persons who are, to knowledge, permitted to visit the prisoners he gaol?—There were three ladies that I to meet there.

89. And those are persons allowed to visit oners, but they are in no sense officers of the on?—They were in no sense officers of the on.

90. Have they given the words rightly in the r appointing you "a priest approved to visit criminal prisoners"?—That is correct.

91. The honourable Baronet next to me d you whether there was not an unusually e number of Roman Catholics in the prison; ou aware that the number of Roman Catholrisoners varies very much in different prisons ngland according to the locality, that is to according to the number of poor Roman Caics in the district?—They do.

92. Would you be surprised to hear that e are 23 prisons in England with upwards of and in some cases 300, Roman Catholic prirs in each?—I should not be surprised to it. I believe that the refuse of Ireland e into England and get into distress, and are eby driven to crime.

93. So that there are some prisons in which there are upwards of 100 Roman Catholics?—Yes; in Liverpool the number is very large, and in Bristol also.

194. Chairman.] Have you got the correspondence and the resolution?—No, I have not.

195. Could you have it handed in next time; the correspondence has been printed in one of the county books?—It has.

196. Mr. Holt.] Is this the correspondence (producing a pamphlet)?—Yes.

197. I think you stated that upon your application to the visiting justices you were allowed to visit the prisoners; what induced you particularly to make that application?—I was asked to do so by my superior.

198. Under the direction of your ecclesiastical superior?—Quite so; I was asked if I would take it, and I said I would, and I therefore presented myself as an applicant.

199. In the event of the justices deciding to appoint the Roman Catholic chaplain as an officer of the prison, would the same course be followed?—Yes.

200. Would the magistrates have any opportunity of making a selection, or would there be one priest appointed to make application, so that they would either have to appoint that priest, or no one at all?—In the event of the visiting justices not appointing that priest, another would present himself to be approved of by them, and so on until one had been determined upon.

201. In each case the priest who offered himself would be the priest who was instructed to do so by his ecclesiastical superior?—Yes; of course, a priest might ask his superior to allow him to undertake the post, if he preferred such duty, as some men do.

202. When you became connected with the prison, was any provision at all made for divine service in accordance with the rites of your church?—None; there was the service of the communion in the cell referred to.

203. Then what was done by you to provide the necessary articles which were required?—I applied to the justices to provide the chalice and vestments, the altar-plate, &c.

204. Which of these things were provided by the justices?—None of them; the justices provided the fixtures of the chapel and the carpet.

205. Then the articles provided by you consisted of the chalice and vestments?—I should say about 18 or 20 articles were necessary; vestments and linen, and plate and different sorts of things required for the celebration of divine service.

206. Were they things required for your own use, or to render the room suitable?—They were required for the religious service itself, and things without which you could not perform religious service; those religious services are of two kinds: first of all there is what is called the mass, which is the morning service, and in the afternoon there is what is called benediction; for the mass a certain number of things are required, and for benediction other things are necessary, without which it would be impossible to perform either of the two services.

207. Did you apply to the justices to enforce any regulations in connection with the Roman Catholic religion other than those that were in force at the time when you went to the prison?—I think my first application to them was in August, about nine months after my arrival in the prison; I should have applied before, but I knew knew very well that others had applied, and had always met with a refusal; I applied in August, because I thought there was a good chance of my succeeding, in consequence of divine service having been celebrated in Coldbath Fields Prison.

208. You stated you considered it an indignity that the matron asked the Roman Catholic prisoners whether they wished to go to the Protestant chaplain?—I did, certainly.

209. Would you have considered it an indignity to ask Protestant prisoners whether they wished to go to the Roman Catholic chaplain?—I should indeed.

210. In the event of your being at the head of a prison in a Roman Catholic country, would you not think it right to allow Protestant prisoners to go if they chose to the other service?—I should not encourage it.

211. Would you not let them know that they could do so if they wished it; would you consider it an indignity?—No; because there would be no other service provided for them; if there was but one mode of worship provided them, I do not see that there would be any great indignity in allowing prisoners of a different creed to enter our chapel.

212. In the case of a Roman Catholic prison on the continent, when Protestant prisoners were allowed to have the ministrations of their own chaplains, would you consider it an indignity to state to them that they were at liberty to attend the Roman Catholic service if they chose?—Certainly I should, if they had a minister of their own.

213. With regard to such prisoners as enter themselves as Roman Catholics on arrival at the prison, are they allowed to see the Protestant chaplain if they wish it, although they may be Roman Catholics?—It seems in the prison at Westminster, that all the prisoners, whether they wish it or not, have to see the Protestant minister.

214. But I am speaking of a gaol in which a Roman Catholic chaplain is appointed; do you know whether the Roman Catholic prisoners in the gaol are allowed to see the Protestant chaplain if they wish it?—No; they must abide by what they say on their admission. Their names are taken down, and their creed asked for, and they are supposed to adhere to that, unless there is good reason to the contrary. A person who enters his name as a Catholic on entering the gaol is bound to remain in that category all the time he is in the prison.

215. The Committee want to know whether you can speak of any prison in which that is the rule?—It is the rule in Wakefield Prison, and in all Government prisons, that prisoners adhere to what they have stated upon their entry. They are asked by the porter to state what their creed is, and they are registered accordingly. Catholics are visited (although against the Act of Parliament) by the Protestant clergyman, which ought not to be done unless the priest has been absent from the prison a certain number of days, I believe 12 or 14 days.

216. Do those regulations extend to the library, with respect to the class of books which prisoners are allowed to read?—Yes; prisoners are allowed to read their own religious books.

217. They are allowed only the books which the priests approve?—The books approved by the justices, at the instance of the priest.

218. May it not be the cause why the Roman Catholic prisoners on their second visit to the gaol enter their names as Protestants, instead of Roman Catholics, that they have greater liberty in the matter of books, and in the matter of receiving the visits of strangers?—I think not.

219. You named a Scripture reader as the person whom you wished to have to assist you; will you inform the Committee what the duties of the Scripture reader would be?—I applied to the visiting justice for a schoolmistress; of the two I should have preferred under the circumstances to have had a schoolmistress, as I should have given this schoolmistress instructions as to what to teach those unfortunate prisoners with reference to those things which were most necessary; but as I was refused the services of a schoolmistress I was very anxious to have the New Testament read to the prisoners, in the hope that they would derive very much benefit from the lecture.

220. Then what would be the duties of the Scripture reader; simply to read the New Testament?—Simply to read the New Testament; but in all probability I should have asked the visiting justices permission to convert her sometimes into an instructress, and to let her expound the Scriptures according to our own interpretation of them.

221. Then I understand her duty would have been to read the Scriptures, and explain them?—To read the Scriptures, and explain them.

222. Mr. Dimsdale.] I think you stated that in August 1867 you remonstrated with the justices for not permitting you to see a number of Catholic prisoners at a time; was that absolutely refused, or was any statement made about it?—It was absolutely refused.

223. You are not aware that it was in consequence of an opinion having been given that it was illegal to grant that permission?—I think they spoke of the illegality of it.

224. Let me call your attention to the refusal of a permission to grant a Scripture reader; are you aware that a similar application was refused to two Protestant ladies in the previous year?—No, I am not aware of it.

225. If that were so, you would think that it was intended to deal equally with the Roman Catholics and the Protestants?—Yes.

226. With reference to the harmonium, are you aware that no harmonium was allowed to be placed in the Protestant chapel?—I know that there was no harmonium placed there, but I was not aware any had ever been asked for, or that the Protestant minister ever intended to have one.

227. Then with regard to the fittings of the chapel; I understand you to say, that there was an altar put up by the visiting justices?—There was.

228. Then, what I may call the essentials which were required for the Roman Catholic communion, were supplied by you?—All the essentials necessary for the proper celebration of divine service.

229. Then with regard to the refusal of the acolyte, was that refused upon special grounds, or upon general grounds?—There was no particular reason assigned by the visiting justices.

230. Was not something said with regard to the age of the boy, to the effect that the first boy was over the specified age?—He was over the proper age; I was in the Isle of Wight about that hat time, and I forgot the letter I received from he visiting justices about the age; a mistake ccurred in that respect upon my part, but I fterwards sent a boy who was under the specified ge.

231. Let me call your attention to a letter of 2th April 1868; was that when the matron ddressed the prisoners in the way you described? —Yes.

232. I believe you did not hear the speech she ade?—I did not.

233. Then whatever information you obtained pon the point is derived from hearsay?—I btained it from the prisoners.

234. Your complaints against the matron range nder these two heads: her having made this ddress to the prisoners; and also the laundry uestion?—And also the arbitrary removal of fficers without consulting the visiting priest.

235. Now I will call your attention to the uestion of the laundry. I think you stated that he Roman Catholics were turned out of the undry and the kitchen immediately after the peech was made?—Yes.

236. It is on that account that you considered here was a proselytising object in removing the atholics from the laundry?—Yes.

237. How many cases came under your knowdge of Catholics being turned out of the laundry. think there was one particular case, that of Iary Morgan, who told you that she had deared herself a Protestant at first, because she ould otherwise have been excluded from the undry?—Yes, and I heard of other cases terwards.

238. How many of those cases did you bring nder the notice of the visiting justices?—Only at one. I knew of others, but I only knew of em through information which was supplied to e by prisoners, which you cannot always act pon, but when many agree upon a certain ing, you may generally conclude that there is certain amount of truth in their statement.

239. With regard to the size of the chapelom, you have stated that you did not believe would accommodate more than 150 people?—think it would not.

240. Would it not, if an additional number of enches were placed in it?—As the room is fitted o at present, I do not think it is conveniently pable of holding more than 150.

241. Did you ever have more in it than 150? —Yes, I had 170 once; but it was both inconeniently and unhealthily crowded.

242. There is always a per-centage of Roman atholic prisoners, who from illness, or other uses, cannot attend the chapel, is there not?—es, amongst female prisoners it must be so; en there are some who are under punishent.

243. I think I gathered from your answer to e honourable Baronet that all your reasonable mands were complied with, except as regards e pay?—Yes; I think if payment were given, at the priest in the receipt of such payment ould devote to the prisoners the whole of his me, and things would go on satisfactorily, as he ould hold a position in the prison which he does t now occupy, and he would look upon himself bound to those around him, and to the officers the prison, and they would be more bound to m. It would be a more natural arrangement, I nsider.

244. You have been succeeded, I believe, by another Roman Catholic priest?—I was succeeded immediately.

245. Do you know whether there have been any complaints made by him?—I have not heard of any.

246. Mr. Hutton.] With regard to these altar fittings, you state that you paid 150 l. for them, or thereabouts?—I did.

247. They therefore became your own private property?—I gave them to the prison; I never dreamt of removing them, and I never should do so, although, strictly speaking, they are not prison property. If the priest were not allowed to perform his ministrations there, I should consider that the last priest should remove them, and give them, perhaps, to some charity.

248. Mr. Synan.] You think it would not be fair in a public prison, in which one-third of the prisoners were Roman Catholics, that you should be called upon to apply your private property to public purposes?—I think it was rather too hard upon me.

249. Now, with respect to the selection of candidates, you state that there was no selection, as there was only one candidate for permission to occupy the post?—That is so.

250. It is only a permission, it is not an appointment?—It is not an appointment.

251. And it would be strange, would it not, if there were more than one candidate for such an office, as that for which there is no emolument? —There would not be more than one at a time.

252. Is it usual to have candidates for offices to which there is no pay attached, and which are productive of great inconvenience to the individual who holds them?—It certainly requires a special vocation.

253. Now, with reference to the matron, you did not hear what she said to the prisoners after she had given them that intimation in public?— I did not.

254. But you saw what occurred?—I did.

255. Did you see the show of hands?—No.

256. You stated that five or six prisoners held up their hands?—That is what I have heard.

257. You saw that she was addressing them almost immediately after the service?—She was.

258. Do you think that the prisoners would consider it a favourable inducement to be allowed to remain in the laundry and the kitchen?— Certainly.

259. And I suppose you would not think it fair that such an inducement should be held out to a prisoner, in order to induce him to change his creed, or any other opinion that he might hold?—Certainly not.

260. If such a thing occurred in a Roman Catholic country it would be just as culpable as if it occurred in a Protestant country, would it not?—Certainly it would.

261. You were asked a question about the illegality of the appointment of a scripture reader?—The answer was that it was against the statute.

262. When was that answer made?—On March the 14th, I think, or thereabout.

263. In what year?—1868.

264. You were asked whether a similar application was not refused to the Protestants; as I understand your evidence, you state that the Protestant chaplain had a scripture reader?— The Protestant chaplain had a schoolmistress who reads the scriptures; the scriptures are read by her, and also by ladies who visit the prison.

Rev. A. White.

28 March 1870.

265. I believe I understood you to state that the Protestant chaplain had two readers?—Yes; two assistants.

266. They read the scriptures and instruct the prisoners?—Yes; they do what he wants them to do.

267. Therefore it is not true that a similar application was refused to the Protestant chaplain, inasmuch as instead of having one, he has two schoolmistresses?—That is so.

268. You were asked about the harmonium, as to whether a similar application was not refused to the Protestant chaplain; I believe that music is more an essential feature of the Catholic service than it is of the Protestant service?—I think so; and at the same time that I asked for this harmonium, an organ was being erected at Coldbath Fields for the Protestant minister, from which I concluded that if the Protestant chaplain at Westminster asked for it, he would have been granted a like favour, seeing that it had been granted to a person holding a similar position elsewhere.

269. I think you have been asked whether those visiting justices did not provide you with an altar; will you just tell the Committee what is the nature of this accommodation which they have provided you with, which is called an altar?—It is a framework; a kind of table.

270. Covered with a cloth?—Yes.

271. What is the value of it?—I have no idea; it is a neat little table; it is in keeping with the room.

272. What would be the proportion of the expense of that with which the visiting justices have provided you, namely, the table, carpet, and fixtures, as compared with that which you provided out of your own private pocket, for essentials for the Catholic service?—I cannot say; I am not sufficiently acquainted with the value of those fittings.

273. Can you say whether they paid so much as you did?—I should think not.

274. Or anything like it?—I think not. There was of course the doing-up of the room, and the whitewashing of it, and putting up the gas fixtures.

275. Your support, I suppose, is derived from voluntary contributions?—From voluntary contributions.

276. And when you were in the prison at Westminster, and attending your schools, your support was then derived from voluntary contributions?—Yes.

277. Consequently, if you got a salary for doing this public duty it would not only relieve the members of your own fraternity but it would also relieve your congregation from a portion of the burden of supporting you?—Certainly, they would not be called upon so often for the support of the clergy.

278. With respect to the correspondence. Your letter of the 21st of August made a specific complaint, that you considered taking these Catholic inmates into the kitchen and the laundry, as not alone placing them in a better position in the house, but is a positive inducement to them to proselytise themselves?—I consider it had that effect.

279. I have read the resolution and the letter of the justices, and I have read the report of the mistress, and not one of them makes any answer to your charge of these arrangements having a tendency to proselytise. Now you were asked a question respecting the effect of these laundry arrangements. It is only when the prisoners enter the prison for the second time that they change their religion?—Certainly; that is so.

280. Do they do it the first time?—Before I took service in the prison I understood that many Catholics entered their names as Protestants, in the expectation of getting better treated.

281. You know, as a fact, that they looked upon this as a favour and an inducement?—They did.

282. And that many of them availed themselves of it?—I understand so.

283. Mr. Guest.] You stated that your duties occupied you about two hours each day during the week?—That is so.

284. And about two hours and a half on Sunday?—Yes.

285. Supposing that you had freer access to the prisoners, and also better accommodation, do you think that your duties would occupy less time?—I only gave to the prisoners what time I could spare, but I never gave to them that time that I ought to give them if I expected much reformation; I could not do it. I do not for a moment pretend to say that two or three hours a day would be sufficient for the instruction of those prisoners. I gave them what little time I could spare.

286. What I wished to understand was this, do you consider that if you had freer access to the prisoners, or as free as you have now, and also better accommodation for performing Divine service your time would have been economised in consequence; you made some remark about your time being unnecessarily taken up?—That was in 1867, when I was only allowed to see the prisoners one by one, then a good deal of my time was lost unnecessarily; but afterwards I had free access to the prisoners; the magistrates allowed me a daily service.

287. You stated that you spent about 150*l.* out of your own pocket for the necessary appliances for conducting Divine service, what do you consider would be the sum required each year for those necessaries?—Those necessaries once procured, the expense of the chapel would be comparatively very light afterwards. The great thing is the first fitting up of the chapel.

288. There would be no other necessary expenses in performing the Divine services?—The necessary expenses from that time forward would be very slight. I suppose 12*l.* or 14*l.* a year would cover the whole expense from that time forward.

289. Lord Henley.] I wish to ask you a question with respect to this intimation which was given by the matron on the 12th of April 1868, that the prisoners might attend the service of the Protestant chaplain if they wished it, was that done as an answer to any proselytising attempt upon your part?—I think not.

290. Was there any such attempt?—I am not aware of having made any attempt to proselytise.

291. Can you account at all for the difference in the way in which the return at this prison is made out from all the other returns. In all other returns the prisoners are classified as belonging to various denominations, but in this prison they are simply returned as Protestants and Roman Catholics?—I think that is a simple means of classifying them; because, if I remember correctly, in looking over the previous returns the numbers of those belonging to dissenting sects in gaols was very small indeed.

292. Bu

292. But do you not, in the course of your experience, find many prisoners admitted who really have no religion at all?—Yes.

293. Under what head would they be classified?—They are obliged to choose a religion on their entrance into prison.

294. Then you would not consider it a part of your duty, if you thought that any prisoner was doubtful as to the body that he belonged to, to speak to him and endeavour to instruct him?—I could not have access to such prisoners, because their names are taken down upon their entrance into the prison, and also their particular creed; they are obliged to state some creed on their entrance.

295. So that proselytising on your part would be almost impossible?—It would be quite impossible, as I should only have access to those people who represented themselves as being Roman Catholics.

296. Viscount Enfield.] You had a successor, you state?—Yes, I was succeeded immediately.

297. With regard to the essentials for the celebration of the mass, you state that you have left those behind you?—Yes, I have.

298. Do I understand you to say that they were your gift; or were they the gift of benevolent and charitable persons in the neighbourhood?—I went about begging money from my friends for them, and I bought them all. There were very few gifts among the things; they were articles that I bought out of money which I begged for the purpose.

299. With the exception of the occurrence which you have mentioned of the 12th of April, were your dealings with the visiting justices and the matron, generally of a harmonious and satisfactory character?—I think so, up to that point.

300. Mr. Downing.] There was a distinction drawn in the early part of your examination between a clergyman appointed and a clergyman permitted; are you aware that under the 3rd section of the Act the justices may appoint a minister at a salary?—Yes.

301. And are you aware that they may permit a minister to visit the prison?—I am.

302. And that he is no officer?—That is so.

303. That is your position, is it not?—Yes; I always regarded it as such.

304. Will you allow me to ask you whether you were handed a list of the Roman Catholic prisoners when you received permission to enter the prison?—Yes, the authorities were very good; they always provided a list, which was handed to me.

305. Will you be kind enough to take that in your hand (handing the last Return to the Witness), and refer to page 6. Do you see there under the head of the "City Gaol and House of Correction, Chester," that the relative numbers in that gaol are, Protestants 411, and those of the Romish Church 194?—That is so.

306. Do you find there that the Protestant chaplain has a salary of 100*l.* per annum?—Yes.

307. And that there is no Roman Catholic chaplain appointed?—I see that.

308. Will you now refer to page 7, to the "Derby County Prison"?—Yes.

309. Do you see that there are there 326 Roman Catholics?—Yes.

310. Do you see that there is a Protestant chaplain there, with a salary of 270*l.* per annum?—Yes.

311. And do you see there a note that "a Roman Catholic priest visits prisoners of that persuasion, and supplies them with books and instruction, without any cost to the country"?—Yes.

312. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You told us that in August 1867 you were refused permission to celebrate divine service; and in answer to a question from an honourable Member of the Committee, you informed us that the reason, or one of the reasons, assigned for that refusal was its illegality?—I think so.

313. Are you aware that any new Act was passed between the time of that refusal, and the granting of the relaxation towards the end of 1867?—I think not.

314. It was simply that the magistrates had found out at the end of 1867, that that was legal which at the commencement of the year they thought was illegal?—That is so.

315. Do you visit these prisoners without their request?—No, they were always asked if they wished to see the priest.

316. If they do not wish to do so, you have no power to visit them?—No power whatever.

317. Is that the case with prisoners not of your persuasion?—No.

318. The Protestant chaplain has the right to visit every prisoner, with or without his will?—He has.

319. Do you consider that that is a disadvantage, and that it creates a feeling of inequality?—Yes, certainly.

320. Does your experience lead you to the conclusion, that persons confined in gaols are likely to ask for the ministrations of a clergyman?—No, the worst of them do not care much about it.

321. And those are just the men to whom they are most necessary?—Exactly.

322. With regard to the non-application for salary on your part for two years, are you acquainted with the fact, that there had been previous refusals to grant salaries?—I have always understood so.

323. Was that your reason for not making the application?—I considered that it was too great a request to make, as minor applications had been refused.

324. After you had been established in the prison two years, you considered that you had so established yourself in the opinion of the justices, that you might have a better chance of getting your request granted?—Yes.

325. Is it not the case, with regard to the discipline of the Roman Catholic Church, that no priests would offer themselves as candidates, half-a-dozen at a time, for an office of this kind, but would submit themselves to their ecclesiastical superior, and no one would present himself save with the sanction and approval of such superior?—Exactly.

326. But if there was anything objectionable in the person so submitting himself to the magistrates, although he had the sanction of his bishop, the magistrates would have the power of rejecting him?—Yes, certainly.

327. With regard to the matron, you told the Committee that you saw the matron addressing the prisoners, but could not hear what she said?—Yes.

328. Now, after that, did you find your authority

Rev. A. White.

28 March 1870.

rity in any degree weakened by this conduct on the part of the matron?—No, I think not; it caused a great spirit of indignation amongst the prisoners, but it acted rather favourably as far as I was concerned.

329. You did not find any great indisposition to receive your ministrations afterwards?—No, I think not.

330. With regard to the instructions of the schoolmistress, have you had any reason to complain of those instructions bordering at all upon proselytism?—No; I think the schoolmistress acts very fairly.

331. As a matter of fact, is not all the ministration given to the class of persons confined as prisoners, of such an elementary character that really controversial points are unlikely to arise?—They are the most uneducated class; and I should mention that the Protestant mistress reads the Catholic Bible to the women at certain times.

332. You stated to the Committee that you were not treated with courtesy; have you any specific charge to make upon this point?—What I felt very much with reference to this particular matter was, the frequent removal of the particular officer whose duty it was to wait upon me, without previous notice being given to me.

333. Who do you mean by the officer waiting upon you?—The sub-warder who waited upon me was frequently changed, much to my annoyance; whereas the warders who waited upon the Protestant minister were fixed.

334. You had no control over, and no voice in the appointment of the warder who waited upon you?—No, I had not.

335. Now with regard to the laundry question, in publishing the letter which you were accessory to publishing in the "Pall Mall Gazette," had you any intention of casting a slur upon the magisterial body?—None whatever. I should have applied to the court of quarter sessions, had I expected to be able to do so with any hope of success; but knowing the spirit that has often been shown in that court, I had no hope whatever of finding redress; the language made use of in that court sometimes was very offensive.

336. Had you any reason to believe that the resolution so sent to you was intended to be confidential?—No; I looked upon that resolution just as I did upon any other resolution which I have received from the visiting justices.

337. Did that resolution state the reason for a certain thing being done, or not being done?—The resolution stated that I was suspected of publishing the letter, as the contents of it had not been communicated to any one else; and therefore, under those circumstances, they withdrew the permission I had of visiting the prison, allowing me to continue my ministrations up to a certain date, in order that the prisoners might not be inconvenienced.

338. That was not the resolution that was published in the papers, was it?—That is one of the resolutions; the resolution was to this effect, requiring to know from me how it was that the resolution contained in their letter had got into print.

339. Which was that resolution that had got into print?—The resolution was to this effect: I wrote to them to beg of them to alter the arrangements of the prison, as I have stated; and I suggested that they might, for instance, exclude all Irish women from the laundry, so that when they came in a second time the inducement for entering themselves as Protestants would no longer be held out to them. The visiting justices wrote back to me, stating that they saw no reason to alter the present arrangements of the prison, and that was the letter I published.

340. You are quite confident that amongst the prisoners the laundry and kitchen work was considered more pleasant than any other work?—Yes.

341. So that without imputing proselytizing objects to the prison authorities, you consider that the difference which was made was one which would create a painful feeling, and one which was very undesirable?—Yes.

342. And one that you wished to get remedied?—Yes.

343. You did not succeed by private application, I believe?—No, I did not.

344. And you thought that by bringing public opinion to bear upon the matter you might succeed?—Yes.

345. If you had been told that such a publication would have been considered a breach of discipline, you would not have done it?—I would not have done it if the letter had been marked "private" or "confidential."

346. But the letter was not so marked?—No.

347. Did you ever come into personal contact with the matron, or have a personal dispute with her?—No, never.

348. In fact, from the year 1867 you gradually found a spirit prevailing among the magistrates of willingness to give you greater relaxation, and greater facilities for performing your duties?—Yes.

349. Have you ever had any complaints from Catholic prisoners that they could not attend Divine service after you had this room given to you?—Yes, a number of prisoners complained that they were not allowed to attend.

350. Did they give you any reason why they were not allowed to attend?—No, I understood the reason perfectly well; a warder was stationed near the chapel to admit as many as the chapel would hold, and to have the others taken back to their cells.

351. You do not mean to say that there was any other reason for their not being admitted, except that there was not room?—That was the only reason.

352. You found a practical inconvenience from not having a room large enough to hold the whole number?—Yes, certainly I did.

353. Have you any other complaint to make of the authorities of the prison, with regard to the interference with our religious ministration?—No.

354. You felt placed at a disadvantage as compared with the Protestant minister; did you receive courtesy from him?—Yes; I have nothing to complain of with regard to the Protestant chaplain.

355. You simply felt that the comparison of the prisoners of one religion having a paid minister, with the others being left to the voluntary system, was not a fair state of things?—That was so.

356. Mr. Synan.] You stated to the Committee that the conduct of the matron upon that occasion had not the effect of weakening your authority upon your people?—I think not.

357. Do you mean to extend that observation to those who wished to be in the kitchen, or whom iom you supposed to be induced to retain the nefit of the kitchen, by the conduct of the atron?—The conduct of the matron excited a eling of indignation.

358. Did it excite a feeling of indignation iongst the prisoners in the laundry and kitchen, well as those who were not in the laundry and tchen?—It excited indignation amongst those io heard the address; it was a Sunday, so that ere would not have been any of them in the indry.

359. Were all the prisoners present when the atron addressed them, both those who belonged the kitchen and laundry, as well as those who l not?—Yes; she addressed them in two or ee places; there were not all of them in the rd at the time.

360. Sir John Pakington.] I think you stated at you combined with your duties in this prison ne other professional duties, did you not?—s, I did.

361. What were those other duties?—The ty of attending to a large parish, in which there about 5,000 souls.

362. You performed that duty as a Roman tholic minister, did you not?—Yes.

363. And for that duty I suppose you received nuneration?—Of course I did; but at the ne time I could not attend to those people as y ought to have been attended to.

364. Was your remuneration for your paroal duties increased in consideration of your ending to the Roman Catholics in the prison? No.

365. Did you find that your duties in Tothill lds Prison seriously interfered with your pahial duties?—Yes, I did.

366. Chairman.] Is it not the case that there a larger number of clergymen in your parish, consequence of the occupation of your time in prison?—Yes, there were.

367. Mr. Synan.] In your opinion would the vices of one chaplain be necessary for the 220 tholic prisoners in Tothill-fields Prison?—s, most decidedly; and I think the county es would be considerably diminished by the ointment of such a minister.

368. Chairman.] Would the appointment of h a minister have the effect of reforming the soners, and preventing their re-committal, and reby diminishing the burthen upon the rate-ers of supporting crime?—Certainly it would.

369. Mr. Fowler.] Did I understand you to e, that you had the charge of 5,000 members a Roman Catholic church?—I am one of three sts who have charge of the parish.

370. You stated just now, in answer to an ourable Member opposite, that you considered t one Roman Catholic clergyman is required for the 300 prisoners or thereabouts in the Tothill-fields Prison; how is it that if one clergyman is required for the 240 prisoners (for the sake of argument we will say 300 prisoners) in the prison to which you refer, the church considers that three clergymen are sufficient for the 5,000 people in the parish?—The reason for that is simply this, that one class is far more destitute than the other; one class is more ignorant, and requires far greater efforts to be made by the priests; my firm conviction is, from what I know of the state of these prisoners, that a clergyman could give the whole of his time to them, and that the whole of his time would be required for the reformation of these people.

371. Chairman.] The prison duties are heavier than the outside duties, are they not?—Certainly.

372. Mr. Synan.] Are not the services of a Roman Catholic clergyman, in relation to his community, more minute than those of a Protestant clergyman?—Much more so.

373. And with respect to the number in the same prison, would not a priest with 300 Roman Catholics to minister to, find as much employment as would be given by 400 Protestants?—Yes, in consequence of the nature of the Roman Catholic religion; there is instruction for confession and communion, and all the particulars in preparing for the services.
